By the publication next week of "Wanderings in Arabia," an abridged edition of "Travels in Arabia Deserta," Messrs. Duckworth bring into prominence the figure of "the first among living explorers of Arabia," to quote the "Times." The original edition of these remarkable travels which is curiously little known to literary men, excited the enthusiasm of William Morris, who used to keep the book constantly by him, as a model of English style. Mr. Doughty, whose knowledge of Arabia and its people is second to none according to Mr. Wilfred Scaven Blunt, Mr. Hogarth, and other authorities, has, we understand, lately completed a poem, "Adam Cast Forth," on the Mahomedan version of the Fall of Man, and the Expulsion from Eden, which will be issued in the Spring by the same publishers.

MESSRS. CASSELL will shortly publish an important work by Dr. C. W. Saleeby on "Race Culture." Dr. Saleeby has shown great skill in popularising scientific ideas and his studies in a subject of such growing importance as race culture ought to provoke interest.

THE following novels are to be published within the next few weeks: "Sheaves," by Mr. E. F. Benson, "Somehow Good," by Mr. William de Morgan, "New Worlds for Old," by Mr. H. G. Wells, "Caroline," by Miss Clementina Black, "The History of Aythan Waring," by Miss Violet Jacob, "The Marquis and Pamela," by Mr. E. H. Cooper, and "The Mother," by Mr. Eden Phillpotts.

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Ibsen." By Edmund Gosse. Literary Livers Series. (Hodder & Stoughton. 3s. 6d.)

"William Clarke: A Collection of His Writings. With a Biographical Sketch." By Herbert Burrows and J. A. Hobson. (Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d. net.)

"The Seven Ages of Washington." By Owen Wister. (Macmillan. 8s. 6d. net.)

"James Thomson." By G. C. Macaulay. English Men of Letters Series. (Macmillan. 2s. net.)

"Political Problems of American Development." By Albert Shaw. (Macmillan. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Religion and Historic Faiths." By Otto Pfeleiderer. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"Poems." By Mary E. Coleridge. (Elkin Mathews. 4s. 6d. net.)

"Man and the Cassock." By Mrs. David G. Ritchie. (Methuen. 6s.)

"Lamartine, Et la Politique étrangère de la Révolution de Février." Par Pierre Quentin-Bauchart. (Paris: Juven. 5 fr.)

"Le Sentiment de la Nature en France de J. J. Rousseau à Bernardin de Saint Pierre." Par Daniel Mornet. (Paris: Hachette. 7 fr. 50.)

"Physionomies Littéraires." Par Georges Rency. (Paris: Dechenne. 3 fr. 50.)

"Das Haus zur Flamme." Von Helene Boshlau. (Berlin: Fleischel. M. 5.)

"Richard Wagner's Religiöse Weltanschauung." Von Otto Schmiedel. (Tuebingen: Mohr.)

WILLIAMS & NORCATE

THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY NEW VOLUMES.

Now Ready. Demy 8vo.
10/6 net.

OUTLINES OF CHURCH HISTORY.

By H. VON SCHUBERT,
D.D.

With an Additional Chapter on Religious Thought and Life in England during the 19th Century, by Miss ALICE GARDNER, Cambridge.

Ready. Demy 8vo.
Cloth. 10/6 net. Vol. I.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

Its Writings and Teachings in their Historical Connections.

By OTTO PFLEIDERER,
Professor of Practical Theology in the University of Berlin.

Ready. 2 Vols. Demy
8vo. 10/6 each.

THE BEGINNINGS OF CHRISTIANITY.

By PAUL WERNLE,
Professor at the University of Basel.
Vol. I. The Rise of the Religion.
Vol. II. The Development of the Church.

Ready. Demy 8vo.
Cloth. 10/6 net.

Introduction to the CANONICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

By CARL CORNILL,
Professor of Old Testament Theology at the University of Breslau.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY NEW VOLUMES.

Ready. Crown 8vo.
Cloth. 5/.

THE APOLOGETIC OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Rev. E. F. SCOTT, M.A.,

of Prestwich, author of "The Fourth Gospel: Its Purpose and Theology.

Ready. Crown 8vo
Cloth. 5/.

THE HISTORICAL EVIDENCE FOR THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST.

By KIRSOPP LAKE,
M.A. (Oxon.),
Professor of N.T. Exegesis in the University of Leiden.

Ready. Crown 8vo.
Cloth. 6/.

NATURALISM AND RELIGION.

By RUDOLPH OTTO,
D.D. of (Göttingen). Translated by Prof. J. Arthur Thomson.
"Of the numerous works recently published dealing with the relations of scientific and religious thought, Dr. Otto's book is quite easily the best."— British Weekly.

Ready. 4/6.
ESSAYS ON THE SOCIAL GOSPEL.

By ADOLF HARNACK,
D.D., AND WILHELM HERRMANN,
Dr. Theol.

"Altogether the volume, which has been excellently translated, is well deserving the attention of English students of social and religious questions."—The Christian World.

Ready Now. 240 pages. 2s. 6d. net.; 2s. 9d. post free. Yearly Subscription, 10s. post free.

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL.

Principal Contents of January Number.

The Prospects of Modernism. By the Rev. GEORGE TYRRELL.

The Papal Encyclical. From a Catholic's Point of View. By the Rev. Father JOHN GERARD, S.J.

The Papacy in its Relation to American Ideals. By the Rev. L. HENRY SCHWAB.

The Catholic Church: What Is It? By the LORD BISHOP OF CARLISLE.

The Immortality of the Soul. I. The Transitory and the Permanent. By SIR OLIVER LODGE.

The Religion of Sensible Scotsmen. By WILLIAM WALLACE, LL.D.

The "Jerahmeel" Theory and the Historic Importance of the Negeb. By NATHANIEL SCHMIDT, Ph.D.

Religion a Necessary Constitution in all Education. By Professor J. H. MUIRHEAD.

The Sources of the Mystical Revelation. By Professor GEORGE ALBERT COE.

The Magic and Mysticism of To-day. By Mrs. STUART MOORE.

The Reasonableness of Christian Faith. By WM. ADAMS BROWN, Ph.D., DD.

The Alchemy of Thought. By L. P. JACKS.

With a Number of Discussions, Signed Reviews, and Bibliography of Recent Theological and Philosophical Literature.

WILLIAMS & NORCATE,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.

LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.: a Memoir.

By his WIFE. With portraits, large 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.
The Spectator says:—"In this modestly written, but most interesting book, Lady Wantage has raised a worthy monument to her husband's memory."

THE UNLUCKY FAMILY.

By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE. With 28 illustrations by E. T. Reed. 6s.

The World says:—"If any man likes to laugh till he can laugh no longer, let him take up 'The Unlucky Family.'"

THROUGH THE MAGIC DOOR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE. With 16 illustrations, crown 8vo, 5s.
The British Weekly says:—"A frank, pleasant, hearty, little book."

A HOLIDAY IN THE HAPPY VALLEY WITH PEN AND PENCIL.

By T. R. SWINBURNE, Major (late R.M.A.). With 24 Full-page Illustrations in Colour, and a Map, demy 8vo, 16s. net.
The Daily Telegraph says:—"A really delightful book."

Major Swinburne is author and artist too, and his sketches are so beautiful that we should have liked more."

NATURE'S MOODS AND TENSES.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. With 32 Illustrations, 7s. 6d.
net.

Punch says:—"Genial and informing. The observer of the phenomena of the fields and woods could not have a more agreeable guide than the golfing sage of Ashdown Forest."

THE LIFE OF CAVOUR.

By the Hon. EDWARD CADOGAN. With a Frontispiece, 7s. 6d.
net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Cadogan has managed to give us not only a vivid picture of the man, but has also contributed a valuable addition to our historical shelves."

PROSE IDYLS OF THE WEST RIDING.

By LADY CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"They are very natural and romantic, quietly pathetic, never rousing one to any great pitch of emotion, but ever pleasing with their charm."

JOHN HARVARD AND HIS TIMES.

By HENRY C. SHELLEY. With 24 Full-page Illustrations, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Westminster Gazette says:—"A notable example of constructive and conjectural biography."

A HISTORY OF THE MINORIES.

By the Rev. E. M. TOMLINSON. With 4 Portraits in Photo-gravure and 9 Half-tone Illustrations, demy 8vo, 18s. net.

The Tribune says:—"An admirable example of historical research, and should be read by every student of London's great past."

THE SOCIAL FETICH.

By LADY GROVE. With a Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 5s. net.

The Daily Chronicle says:—"Lady Grove is always entertaining.
She discourses with wit and wisdom, for she has a merry humour, and she has cultivated the habit of thought."

REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. Revised and Cheaper Edition, Considerably Enlarged. With 16 Illustrations, large post 8vo, 6s.

Punch says:—"Mr. Tuckwell's good things illumine every page, and are told with that brevity which is essential to success."

HUMOURS OF THE FRAY: Rhymes and Renderings:

By CHARLES L. GRAVES. Author of "The Hawarden Horace," &c. 3s. 6d. net.

MR. STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P., in the Freeman's Journal says:—"Comes nearer to the quality of satire than anything that has been seen of late."

POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

THE BROKEN ROAD. By A. E. W. MASON.
2nd Impression.

LAID UP IN LAVENDER. By STANLEY WEYMAN.
2nd Impression.

MY MERRY ROCKHURST. By AGNES and EGERTON
CASTLE.

HER LADYSHIP. By KATHARINE TYNAN.
2nd Impression.

THE AWAKENING OF BITTLESHAM.
2nd Impression.

By G. F. BRADBY.
FRAULEIN SCHMIDT and MR. ANSTRUTHER.
By the Author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Drama.

A MODERN "MYSTERY" PLAY.

LOVERS of Dickens—and those who read Dickens much attain, as a rule, a remarkable affection for him—have reason to dislike theatrical adaptations of his work. He was quite dramatic enough himself; he lived in the atmosphere of the theatre, and his work is full of the kind of dramatic convention that we call tableaux. Into these tableaux—these striking assemblages of characters in vivid relation to each other—he worked a kind of half-musical, descriptive commentary of his own, now comic, now tragic, nearly always grotesque, using as scenic accessories such material as the wild forces of Nature (especially the winds), or the strange abodes of obscure and forsaken men. When he combined with these powers of representation and criticism some moral purpose, as in his greater work he usually did, his art took on a very high kind of dramatic quality. In "Edwin Drood" he appeared to have no specially moral purpose, and his comic faculty seemed partly to fail him, for "Durdles" only resembles the great family of Dickensian eccentrics much as the hiccup of a drunken man recalls his whole personality. But in other respects this fragment is a brilliant example of Dickens's imaginative powers, and it testifies to his retention of the art of poetical writing. Nothing could have been more suggestive than the selection and treatment of materials. Dickens loved Rochester and the East End of London. In "Edwin Drood" he drew them together in subtle relationship, through the double life of John Jasper. The Cathedral Close and the opium den, Jasper's love of music and his depraved and secret character, his jealous and watchful passion and the fresh, rather silly, young figures around him, made a powerful and suggestive grouping for the story. As Dickens worked at it, he piled up new elements of mystery, which seemed at once to invite and to repel one solution or the other. Then he died, leaving everything in obscurity, and the unending series of guesses—Did Edwin Drood die? Who killed him, and how? Who was Datchery? and the rest—set in.

There the fragment might have been allowed to rest. But if it was revived and made the material for a melodrama, the finisher of the fragment could hardly have worked more successfully to the cancelling of its beauties of form and suggestion. In the novel, we do not know whether Drood was dead or alive, though one or two sentences in the interview between Datchery and the opium seller suggest that he survived as an instrument of vengeance on Jasper, and that Dickens was disposed to open afresh the vein he had tapped not too successfully in "Our Mutual Friend"—the idea, that is to say, of a man regarded as dead working out his life-story in the background and under an assumed name. But we may be sure that Dickens would have kept his mystery "in being." In the play we know everything after the almost burlesque night scene in Jasper's rooms. After that revelation nothing matters to the satiated audience. Mr. Tree, as Jasper, gasps and chokes and turns livid for nothing, cowers in the corner for nothing, faints heavily against much-suffering members of the cast for nothing, mesmerises or Svengalises Rosa Bud for nothing, tries to enmesh Neville Landless for nothing, cries "Murder" for nothing, gropes about the crypt and the grave, and is masterfully found out and tracked down by Mr. Grewgious for nothing, shows (under the limelight) sullen tortured eyes, and exchanges them for sad and peaceful ones, for nothing, absurdly confesses in Crisparkle's drawing-room a crime which he did not commit for nothing, is touched by Christmas carolling outside his window for nothing, and finally says "Adieu, my love, for evermore" (bis) for nothing, and less than nothing. For the people in His Majesty's Theatre, having seen Edwin Drood slip out of Jasper's room after watching his amiable friend rehearsing (under opium) the murder which Jasper thinks he is committing, only waits the appropriate moment for Edwin's reappearance. All the imaginative adornment of the "Mystery of Edwin Drood" has been destroyed.

And with it, everything else of larger dramatic value has gone too. Jasper's obscure wickedness, set in the midst of innocence and sleepy church-going piety, stands in the centre of Dickens's picture. When it disappears, and we see a dying (and drivelling) sentimentalist in his stead, hardly one feature of interest, except the pretty scenery about the Cathedral and its Close, remains. The slighter characters of the play, not being over-endowed with life by Dickens, are dolls—Rosa, a small, very pretty doll (charmingly suggesting the "Dora" of "David Copperfield"); Helena Landless, a large, handsome doll; Durdles, a kind of gollywog; Mr. Grewgious, a chattering busybody of a doll. The fine scene, written with concentrated vigour, where Grewgious tells Jasper of his fatal error concerning the relations of Rosa Bud and Edwin, is practically dissipated in the stage version. And barely a touch of distinction remains to the dialogue, from which the meaning passages seem to have been eliminated. The novel, melodramatic as it is, gathers itself up as it goes along for a powerful, obviously difficult, development. The play has one element of real ingenuity, which solves one or two minor difficulties of the original. This is the idea of using Jasper's dream-trances, in which he continually acts the contemplated murder, as a means of getting Edwin Drood off the stage, before bringing him on again. But this again destroys the mystery, and after it the piece gasps and droops along to the absurdity of its forced termination.

Compare such a melodrama to a work by a vastly inferior writer, "The Bells." In "The Bells" at least there was a dramatic, even a moral, interest. There was an acted, mysterious, cunningly devised crime, present not only to the minds of the audience, but to the mind's eye of the tortured criminal. On that spectacle, as on the madness of the hero in the "Ajax," or the remorse of Lady Macbeth—all the light is turned, and goes on burning more and more brightly. Irving's subtle intellectuality gave all sorts of interesting expression to the emotions which he tried to represent—fear, cunning, calculation, a haunted mind and conscience, perpetually turned back on the evil deed by chance events, or its own brooding imagination. None of these higher elements exist in the play at His Majesty's Theatre. Mr. Tree indeed seems to have been stimulated by Irving's rendering of the dream in "The Bells" as he enacts (in trance) the murder and burial of Edwin Drood. But he employs nothing like the same range of intellectual and physical forces. He has a fine presence, his voice is capable both of depth and of softness, and his make-up closely suggests Dickens's picture of John Jasper, though in the first act it also accidentally recalls the late Mr. Wilde. But in action Mr. Tree seems only to use his eyes (the lime-light man kindly assisting) and his arms. The voice and its inflections suggest little. He poses rather than plays. His face shows with some skill the conventional change from a sinister Jasper to a repentant and softened one, dying (still in limelight) in Edwin's and Rosa's embrace. But, just as the dialogue gives him no chance, and the play no chance, his conception of character-acting is lower than that of his predecessor, Irving. And so, we are afraid, are his choice and treatment of dramatic material. Irving's selection was none of the best. But what business has Mr. Tree, with his undoubted talent and position, his fine theatre and his popular vogue, with such a play as "The Mystery of Edwin Drood"? And what can be the intellectual character, what the degree of artistic training and feeling, of an audience that can applaud and enjoy such work?

M.

Poetry.

TO THE WORLD AND A POET A THOUSAND YEARS HENCE.

I.

I WHO am dead a thousand years
And wrote this sweet archaic song,
Send living men these messengers
Down through the night: and night is long.

I fear, O princely race of men,
That still you doubt, as heretofore,
And die, not knowing where or when,
And hope to learn a little more.

How shall man alter? Like a wind
That falls at eve, his fancies blow.
Alas, Maenides the blind
Knew that three thousand years ago.

Nothing to me what palaces
You build, or what new dress you wear,
Or if you sail beneath the seas,
Or ride in triumph through the air.

For still your thieves grip fast the gold,
Your good men plod their sulky way:
The roses fade: the girls grow old:
The children have no holiday.

But have you converse, wine, and song,
And statues, and a bright-eyed Love,
And foolish thoughts of right and wrong,
And prayers to them that sit above?

II.

Thou student of our English tongue
Who readest this at night, alone,
Art thou a poet, art thou young,
Dear friend, unseen, unborn, unknown?

Since I can never see thy face,
And never shake thee by the hand,
I send my soul through time and space
To greet thee: thou wilt understand.

Thou standest far, and cloudy Time
With ghostly pageant fills the air
Between us: yet this tinkling rhyme
Endureth till the world despair.

The warrior Sun may fail us soon,
Forgetful of his lucid might,
The myriad children of the Moon
May one by one put out their light.

But till beside his blackening spheres
The wings of Time be folded fast,
'Till there are none to count the years
The murmur of our loves shall last.

JAMES FLECKER.

Art.

OLD MASTERS AT BURLINGTON HOUSE.

THE winter Exhibition at Burlington House is one of the best arranged and most piquant in interest that has been provided for some time. Its character is the same as that of last year, which is to say that it consists of a little bit of nearly everything with a good deal of one or two things, and, as before, the pictures are disposed in rough chronological order. The special features are the Hogarth and Zoffany and the Hook rooms. A number of the first-named's "conversation" pieces are gathered together in the gallery which is devoted in the summer to water-colours, while Room V. contains a representative collection of works by the latest "deceased master" of the British School. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to say more about these Hookscapes than that they include the famous "Luff Boy" and "The Return of Torello," painted in 1852, which is not a Hookscape at all but a would-be classical composition from Boccaccio—an interesting example, nevertheless, of early Victorian endeavour. Here also is Millais' portrait of the painter. The Hogarths vary a good deal in size and quality. Although all are interesting to the connoisseur, one is disposed to give decided preference to the smaller "interiors with figures," not only on account of their subjects, but because their execution solves so many of the modern painter's problems. One or two of the larger family groups are rather a shock to those who have judged Hogarth's excellence as a portrait painter by the National Gallery portrait of himself and one or two equally famous examples. In "The Graham Family," particularly, the achievement of petrified expression could hardly go further. The four children represented in attitudes hypothetically animated are puppets out of a box of toys rather than the offspring of eighteenth century parents, less real than the inanimate playthings among which they are supposed to be enjoying themselves.

Reynolds makes a brave show in Gallery III. The portrait of the Countess of Carnarvon and her son, finely designed and rich in its glowing brown and amber tones, and the "Mrs. Croftes"—in a red and green-shot silk dress—please one more than the more grandiloquent and less sincere portraits with mythological embellishments, of which there are a few examples. The collection, however, serves on the whole to emphasise the gap between this artist and George Romney in a fashion greatly to the injury of the latter. Last year, Romney was but poorly represented. This, the specimens of his art are almost a blot upon the exhibition. A blatant colour scheme such as that displayed by the portrait of Mrs. Birch in Room IV. takes one's breath away; the canvas is only redeemed from sheer vulgarity by a certain grace in design. Gainsborough, on the contrary, easily holds his own, though there are no great Gainsboroughs. The anonymous "Portrait of a Gentleman" (No. 165) is the most complete specimen of his maturity, while among the Hogarths and Zoffanys a curious outdoor group of the Pitt family is ascribed to his brush. George Pitt, Lord Rivers, who must not be confused with the family of Pitt, the statesman, was undoubtedly one of Gainsborough's patrons, but there are reasons for questioning the attribution of this work to the painter. One may observe that the style of painting is very close, and though this is not inconsistent with what we know of Gainsborough's early methods, it was a style that he was quick to discard. Now the date of this picture is given as about 1760, which is that of Gainsborough's removal from Ipswich to Bath. By that time he was thirty-three years of age and it is not to be supposed that Gainsborough had not then begun to develop the more liquid and easy handling that distinguishes the art of his prime. What remains of his early work at Bath supports this contention. If therefore this is an early Gainsborough, the date 1760 is obviously an error. At the same time, in spite of its extreme naïveté and lack of vital quality, it has points of beauty and interest in its defects. The simplicity has charm. There is a kind of decorative grace in the grouping of the flatly painted figures in their sober raiment. Whosoever may be the painter, the work stands confessed as an early work; but it is also the work of an artist with an eye for balance and the courage for that straightforward statement of fact which must inevitably precede his power of expressing poetic fancy. In some respects the "Pitt Family" recalls Zoffany, but the development it promises is not that which one associates with this painstaking craftsman's later efforts.

Pursuing the British School, one finds two moderate examples of Raeburn; his "Andrew Wauchope, Esqre," a refined, almost mysterious, realisation, is happier than the more audacious, one might say more Raeburnesque, "Mrs. Home Drummond." But the gem of the fourth room, where these are hung, is a View of Norwich by John Crome—landscape in its perfection of mellow sunlight, with a church-tower cutting the sky-line in its very centre. More than a pity that the panel on which this is painted is so badly cracked as to cause a disfigurement. A broad, intensely luminous "Windmills in the Marshes," represents John Sell Cotman; an incident of light, life, and the poetry of nature. It is really to these incidents, scattered throughout the exhibition, these one or two works by painters not as fully represented as many others, that one owes the greater part of this winter show's attraction. The Fragonard "Portrait of Chardin" may be described as an incident of the third gallery, which is infinitely grateful. The very virtuosity of this small head and bust is refreshing after Romney's vapid "Countess of Westmorland" which hangs next door. Rembrandt's "Portrait of a Man" is another. The sole example of this master, it is clearly a portrait of his son Titus, and equally clearly a genuine Rembrandt, painted in the late and rich manner. Two surprising portraits by Sustermans, of a man and a woman respectively, introduce a seventeenth-century artist of whom, probably, the larger British public has never heard before. Yet the strident representation of an imperious Spaniard, ablaze with red and gold trappings, would not shame Velasquez, and the more sedate young woman in the stiff black dress of the period is painted with an intimité foreign to many better-known artists of the same school. A Tintoret "Portrait of a Man" in a dark dress, probably authentic but badly repainted, comes from the Duke of Northumberland's collection, and there is a marvellous "Rubens," the "Queen Esther before Ahasuerus," which suggests a school picture considerably worked upon by a very much later hand. The big and only Van Dyke on the same wall is a version of the Windsor picture of "King Charles I. and His Family," but beyond its historic interest as a "greate piece of our royal self, consort and children"—as the Privy Seal warrant describes it—its size is out of proportion to its impressiveness. Portraits by Albert Cuyp are rarely seen in this country, and the Academy is fortunate in having secured Mr. Standen's "Portrait of a Man"—a surprisingly fine example. The "Soldiers Quarrelling," attributed to Antonio and Louis Le Nain, and a portrait of Gabrielle de Bourbon by François Clouet might be taken to represent the early French School and its development upon the Netherlandish line, and there is a room full of early Italian and Flemish pictures, which provides ample food for the attribution-monger's activities.

The British water-colours in the Black and White Room are representative but not exciting. They serve, however, to put the finishing touch to the spring-cleaning of one's artistic conscience, which this exhibition is destined to promote.

Reviews.

THE CREED OF THE CATHOLIC LIBERAL.*

II.

ACTON was a convinced and indeed an ardent Liberal. But "his Liberalism was above all things historical, and rested on a consciousness of the past." He saw the value of the constitutionalism of the Middle Ages, and of much of the teaching of medieval theologians as to citizenship and the State. He did not, perhaps, make sufficient allowance for the "survival" nature of these theories; or remember that, like the Conciliar system, they had proved unworkable. Hence the various absolutisms; government in Church and State had to be carried on. His political ideal was to secure its precise weight, neither less nor more, to every individual or association forming part of the community, and to hinder any institution, secular or sacred, from acquiring greater. The federal principle, consequently, appealed to him. Each of the several Estates of the Realm had its place and function; their efficient working brought about the harmony of the whole. He was for the South in the American Civil War; and his sympathy with the Italian Risorgimento was qualified. He made much of precedent and prescription; he advocated local liberties rather than centralisation; he feared mob law. Absolutism, whether under popular or monarchical forms, was hateful to him; but he thought the former the more mischievous of the two; the tyranny of the many is more oppressive, because its pressure is more continuous and less easily resisted, than that of the one or the few. He was right: no one discerned the tendencies of political life more acutely. What he did not always see was that the past, as past, does not return. It enters into the present—which, were it not so would be inconceivable—but it enters rather as atmosphere than as a formula; here, as so often, the letter defeats its own end. To forget this is to miss half the lesson of history. Federalism, the plurality of Estates, or, to take a modern instance, Cavour's Free Church in a Free State, presuppose an imperfectly moralised community. The community is, and is likely to remain for long, imperfectly moralised; hence their justification and necessity. But this justification and necessity are relative: in proportion as the State advances towards consciousness and spirituality they disappear.

Again he looked at politics from the standpoint rather of a constitutional lawyer than of a statesman. That men like Mazzini and Cavour fell short of Kant's famous standard; that their acts were not laws for action in general, may be granted. They fought, like the Apostle, with beasts; and in such a warfare scruples were out of place. Right, in the mouths of rulers whose government was "a negation of God," was the last infamy; the outrage that crowned their crime.

The same punctiliousness marks his earlier—not his later—treatment of intolerance. Catholic persecution was political, he tells us in an essay published (1862) in the "Rambler"; Protestant, religious. There is more to be learned from Acton's errors than from other men's accuracy. But the former statement is very partially correct; and the latter, so far as it is justified, holds good only of the first stage of the Reformation. The Reformed theology was, at this period, incomplete. A creation ad hoc, its limitations were those of the medieval teaching from which it came out, bound like Lazarus. But from the first it had in itself the promise of a fuller life. Quod illis est Papa, nobis est scriptura. Where this was admitted, the larger Protestantism was at the door.

The controversies in which Acton was engaged, roughly speaking from the publication of the Syllabus of Pius IX. (1864) till after the Vatican Council, were in substance a conflict between the theological and the scientific spirit. Their result was the victory of the former in the Roman Catholic Church, and the consequent accentuation of the already wide gulf between that Church and the educated

* I. "The History of Freedom and Other Essays." By Lord Acton. Edited, with an Introduction, by John Neville Figgis, M.A., and Reginald Vere Laurence, M.A. Macmillan. 10s.

II. "Historical Essays and Studies." By Lord Acton. Edited by John Neville Figgis, M.A., and Reginald Vere Laurence, M.A. Macmillan. 10s.

lay world. In secular science the tendency to stereotyping, common to every system of thought, is corrected by touch with the actual; in physics, medicine, &c., the facts are under our eyes and force themselves upon our notice; theory and life cannot fall far out of step. In theology, as the Catholic Church understands it, this is not so. Its premisses are certain decisions, Papal and Conciliar, dating often centuries back; Scripture, interpreted by patristic and medieval writers; ecclesiastical tradition, brought into harmony with existing usage—the whole fixed and abstract; and on this foundation the ingenuity of divines works unchecked by criticism, impervious to new knowledge, remote from the real. The condemnations of the Syllabus and the Definition of 1870 were inevitable. These positions were contained in the premisses and could only be resisted successfully by men who were prepared to revise these premisses. The Liberals, with few exceptions, were unwilling or unable to revise them; this inconsistency was the rock on which Liberal Catholicism split. Acton was the protagonist of the Opposition; and its defeat was the tragedy of his life. In his criticism of actual Catholicism he went further than most of his colleagues. The records of the Papacy had no secrets for him; he knew the fraud by which its domination had been developed, and the bloodshed by which its rule was stained. He had not, however, specialised in Christian origins—the history of dogma and institutions during the first two centuries. This marks his position off from that of later Modernism, and made a qualified submission possible. "I do not reject—which is all the Council requires under its extreme sanctions," he wrote in 1874. His attitude probably was that which he attributes to the dissentient bishops, who, having renewed their negative vote in writing, left Rome before the public session of July 18th.

"Looking to the immediate future, they were persuaded that an irresistible reaction was at hand, and that the decrees of the Vatican Council would fade away and be dissolved by a power mightier than the Episcopate and a process less perilous than schism. Their disbelief in the validity of its work was so profound that they were convinced that it would perish without violence, and they resolved to spare the Pope and themselves the indignity of a rupture. Their last manifesto, "La dernière Heure," is an appeal for patience, an exhortation to rely on the guiding healing hand of God. They deemed that they had assigned the course which was to save the Church, by teaching Catholics to reject a Council which was neither legitimate in constitution, free in action, nor unanimous in doctrine; but to observe moderation in contesting an authority over which great catastrophes impend. They conceived that it would then be possible to save the peace and unity of the Church without sacrifice of faith and reason."

Suave mari magno. It was an ambiguous path; and, so far at least, it cannot be said that events have confirmed the anticipation of the eminent men who trod it. In Acton's case, however, his studies and his temperament combined to make it not impossible.

"It was part of his religion to live much in the past, to realise every phase of thought, every crisis of controversy, every stage of progress the Church has gone through. So that the events and ideas of his own day lost much of their importance in comparison, were old friends with new faces, and impressed him less than the multitude of those that were before."

A lesser man would have been crushed or soured by his failure, and by what it involved. He was neither. Some of his best and most mature work was done after 1870. He abandoned direct controversy; convinced that the study of the past was the key to the amelioration of the present, he taught indirectly; for him history reflected the actual, the problems of to-day were anticipated in those of a bygone age. Some of his most careful work was casual. In 1877 he addressed to a local literary society the remarkable lectures on the History of Freedom in Antiquity and in Christianity respectively, which, till the publication of the volumes before us, lay buried in a provincial paper. He has left nothing more full of insight and accurate thinking. On the theory and practice of the State:—

"In ancient times the State absorbed authorities not its own, and intruded on the domain of personal freedom. In the Middle Ages it possessed too little authority, and suffered others to intrude. Modern States fall habitually into both excesses."

On Liberty:—

"By Liberty, I mean the assurance that every man shall be protected in doing what he believes to be his duty against the influence of authority and majorities, custom and opinion.

The most certain test by which we judge whether a country is really free is the amount of security enjoyed by minorities."

Of the teaching of Machiavelli:—

"It gave an immense impulse to absolutism by silencing the conscience of very religious kings, and made the good and the bad very much alike. Charles V. offered 5,000 crowns for the murder of an enemy. Ferdinand I. and Ferdinand II., Henry III., and Louis XIII., each caused his most powerful subject to be treacherously despatched. Elizabeth and Mary Stuart tried to do the same to each other. The way was paved for absolute monarchy to triumph over the spirit and institutions of a better age, not by isolated acts of wickedness, but by a studied philosophy of crime and so thorough a perversion of the moral sense that the like of it had not been since the Stoics reformed the morality of paganism. . . . Calvin preached and Bellarmine lectured; but Machiavelli reigned."

His output during the early years of this period was small. Between 1877 and 1885 the Bibliography published for the Royal Historical Society shows only one review; the Cambridge edition gives fourteen after the latter date. The Lectures on Modern History were delivered 1899-1901; the Inaugural Lecture dates back to 1895; these, with a promised volume on the French Revolution, complete his academic record. It would, however, be a mistake to judge him by his published work alone. His power was wider, deeper, more penetrating. No one did as much as he to naturalise among us the conception of history as a science; to rescue it from the antiquarian, the writer of romance, the political or ecclesiastical partisan. No historical student of our generation has escaped his influence; and it is safe to say that this influence will increase rather than diminish as time goes on. That this is so is due as much to his character as to his learning; what moves us in him is something more than erudition or idiosyncrasy; it is his balance, his judicial temper, his virtue itself. Some of his aphorisms on the ethics of history and historians may be cited.

"A historian has to fight against temptations special to his mode of life, temptations from Country, Class, Church, College, Party, Authority of Talents, solicitation of friends. The most reputable of these influences are the most dangerous.

"The historian who neglects to root them out is exactly like a juror who votes according to his personal likes and dislikes.

"In judging men and things Ethics go before Dogma, Politics, or Nationality. The Ethics of History cannot be denominational.

"The notion and analysis of conscience is scarcely older than 1700; and the notion and analysis of veracity is scarcely older than our own time, barring sacred writings of East and West.

"In Christendom time and place do not excuse.

"Good and evil lie close together. Seek no artistic unity in character.

"The principles of public morality are as definite as those of the morality of private life, but they are not identical.

"Of killing from private motives or from public, from political or religious, eadem est ratio. Morally, the last is the worst. The source of crime is pars melior nostri, what ought to save destroys: the sinner is hardened and proof against repentance."

H. F.

A PRECIS OF THE LATE REIGN.*

Two general criticisms suggest themselves on the scheme which this twelfth volume of the "Political History of England" represents. The first is that the authors have been asked to cover too vast and too crowded a territory; the second that, by an accident, the most vivid light has been thrown on the middle period of their researches since their own dealing with it was completed. The authors of Vol. XI. were only assigned the first thirty-seven years of the nineteenth century. Mr. Low and Mr. Sanders have been charged with the sixty-four years of the Victorian period, i.e., with some of the most rapid, eventful, and distracting passages of the national and Imperial life, and with those that can least be seen in their due perspective. This is a stupendous task. It leaves little scope, even in a volume of nearly five hundred pages, for the reflective and truly critical work in which Mr. Sidney Low excels, and reduces the undertaking to a series of "views" in which personalities and events appear in something of the shimmering, delusive glare of the cinematograph. Thus the vast theme of the literature and social development of the late reign is compressed within rather more than thirty closely packed pages, of which Labour and Trade Unionism together can claim a little over two.

*"The Political History of England." In twelve volumes. Volume XII., 1837-1901. By Sidney Low and L. G. Sanders. Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.

Under these conditions the writers have accomplished the only kind of success open to them. They have produced an admirable hand-book; a lucid, closely balanced, judicious, and highly serviceable historical précis. They have not aimed at distinction, for it has not been open to them. The more brilliant personalities of the reign—Palmerston, Disraeli, Gladstone, Macaulay, Ruskin, Carlyle—can be enumerated, hardly described; the more massive ones—Mill, Spencer, Darwin, Kelvin, and the practical scientists and Empire makers—with the great sum and weight of their adventures and achievements, can only be hastily catalogued. The history, with its many admirable qualities and practical uses, is like an over-crowded map; great centres of activity cannot be sufficiently distinguished from the lesser ones. In our view, the history should have stopped with 1868, the opening year of modern Liberalism.

A second misfortune has attended the book; and that is the appearance of the supremely important volumes disclosing the Queen's political correspondence with her fellow-Sovereigns and her Ministers from 1837 to 1861. These disclosures render necessary a second edition of the book; for they reduce the value of some of its conclusions, firm and sound as they are on the evidence known to its authors. Popular opinion did not, as is suggested, over-estimate the interferences of the Court; it was unaware of their extent and seriousness. We can no longer accept the verdict on the Palmerston-Russell foreign policy of the mid-century which Mr. Low and Mr. Sanders inevitably base on their reading of the "Life of the Prince Consort" and the reserved memoirs of the period. It no longer suffices, for example, to trace Palmerston's forced resignation in 1851 mainly to the Cabinet's "exhausted patience" with his "escapades," or to Lord John Russell's jealous rivalry. The direct and most powerful factor in that event was the action of the late Queen and Prince Albert—the active instrument, in succession to Leopold and Stockmar, of her prepossessions in foreign policy. Only a few weeks earlier Russell had remonstrated with her for her Austrian policy and her indifference to public opinion, and had defended Palmerston's aims and even methods. Palmerston's language to our Ambassador in Paris was conveyed to the Queen by an underground and bitterly feminine communication from Lady Normanby, and her resentment of it preceded by a day Lord John Russell's demand for explanations, and set it on foot. The Queen's and the Prince Consort's exulting comments on Palmerston's fall, and Lady John Russell's letter regretting the separation of two men who were essentially agreed on foreign politics, disclose the main character of the incident. It presents itself as the crowning event in a long, able, and incessantly varied attack on Palmerston by the Queen, now and then directed against meddlesomeness and real breaches of prudence and etiquette, but inspired in the main by her dynastic prejudices, her Austrian sympathies, and her hatred of the Italian cause. When the rôles were reversed eight years later, and Russell was Foreign Secretary and Palmerston Prime Minister, the Queen pursued Russell as she had pursued Palmerston, in maintenance of her unbending preference for Austrian autocracy, and her resentment of the new element in European politics—that of a popular and national choice of sovereignty. This German view of the Monarchy yielded on occasion to a true and keen regard for the national interest, but it was her main motive, and it received continuous and passionate expression. In the light of the second and third volumes of the Queen's letters, our authors' judgments on the events of 1848-51, and of 1859-60 can hardly stand without either addition or qualification.

We will add one or two small criticisms of our own. On the whole, the book strikes us as fair and calm in judgment. The treatment of the first Gladstone Government is sympathetic, that of the highly important subject of Gladstonian finance fair but meagre. We do not feel quite content on other and later party issues. We do not pretend to see how any belief in Lord Lytton's sagacity can survive the breakdown and complete reversal of his disastrous policy towards Afghanistan; nor, we think, do Mr. Low and his colleague realise the worthlessness of the settlement of Near Eastern affairs arrived at by the Berlin Congress. We agree with the general praise of Lord Salisbury's foreign policy, one of the most materially successful episodes of the Queen's reign, and the least inspiring. But we doubt his leadership of the Concert in the matter of Crete, though he undoubtedly mitigated its anti-Greek bias. Mr. Gladstone's declaration for Home Rule in face of the deadlock in party government created by the exact balance of forces at the Election of 1885 is set down largely to personal ambition and passion for great adventure. Mr. Morley's impressive description of the immense responsibility of the Liberal leader, treading, as he did, ground deeply mined by the Conservative intrigues with Parnell, might, we think, have been more carefully considered, and the slight but perceptible Unionist bias of the whole narrative have been modified. We do not judge that Bright's oratory is characteristically described as a "rushing torrent" of "impassioned rhetoric"; its flow was usually composed, its note severe rather than passionate. Nor does the reference to Parnell's austere aloofness from his following apply to his earlier career as a leader; it was rather developed as the balance of his character was lost, and shyness developed into morbid pride and isolation. But on the whole, the personal appreciations, necessarily restrained within conventional limits, are sound and good. We select an illuminating contrast between Gladstone and Disraeli which illustrates the writers' tone and standard of criticism more thoroughly perhaps than any other citation that we could choose:—

"With much opportunism and much of merely personal ambition, both responded to a genuine and deep-seated sentiment that called for expression; Disraeli brought back to English politics the spirit of romance, while Gladstone vindicated the claims of righteousness. In each the predominant feeling led to errors: Disraeli could sometimes be justly charged with tawdriness and theatricality; Gladstone's fine-drawn morality often degenerated into unctuousness. Two different aspects of national development appealed to them with vague force: Gladstone, the political legatee of Peel, was at his best with some complicated problem of legislation or finance; his rival, who looked back to Chatham and Bolingbroke, was intent on maintaining the unique position of England among the nations. The Liberals, under Gladstone, became more closely identified with economic government, and with those reforms which tended towards the abolition of privilege and political inequality; the Conservatives, taught by Disraeli, found their main interest in a vigorous foreign policy, and the growth of the Imperialist idea. With all his acuteness, Disraeli sometimes misunderstood the British people; and Gladstone occasionally forgot the British Empire."

Finally, we confess ourselves puzzled by the colouring of the annexed political maps, and we deplore the restriction of capital letters (in the main) to names of persons and places.

MUTHER'S HISTORY OF PAINTING.*

PROFESSOR MUTHER, of Breslau, has done a great work in writing his "History of Modern Painting." The book really ought to be called "European Painting in the Nineteenth Century." Whoever has attempted to grapple with the problem of art in the nineteenth century knows what a Herculean task it presents. And no fair critic can read the three volumes dealing with that subject by the German historian without paying the highest tribute to the wide range of his knowledge, the penetration of his insight, the thoroughness of his search for facts and his power of marshalling them, and the perseverance with which he has welded them into a continuous account still possessing unity and composition. However keen and true the scientific spirit with which the historian approaches the work and the spirit of an age so near to us, there must necessarily be a personal touch in his estimate of that which is, after all, still a part of himself, or, of which, rather, he remains a part. The author felt this, and consciously embodies it

* "The History of Modern Painting." By Professor Richard Muther. 3 Vols. Dent.

"The History of Painting from the Fourth to the Early Nineteenth Century." By Professor Richard Muther. 2 Vols. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 21s. net.

in the general method and character of his work. In his preface to the first edition of "The History of Modern Painting" he says: "What will be said here lays claim to no objective validity. As, like Zola, I conceive a work of art to be 'a piece of nature seen through the medium of a temperament,' so in my book I shall give no more than a piece of art-history seen through the medium of a temperament."

A striking feature of the new edition is the introduction of a considerable number of coloured prints. Some of these are decidedly good, while others necessarily fail to give the delicacy of tones possessed by the originals. We are glad to see that the beginning is made in an attempt to convey an idea of colour into the text-books on painting, not so much because of what is actually achieved now, but because we venture to hold that when once the beginning is made, the improvement of the technique will advance so rapidly, that in a not distant period we may hope for adequacy in illustration in this direction, as photography has helped us in giving the true rendering of drawing and composition.

Illustrations will, after all, ever remain one of the most important features in any text-book dealing with art. Considering the comparative cheapness with which by modern processes adequate illustrations can be provided, we think that in such general histories more space ought to be given to illustrations, and the important masters ought to be more fully presented by their work. We miss, for instance, illustrations of the work of Boucher and Fragonnard when Watteau is so well represented. But we specially feel the paucity of illustration in the shorter and newer work on "The History of Painting from the Fourth to the Earlier Nineteenth Century." Each illustration here generally occupies a full page. Surely smaller blocks might well have been introduced into the text with greater profusion in order to give a more vivid idea of the character of the great artist whose leading style is so admirably compressed into a few words in the letterpress. We have heard such a book as M. Salomon Reinach's "Apollo" depreciatingly characterised as a catalogue raisonné. Such criticism is distinctly unjust. We only wish there were more such catalogues raisonnés before the public. Such smaller illustrations give an accurate idea of the main features of the work, do more to train the power of observation of the student and to familiarise him with the works of the great masters than pages of excellent letterpress. To those who are familiar with the originals they act as most vivid reminders.

We have spoken of the personal touch in Professor Muther's historical work; yet it would be quite misleading were this to be presented as the leading characteristic of his method. His is distinctly the historical method. Art is to him an organic part of the spirit and the achievement of each age. In some ages, as in the Renaissance in Italy, it is perhaps the most characteristic feature. In every case, however, the true historian of art can raise it to a very high position in the life of the past and make it an essential feature in the proper understanding of each age. He must, then, insist upon the organic quality, the unity, of the historical manifestations of each age, whatever aspect of the past we may for the time being chiefly consider. What the German call Kultur-Geschichte, and its true significance to the student of the past, has perhaps not been sufficiently realised by our English historians; while our writers on art have often been carried away by too one-sided and exclusive an attempt to dwell upon the biographical, the technical, or even the ethical aspect of art, ignoring its organic relation to the life out of which it rose and which it so potently reflects. Who, for instance, can understand the romantic movement in the French art of the early nineteenth century in contradistinction to the Davidian classicism, the work of a Gericault, Ingres, Delacroix, without studying it in its vital relation to the movement of the time, the political and social life of France in the first half of the nineteenth century, the literature of the period in a Chateaubriand, in Victor Hugo, in De Musset, in Gautier, in Balzac? The same applies to the romantic movement in Germany. It applies to every period of art. In fulfilling this task of the historian of art Professor Muther is admirable.

For one feature in Muther's history of modern art we Englishmen have reason to be especially grateful to the author. He has established in his general account the due importance of English painting in its position in modern art. He has not only remained content with demonstrating the importance of Constable and English landscape painters for the development of that art in France and throughout Europe; but he has properly placed in the foremost rank our great painters of the end of the eighteenth century, and our leading artists in the nineteenth century. The people of the Continent, even the most cultured among them, have never realised properly the Kultur-Geschichte of England in modern times. We have often been amused by the patronising tone of men eminent in science and literature in Germany and France when, while emphasising the importance of our political and social achievements, they have referred to our literature since the Elizabethan age, and especially to our art. Byron they know; Shelley, Keats, not to speak of Browning and Tennyson, they can rarely appreciate. But it is only of late years that they are beginning to realise the leading position which our great painters must necessarily hold in the history of art from the end of the eighteenth century down to our day. No doubt it is chiefly owing to our insularity that we are so little known and appreciated. We have never cared much for the opinion of "foreigners." The chief reason, however, is to be found in the fact that we have always been too wealthy. We bought pictures on the Continent and bought our own pictures at home, and we kept them here. The Gainsboroughs and Reynoldses, the Hoppners and Romneys, the Constables and Turners, the Cromes and David Coxes, and the scores of other names that we could mention, we never offered to the Continental market. From this point of view we think it a mistake that a hue and cry is raised whenever any great work of art of the English School leaves this country. We are far from advocating the denudation of this country of its great art treasures. Charity must begin at home; but it need not stay at home. Provided in our national galleries—not only in the metropolis, but in our provincial museums as well—our great artists are adequately represented, why should not some of our best works go abroad and diffuse their refining influence among the "barbarians," and why should we not care to maintain our rightful position in the estimation of the world? And as to the present day, why should we not create a foreign market for our living artists? We know how much fashion will do. Anglomanie in the past began with the horse, and penetrated through dress to domestic furniture. At this moment English furniture has penetrated into the most distant districts of the Continent. There may be the same possibility for the works of our painters. Some day, perhaps, when the importance of education will be realised through the covering haze of religious dissension, the Ministry of Education may become as important a part of our Government as the Treasury, the War Office, and the Admiralty now are; and then perhaps there may be a Department of Fine Arts in that Ministry which may set itself the task of opening out the avenues of foreign markets to our artists.

C. WALDSTEIN.

SALMON AND SALMON-FISHING.*

At what age do the young salmon leave the rivers for the sea? How far into the sea do they go? When do they come back to the fresh water? Is their return invariably to the streams in which they were born? What are the rates of their growth in size and in weight? These questions puzzled fishermen and naturalists for a very long time. Every year at certain seasons, parr, the young salmon, were seen to be moving down the rivers; and every year, at other seasons, grown-up fish, grilse and salmon, were seen to be running up. It was generally supposed that the adolescent fish, some of them weighing as much as ten pounds, must be the very fish that weighed two ounces when they went to sea not more than a year before, and that the larger salmon were fish which had made the grand tour more than once. The difficulty in the way of certainty lay in the lack of means of identification. Clipping a fin of a parr was not an infallible means of gaining knowledge. It was more than possible that when the fish was caught again the fin would have grown complete. In 1903 the difficulty was overcome by Mr. P. D. Malloch, Perth, who had each of many hundreds of Tay parr marked by a bit of thin silver wire fixed to the dorsal fin. Since then facts have been gleaned in such abundance that Mr. Calderwood, who, being Inspector of Salmon Fisheries for Scotland, has the statistics at his hand, is now able to answer all the questions we have stated. He does so in lucid chapters which are highly interesting.

* "The Life of the Salmon: With Reference more Especially to the Fish in Scotland." By W. L. Calderwood, F.R.S.E. Edward Arnold, 7s. 6d. net.

The questions referred to, however, are elementary. The most important passages in Mr. Calderwood's book are those which have bearing on his remark that "the general principle at the root of all salmon-fishery legislation has been to counteract the natural tendency of man to overfish, to capture fish at a harmful time, or in a harmful way, or to erect engines which obstructed the ascent of salmon and facilitated their capture in undue numbers." We must all do what we can to put an end to practices which, as old Scots statutes say, "destroy the breed of fish and hurt the common profite of the realme." One of these practices, on certain rivers, such as those of the Border region, is fishing beyond the middle of October. The theory on which Parliament sanctions this is that certain rivers are late by nature. It is plausible. Each salmon-river has its own tribe of fish; think of five or six rivers, and you will find that the autumn migrations from the sea are certainly not simultaneous; those of the Tweed country, for example, are about a month later than those of Tayside. Now, the theory is false. A salmon river becomes early or late just as man chooses to determine. The after-summer migration is by nature early in all rivers. It goes on for a good many weeks; but it begins with the mid-August floods. What is to happen if the nets are allowed to be at work almost until the fish are ready to spawn? Nothing less than ruin eventually is to be expected. The late rivers are late simply because the August, September, and October fish have been gradually rendered well-nigh extinct. As Mr. Calderwood says, "If the amount of netting in confined waters was reduced and the remaining nets wisely regulated, the earliest-running fish would be allowed to remain in better proportion, and the spawning season would in time harmonise with the normal. A long belt of netting in a river renders the weekly close-time inoperative: all early fish are captured, and only late-running fish remain to keep up the stock." The natural and only remedy for lateness, that is to say, is an earlier close of the season. Mr. Calderwood deserves to be much congratulated on the insight which led him to this discovery.

It is true that there is a trouble in the way towards making it immediately fruitful. We have always a flood just before or about the middle of August; but it is soon past, and in many a year there is no considerable fall of rain until long afterwards. Thus most of the rivers are for many weeks in autumn too much dwindled to be fit quarters for salmon. As we had occasion to point out in summer, this is a result of agricultural drainage. If there were no such drainage, the August rains, soaking slowly down the hills and through the meadows, would be sufficient to keep the rivers brimming all the autumn. Happily, the derangement brought about in the order of Nature by man's invention in the interests of agriculture is not irremediable. It has been proved possible, by impounding the rain, in a lake, natural on engineered, at the source of a river, to keep a salmon water flush and fresh during any time of drought. This system of redress, which had its origin on the Helmsdale, in Sutherland, is spreading all over Scotland, and it seems probable that ere long there will never be any lack of water in any river. Mr. Calderwood's teaching, therefore, does really come immediately into the region of practical politics. It might, indeed, have gone a little farther. Mr. Calderwood mentions that "spring" salmon are not what they are generally thought to be. They are not fish that come from the sea when snowdrops or crocuses are appearing. Salmon do not run when the temperature of the water is at winter lowness. "Spring" salmon are salmon that ran up between the close of the fishing season and the setting-in of the serious frosts. They are fish that are not to spawn until next autumn. That being so, they are fit to be sought and caught and eaten immediately after their arrival. Of course, it would not be proper to seek them in rivers, where fish of earlier runs are spawning, or just spent, and ready to rush at baits; but why should not we seek them in certain lakes? Take Loch Tay for example. There the season opens in the middle of January. Why should we wait until then? Splendid baskets of fresh-run fish could be made from the middle of November onward, and it is probable that spent fish would be fewer between November and New Year than they are between New Year and the beginning of March. Here and there throughout the Highlands a reform on the principle indicated would brighten the winter. Perhaps Mr. Calderwood, who guides our lawgivers as to salmon, will take this into consideration. In his book he deals with other problems. He is not invariably convincing. His reasoning in favour of the thought that salmon may have originally been native to the sea is not cogent. Evidently he devised it in order that he might be free to support the notion that the fish do not feed when in fresh water. That notion he has not established. Still, his book, as a whole, is exceedingly good and suggestive.

[A striking proof of our reviewer's theory has come to light in connection with the recent stocking of the Dupplin hatcheries. Of 256 salmon netted in the Tay between November 6th and December 9th, twenty-five, it is reported in "The Scotsman," "were beautiful spring salmon in the pink of condition."—Editor of THE NATION.]

NEW THEOLOGY.*

WE do not know whether the sale of this second volume from Mr. Campbell's pen is proving equal to that of the earlier one, in which he trenchantly defined his new theological position; but we should doubt it, because, apart from the vigorous preface, there is a devout restraint about it, less attractive to the "groundlings" than the spectacle of a parson in his shirt-sleeves smashing the idols that were lately his own, and are still largely his brethren's. But it will be a matter for regret if these sermons are not widely read, as a sequel to the "New Theology," for men's souls cannot live on controversy, still less on negations, and here the preacher does provide some oil and wine for the wounds of those who regard themselves as robbed of their faith by "modernism." And, while the impetuous zeal of the popular preacher is still evident on every page, that is at any rate a more agreeable characteristic than dullness or cynicism, and what the critics condemned in "The New Theology" is less conspicuous here. Dr. Rashdall admitted that it was inevitable that, when questions hitherto debated among scholars and theologians pass into "books for the railway bookstall," they should be discussed in a way which would prove "distasteful to fastidious minds"; and he further indicated a certain number of Mr. Campbell's statements as, in his judgment, erroneous, adding that, even where he agreed with the substance, he often disliked the mode of expression. And Father Tyrrell, a more exact theologian than Dr. Rashdall, expressed the opinion that the new theology was no more successful than the old in providing "a synthesis without antinomies," while, as reckoning with and explaining the deepest and purest Christian experience, in relation to the Person of Christ, it was in his judgment in many ways "distinctly less adequate." Readers of these sermons will, we think, form a similar impression; but the rhetoric here is more in its proper place, and so is less likely to offend the fastidious. And Mr. Campbell has the courage of his convictions in placing in the forefront such topics as the Resurrection, the Presence of Christ, the Atonement, and so forth. The movement in these discourses is so rapid that the hearers presumably did not realise where they were being landed, while the use of a familiar terminology might reassure them that it was all right. Yet a little reflection must make some at least question the cogency of the argument. Thus, with reference to the "empty tomb," the preacher asserts that the first Christians believed in it simply because, unless the tomb were empty, they could not understand how Christ could have appeared at all. And promptly this assertion is dealt with as a "somewhat interesting fact." But is it a fact? In the New Testament itself there are various passages in which reference is made to a visible phantom of some person who was not actually present in the flesh; and in the story of Peter's deliverance from prison it is clear that the disciples found it easier to believe in "his angel," a spiritual being just like him, than in the possibility of his having escaped. This kind of facile assurance on the preacher's part, when speaking of incidents about which it is very difficult to form any precise opinion, may in some quarters be impressive, but elsewhere it is likely to be resented.

* "New Theology Sermons." By the Rev. R. J. Campbell. Williams & Norgate. 6s.

Mr. Campbell is, however, by no means ineffective in some of his "restatements." Thus, in the new theology, sin is regarded as a nullity; and fears have been expressed as to the weakening of moral fibre that may be anticipated if such an estimate of it becomes generally accepted. Well, here in this volume we have a sermon entitled "The Mistake of Sin," and it is on the new lines. The preacher repeats what he had said before, that "sin is a blundering quest for God." The old teaching, as to the horribleness of sin and the terribleness of the sense of guilt which it involves, is absent. Sin is "a mistake," that is all; and even St. Paul's solemn phrase, "the end of these things is death," is watered down to the "matter of fact" that a man's self-indulgence "does shorten his life." All this must be profoundly unsatisfactory to the traditional church-goer. But Mr. Campbell does not leave off in this airy situation. He proceeds, in language as eloquent as it is impressive, to depict the career of the "helpless derelict," such as is, by way of illustration, "a victim of the drug habit"; and in the closing words he insists on the possibility of restoration, even in the worst conceivable cases:—

"I speak what I know, and testify what I have seen, when I say that there is no evil habit which cannot be broken when the power of Divine love is sincerely invoked. I will acknowledge no exception. I do not care what you may have been, or what you are; the claim of simple faith upon the love of God never goes unhonoured."

Strong, clear language such as this is what the church-goer likes; nor has he any quarrel with the six times repeated personal pronoun. When the Bishop of London prints a sermon, the fount of "I" is quickly exhausted; and it is quite likely that this "somewhat interesting fact" accounts largely for his popularity. Mr. Campbell's volume contains several other sermons that deal with sin; so that, whatever his theory on the subject may be, and however inadequate, he certainly does not ignore it. The title of one of the later sermons, "The Valley of Baca," attracted our attention, because it was to us a new locality; and it was gratifying to learn that "it is impossible to say with absolute certainty what the Valley of Baca really was"; but it proved to be the Psalmist's familiar "vale of misery," which the wise, as they pass through it, "use for a well"; and the exposition of this Hebrew analogue of "Spartanactus es, hanc exorna" is effective, if less original than others of the discourses. That entitled "The Angel of the Soul" is perhaps the most striking. There is in it an element of poetry as well as deep feeling. Mr. Campbell is not likely to lack hearers so long as he can treat the subject of childhood so well.

THE GREAT FRENCH STORY-TELLER.*

THAT well-known historian of literary France, M. Emile Faguet, praises the sixteenth century as being, "above all others, the creative century." The printing-press was firmly established. The discovery of America had not only enlarged the world, it had kindled all men's imaginations. The Reformation was in the air. The Renaissance, which was partly classical and partly modern, was well toward. A new spirit, to be called Humanism, of which Montaigne and Erasmus stand conspicuous and brilliant among its earliest representatives, was just beginning to flow over Europe. It was a vivid, energetic, and progressive age. As M. Faguet properly insists, it was the most creative.

Writers were active in every field of literature, and we are bidden to note that in the sixteenth century the art of the story-teller "attained to such perfection that it has never been surpassed." One imperial master in this art arose and has remained to us: François Rabelais. Known here but to a relatively small number of disciples (so one may almost call them), he has ranked among their chief literary joys; and all of them, we hope, will thank Mr. Arthur Tilley for this scholarly and sympathetic monograph on the author of "Gargantua" and "Pantagruel."

Friar and monk in turn, physician, man of letters, philosopher, dreamer, lecturer; denounced, libelled, and persecuted by the Sorbonne and all pedants and bigots; lauded to the heavens by the rest, the Rabelais whom we of this day mainly delight in is the romancer, the satirist, the multitudinous and uproarious laughter, the one supreme humorist whom the French nation has produced. Mr. Tilley is at great pains to get at the heart of Rabelais's philosophy (a matter at all times in debate by Rabelaisians), and his chapter on this subject is wise and exceedingly suggestive. But when this is threshed out—will it ever be threshed out?—we shall all once more be fain to declare that it is the great invincible jester whom we chiefly and truly love; the creator of Panurge and Friar John of the Funnels, the best and wittiest rascal and the lustiest and most glorious monk in literature. "The Book," as the devout would style it in Rabelais's own day, has been read by everybody in France. "It puts the last stone on the tomb of the Middle Ages" (once more we cite M. Faguet), "and thus 'Gargantua' and 'Pantagruel' are not only a great book, but mark an epoch in the national history."

Exact knowledge of Rabelais, the man himself, and his work, has come to us only within the past half-century. There are gaps in the biography which the minutest investigation will never fill up for us, but upon "The Book" and its history we are at this date pretty well informed. We know now that there was an earlier "Gargantua" than Rabelais's; that he worked upon—edited, revised, or rewrote—an ancient chap-book which embodied the popular legends of the beneficent giant king. Rabelais's version had an immediate and immense success: "Two months later Rabelais could say of it that more copies had been sold than there would be Bibles in nine years." The success of "Gargantua" inspired him with the notion of "Pantagruel" (in reality, of course, the two histories are one); and when the second romance had triumphed as the first had done, Rabelais at once set about to write a new and worthier tale of Gargantua, Pantagruel's father. As the books now stand, therefore, they are both essentially Rabelais's; and though he borrowed as freely as in his day it was the universal custom to do (from the classics as well as from contemporary writers) he has coined, and stamped, and converted all his borrowings into his own.

The Rabelaisian, never quite knows at what point to begin. Twenty or more chapters rise into his mind; and he asks himself whether he prefers Gargantua and the big bells of Paris, to the cake-bakers of Lorné who started the war between Grandgousier and Picrochole, to the poetic dream of the Abbey of Thelema, to the meeting of Panurge and Pantagruel, to Judge Bridlegoose and his theory of the dice, to the bargainings of Panurge and the sheep merchant, to the great storm and Panurge's and Friar John's behaviour in it, to Bishop Homenas and the decretals, to the episode of the husbandman and the junior devil, to the tale of Poor Tom and his hatchet in the prologue to the fourth book.

In his chapter upon Rabelais's art, Mr. Tilley discusses the extraordinary richness, variety, and extent of his vocabulary. In passages of conversation and of animated movement Rabelais is not surpassed by Shakespeare; he coins new words prodigally; he has a complete mastery of the phrase; he can change his style with every shift of his narrative; he is by turns as realistic as his own sheep-dealer; and, in his higher flights, and his imaginative sweep, as near to the heavens as Milton. His philosophy is embarrassing, and will never be quite clear to us; but we really do not care much about that. He distilled from the gods a humour that has sustained and will sustain him.

T.H.

*"François Rabelais." By Arthur Tilley, M.A., Fellow and Lecturer of King's College, Cambridge. "French Men of Letters," Edited by Alexander Jessup, Litt.D. Lippincott. 6s. net.

A BOOK OF GENIUS.*

"COMING so suddenly out of the sun," asked Socrates of the escaped cave-dweller on his return, "would he not find his eyes blinded with the gloom of that place?" "And if he were forced to enter the lists against those who had always been prisoners, while his sight continued dim and his eyes unsteady, would he not be made a laughing stock?" "And if any one attempted to set the cave-dwellers free and carry them to the light, would they not go so far as to put him to death?" This challenge from the famous vision of human life in the seventh book of the "Republic" might provide the keynote of this extraordinary book. "William Jordan, Junior," is a mixture of fantasy, extravagance, and rollicking humour, which occupies a place apart amongst contemporary fiction. Some of it is weak, some tiresome; but there is genius in it also. The critic could almost go through the volume with a blue pencil scoring the passages where the author has evidently failed. He seems to have no power of self-criticism; and a passage of delicate feeling or jolly, boisterous fun will be followed by an attempt at satire which is merely clumsy and inane. But undoubtedly there is strength here, and observation, and an easy command of material which lifts the book high above the common crowd of fiction and should help the author to go far.

In a little room, alone with his father, who studies continually in the great "Book of the Ages," this frightened, bewildered child, William Jordan, Junior, struggles to adolescence. He is hysterical, timid, half simple; afraid of the street-labyrinths and of the street-bred people; afraid of the school where he is ill-treated; afraid of life itself. His father converses with him in grotesque language. "O beloved one," "O Achilles," "O my father." Before him is the testing time—the drama. "If we listen," says the father one evening, "we can hear it. I hear it now." The boy listened at the shutters of the little room. "There is only the gurgle of water," he said, "and the little voice of the wind." "And," said the man with faint eyes. "And—and—and the mighty roar of the streets of the great city." "That is the drama, beloved one."

The creature who has been blinded by the light is cast forth, stumbling and afraid, to take his part amongst the denizens of the cave. He becomes a "handy youth" at a publisher's, tying up parcels for a wage of ten shillings a week, accepted by all the cave-dwellers as obviously a lunatic. He wanders through it all—twentieth century middle-class London—seeing without comprehending; astonished at the security of these peoples, their composure, their indifference to the things that matter, their delight in themselves and in their world. He attends suburban parties with infinite misery: to meet "Joe Cox who plays for Surrey Second Eleven," and "John Dobbs who plays third fiddle in the orchestra at the Alcazar Theatre," and Chrissie, and Hermione Leigh, the heroine of the new ballet; and other kindred souls. He goes with such cheery spirits to Margate, for a first visit to the sea, where a kind of madness comes upon him, and he smashes the concertina of a mocking companion and sings wild, outlandish songs. He is taken to places of excitement and pleasure; to the Oval on Bank Holiday, where "several thousands of human beings—wedged as tightly together as dried figs in a box—braved the broiling heat of the airless afternoon, craning and tiptoeing to witness a trial of skill of a curiously inconsequent and macabre kind, with whose necessities the vast majority were very imperfectly acquainted." He visits the music hall and sees Hermione dancing, and thinks that he is seeing a vision of Divinity. He comes in despair to realise that these people, and not he, are of the Royal Race; that his dreams and shadows count for nothing in comparison with their courage and security and energy; that the cave and its shadows are real, the rest is illusion.

"The sea, the sky, the birds, the green fields, the wisdom and poetry of past ages, the intercourse with heroes and goddesses could cast spells upon him which not even prayers could appease. Yet what was this exaltation by comparison with that lusty, high-hearted genius which accepted all those incomparable things as neither more nor less than an immemorial right; a native arrogance that could defile the bosom of the sea, mutilate the fairest landscapes, poison the sky with the smoke of cities, wantonly destroy the glorious life that enriched the very air it breathed?"

From this denial of his birthright William Jordan, Junior, is saved by suffering. He steals money in a moment of terror, and is committed to prison. He emerges from it with a new power and inspiration; so that his friend who formerly loved him as a kind of child now regards him with awe and wonder. He leaves the cities and wanders over the world—a wayfarer, begging his bread from door to door. He learns kinship with the earth, his Mother, and sings to her "in a wonderful kind of speech which he knew was pleasant to her ear."

The Poet has found himself at last. He learns that he is "A Prince of the Blood." He has been through the three phases appointed to those of the Royal blood in their terrestrial pilgrimage—bewilderment, terror, pity. He writes it all in the Epick of Life, working with frantic haste, desiring its appearance to the world before he dies. It only struggles into print through heavy payment by the poet's friend to the respectable publishers; only on the guarantee that "its tendency is not too Agnostic, that is to say, Agnosticism impinging on Paganism, that is to say, that it contains a definite idea of God," also that "it is not open to the charge of immorality in any shape or form, in other words, as Octavius says, that it is the kind of thing that any young girl may place in the hands of her grandmother." No copies are sold. The critics either neglect it altogether or repeat in chorus, "This will never do." The poet dies in the little room. After his death a wild Scot from Aberdeen appears at the door, kneels with the father beside the dead body, leans across the bed "in an act of further homage to the dead." "Why do you do that?" asks the old man. "'Why do I do this?'" said the other, and his powerful, spreading, northern speech appeared to strike the walls of the tiny chamber. "Why do I do this? I am afraid, sir, it must be left to my great, great grandchildren to answer your question."

With which scene this strange narrative concludes. The poet is of the lineage of the poet in "Candida." Mr. Shaw can show him, in the action of one evening, entering and disturbing and evacuating the respectable Rectory in Bethnal Green. Mr. Snaith has the harder task of narrating his life history. But the real hero of the book is Mr. William Dodson—called, on applying for a post in the publisher's office, Mr. Matthew Arnold Dodson; whose philosophy of life is succinctly summarised in his own genial assertion to the poet, "Luney, my son, there are only two rules to remember for this life, whatever there may be in the next. The first is to know what you want: the second is to see that you get it." With his assurance, his ready wit, his friendliness, and his inimitable worldly wisdom, he dominates the arena; sucking out of life the utmost measure of enjoyment, thoroughly content with the world and with himself. His first vision of William Jordan is unfavourable, "As Pa says," he genially remarks, "you are about as fit to sit on a stool in the counting-house of Crumpey & Hawker as Pontius Pilate was to sit on the Board of Governors of Eternal Bliss." Later he finds an inexplicable affection developing for this "luney." "Pa wanted to report you to Octavius," he declares, "but I stood firm. 'No, father,' I said, 'the youth is off his filbert, but so was Blair Athol when he won the Derby.'" When he finds the poet reading Homer in the original, which he summarises as "a pretty fair imitation of a bad dream," the conversion is complete. He encourages his companion to fresh efforts: "If only you would pull up your socks a bit, you might easily, in your small way, make a bit of a mark."

In grotesque, cheery, fantastic scenes at the end William Dodson is lying magnificently while the poet is dying; informing him of the enormous success of the "Epick of Life"; explaining that the British Museum authorities had declared that "this priceless manuscript will be placed amongst those we have of Shakespeare and Milton"; inventing reviews which declare the poem "better than Shakespeare—better than Homer, better than the coves who did the Bible." In the midst of which glowing mendacities the poet dies; and William Dodson, still not understanding—never to understand—reels home to Peckham, crying, "O, Luney, Luney, I wish now I had never known you."

"William Jordan, Junior" is a powerful novel; an original novel; a book which—with all its occasional awkwardness and absurdity—excites and interests and compels.

A LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND

¶ Mr. John Lane begs to inform his patrons that he will open the Publishing Season by starting from the Bodley Head four new Authors, viz. :—

- | | | |
|--------------------|-----------------------|-------------------------|
| 1. A NEW HUMOURIST | F. J. Randall | LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER |
| 2. A NEW CLASSIC | W. Compton Leith | APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS |
| 3. A NEW CRITIC | R. A. Scott-James | MODERNISM AND ROMANCE |
| 4. A NEW POET | Lascelles Abercrombie | INTERLUDES AND POEMS |

Mr. Lane believes that these books will run through the Season. The following are the fixtures:—

JANUARY 15.

APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS. By W. Compton Leith. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE publisher is conscious that it is unusual to hail a new writer as "a classic," but Sir Thomas Browne, Pater, R. L. S., and Kenneth Grahame were once new writers, and he claims for Mr. Compton Leith that he has written a book worthy to be placed along with the writings of such authors. By some APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS may be voted precious—it is certainly intimate—but those who have the delicate perception to appreciate a new style will read and re-read the book. It stands apart from the highway of modern introspective literature; it is too true to be precious, too classical to be treated as ephemeral. By its overwhelming sincerity it will command respect, and not a few will sympathize with a soul battling against the heartlessness of circumstance.

JANUARY 22.

LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER. By F. J. Randall. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE robustious essence of Twentieth-Century Humour. The story of how a moribund jester landed a number of very respectable people in topsy-turvydom, and how they were extricated therefrom by a further twist of the deceased man's testament, will appeal to all who possess what has been called the fourth of the great Cardinal Virtues—Humour.

JANUARY 22.

MODERNISM AND ROMANCE. By R. A. Scott-James. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE literature of every period is at one and the same time a mirror and a guide. Mr. Scott-James's study of MODERNISM AND ROMANCE aims at indicating the scope of these functions in the literature of our own day. He takes a few conspicuous tendencies of the age—the scientific spirit, self-consciousness, democracy, realism, pessimism, and the new romantic movement—and shows how almost every new book may be regarded as a symptom of health or disease in the social organism. The book is not a series of essays, but a continuous treatment of the dominant characteristics of contemporary life as revealed in contemporary literature.

JANUARY 29.

INTERLUDES AND POEMS. By Lascelles Abercrombie. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

SOME weeks ago the well-known editor of a distinguished weekly declared he had discovered a new poet—a real genius. On his being asked if the poet's name was Abercrombie, his astonished reply was "Yes." "I thought so," was the retort, "I have just accepted a volume from him entitled INTERLUDES AND POEMS, and one of the most distinguished living writers wrote me a spontaneous letter drawing attention to Mr. Abercrombie as 'not only a poet, but a poet of very great and original powers.....I mean, this is really that rara avis, a man of genius.'" Poetry, if it is to possess vitality, must deal with vital questions. Consequently the subject matter of the poetry of different generations appears to vary. In reality it is not variation but development, and with development of subject comes development of form. Mr. Abercrombie perhaps has more marked development of form than any of his predecessors since Whitman. It is because he is treating of ideas forced upon him by his generation. But behind the new standpoint, the new teaching, there is recognizable the old music flowing in new channels.

N.B.—The publisher feels impelled to explain, or at least to apologize for the unconventional form in which he announces his four new authors, but in order to display their respective points the typographical substitute for limelight seems the one resource to any one desirous of directing critical attention to his pegasus team. The publisher's modesty is perhaps the result of a recent reading of 'Apologia Diffidentis'; or possibly of an inward conviction that "Good wine needs no bush" has lost its application in Twentieth Century.

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

As a story of heroic endurance, intrepidity, and persistence in the face of opposition, "The Life and Voyages of Joseph Wiggins, F.R.G.S.," by Mr. Henry Johnson (Murray, 15s. net), has considerable claims upon our attention. But when we remember how great was the work done by Captain Wiggins in exploration and discovery it is amazing that it has received so little recognition. Perhaps this is due in part to his own modesty, and Mr. Johnson's record of Wiggins' exploits may help to give him the rank he deserves among our great British seamen. The son of a Norwich coach-proprietor, whose trade was ruined by the railways, Wiggins was apprenticed to the sea at the age of fourteen and almost at once became imbued with the desire of exploring the seas to the north of Siberia. Promotion in his profession enabled him to carry out his wish and he formed the theory that it was possible to open a trade route through the Kara Sea by which the mouths of the great Siberian rivers could be reached. For thirteen years, in the face of opposition on all sides, he laboured to prove his theory, and in 1887 he took the Phoenix from South Shields through the Kara Sea up the Yenesei as far as Yeneseisk, "having steamed, without any mishap, over more than 2,000 miles of this intricate river, which had never been surveyed, and on which there was not a single buoy, not a single warning indication of shoal, sandbank, or hidden rock." Mr. Johnson's work is thoroughly satisfactory. He has wisely made extensive use of Captain Wiggins' journals and letters, and from them we get the impression of a modest, unaffected, and simple sailor who was yet cast in the heroic mould and not unfit to rank with some of the great seamen whose names are now household words.

* * *

SENSIBILITY, self-consciousness, poetic feeling, a tinge of gentle melancholy, a tinge also of preciosity, and an incomplete avoidance of the commonplace go to the making of "More Pages from the Day-book of Bertha Hardacre," by Ella Fuller-Maitland (Constable, 6s.). The author takes a subject such as the River Thames, the gypsies, a contest of birds, or pageants, and then proceeds very prettily to string together what some of the poets or less familiar prose writers have to say about them. These adventures in literary bye-paths make good reading, the quotations are aptly chosen, while the verses prefixed to each essay—which we presume are by the author of the book—show graceful fancy and sometimes real feeling. The book is of the type which one likes to take up in an idle moment, read a little, and then lay aside to be taken up again later.

* * *

DEVONSHIRE has always been richer than most other counties in men of strongly marked individuality. She has given birth to many of the most famous names in English history, and Mr. Baring-Gould's bulky volume, "Devonshire Characters and Strange Events" (Lane, 21s. net) shows that, apart from those who helped to make our history, she has produced an abundance of "characters" whose adventures and eccentricities are well worth recording. The book is an entertaining medley of personages, who for the most part were delightfully disrespeckable. We have lovers of the open road, such as Bampfylde-Moore Carew, the famous vagabond and "King of the Beggars"; sporting parsons of the type of the Rev. John Froude and "Jack" Russell; pirates like Thomas Benson who was both pirate and member of Parliament; smugglers like Jack Rattenbury, whose very name suggests a Stevensonian romance; impostors such as Joanna Southcott, and the notorious "Caraboo," who caused a sensation in 1817 by pretending to be an Oriental princess knowing no language but her own, who was kidnapped by pirates and brought to England in a brig whence she escaped by swimming ashore; eccentrics such as Andrew Brice, the Exeter printer, who described himself as "Democritus Juvenal, Moral Professor of Ridicule and plaguy-pleasant Fellow of Stingtick College; vulgarly Andrew Brice"; and a host of others. Mr. Baring-Gould has compiled a most interesting volume. Every lover of what is quaint or unconventional will enjoy it.

* * *

MISS IDA WOODWARD's volume, "In and Around the Isle of Purbeck" (Lane, 21s. net), should be popular locally.

She makes Purbeck, which is an island "by courtesy" only, seem a place of considerable importance historically, and the book should thus flatter the pride of place which natives of the district may be credited with possessing. Besides which the information, historical, scenic, geographical, geological, and biographical, is imparted in a style that has not the slightest taint of frivolity. We can therefore cordially recommend this work to Purbeckers who desire to know something about the place they live in; also to the tourist who may have occasion to visit the show places of this delectable country, Lulworth Cove, Studland Bay, St. Aldhelm's Head, and the rest, and experience the need of a reliable guide. On the other hand, speaking for the general reader, the book has the defects of its qualities. The desire to impart information has resulted in the tendency to be dull. There are pages and pages that have to be skipped before one comes to such interesting people as Mr. Benjamin Jesty, who anticipated Jenner's great vaccination discovery, or such interesting things as the clay pits of Purbeck, or the properties of Kimmeridge shale. The first few chapters, again, give one the impression that the author receives valuable assistance from Mr. J. W. G. Bond. His water-colour illustrations are wholly commendable for their synthetic grasp of the nature translated. In freedom of method, combined with a certain sense of style, they remind one a little of Thomas Collier's art, but their joyousness of colour is their own, and, what perhaps is more important, their qualities of light and air have survived reproduction strangely well.

* * *

MUCH of the information contained in Mr. S. C. Musson's book on "The Upper Engadine" (A. & C. Black, price 6s.) will be fresh not merely to those who have never visited that famous resort, but also to many who have been there and think they know all about it. For the average tourist does not go to the Engadine to study its history, its etymology, its botany, its architecture, or its antiquities (as contained within the Muséum Engadinais at St. Moritz), or even to bestow much observation and thought upon the scenery. He goes, if he be sound in wind and limb, for the hundred and one attractions in the way of field sports; or, if for his health, to sit in the sunshine leagues above the sea level, to breathe the unparalleled air and talk about his temperature. Mr. Musson, on the contrary, has been there as an inquirer into facts and an observer of nature's phenomena, and a deal of fact and observation is embodied in the volume that has resulted from his visit. A brightly-written sketch of the history of the district—a history which in many respects bears striking analogy to that of the late Boer Republic—introduces us to an account of the Upper Engadine in its many aspects, from Bevers to Maloja and back again to Scafs. Mr. J. Hardwicke Lewis, the illustrator of this book, may be congratulated on having produced drawings which, after passing through the ordeal of the three-colour process, suggest some of the clarity of colour and buoyancy of atmosphere that are characteristic of the neighbourhood. The book is one of the most complete of a pretty and useful series.

* * *

THE folk-tales contained in Mr. J. E. Hanauer's "Legend and Folk-lore of the Holy Land" (Duckworth, 8s. net) form, we are told in the introduction, but a pailful from the sea, as compared with the floating mass of folk-lore which exists in Palestine. Judging from the examples here presented, a further collection would well repay the labour involved; for, with the changes now rapidly taking place in Palestine, the continued existence of folk-lore, depending as it does on oral tradition, is endangered. Mr. Hanauer's interesting stories, all taken down from the lips of Christian, Jewish, or Moslem peasants, are well worth preserving for their wit and humour, as well as for the light they throw upon religious and social customs. The book is divided into three sections, "Concerning the Creation, and Divers Saints and Miracles," "Containing Legends and Anecdotes, possibly founded on Facts," and "Stories and Anecdotes Illustrating Social Ideas, Superstitions, &c." We should like to be able to quote from these stories, some of which, such as Azrael's commission by Allah to be the messenger of Death, strike a note of real pathos, while the sly humour of others is highly amusing.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

A CATALOGUE RAISONNÉ OF THE WORKS OF THE MOST EMINENT DUTCH PAINTERS OF THE SEVEN- TEENTH CENTURY.

Based on the Work of JOHN SMITH. By C. HOFSTEDE DE GROOT, Translated and Edited by EDWARD G. HAWKE. In 10 vols., 8vo. Vol. I., 25s. net.

Vol. I.—Jan Steen, Gabriel Metsu, Gerard Dou, Pieter de Hooch, Carel Fabritius, Johannes Vermeer.

Vol I. Now Ready.

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. Vol. I. POEMS. With Portrait. Globe 8vo, 4s. net.

By the late LORD ACTON.

The History of Freedom, and other Essays. Edited, with an Introduction, by JOHN NEVILLE FIGGIS, M.A., and REGINALD VERE LAURENCE, M.A. 8vo, 10s. net.

Historical Essays and Studies

Edited, with an Introduction, by the same. 8vo, 10s. net.

NEW IMPRESSION NOW READY.

Town Life in the 15th Century

By MRS. J. R. GREEN. In 2 vols. 8vo, 20s. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS—New Volume.

James Thomson.

By G. C. MACAULAY. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

OWEN WISTER'S NEW BOOK.

The Seven Ages of Washington.

By OWEN WISTER, Author of "Lady Baltimore," &c. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES—New Volume.

Aphorisms and Reflections from the Works of Thomas Henry Huxley.

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Also cloth elegant. 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

Is Mars Habitable?

A Critical Examination of Prof. Percival Lowell's book, "Mars and its Canals," with an Alternative Explanation. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S. With Map. Extra crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

Sixty Years of Protection in Canada, 1846-1907.

Where Industry Leans on the Politician. By EDWARD PORRITT, sometime London Editor of the Manchester Examiner. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Macmillan's Guide to Egypt and the Sudan

Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Fifth Edition. 6s. net.

 Macmillan's New List of Announcements post free on application.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

THE CROWN AND "INITIATIVE."

All interested in the discussion roused by Mr. Haldane should read Mr. Sidney Low's illuminating chapters on the present position of the Monarchy in

THE GOVERNANCE OF ENGLAND.

Second and Cheaper Edition. 3s. 6d. net.
Published by T. FISHER UNWIN, London.

STUDIES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY IN ITALY.

By VERNON LEE. New Edition, with a New Preface, a Photogravure Frontispiece, and 40 other Illustrations selected by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. Super-royal 8vo, half-bound 21s. net.

"Charming sketches, touched in with the light and sure hand of a master."—Spectator.

THE LETTERS OF EDWARD LEAR.

(Author of "The Book of Nonsense") to Chichester Fortescue (Lord Carlingford) and Frances, Countess Waldegrave (1848 to 1864). Edited by LADY STRACHEY (of Sutton Court). With a Photogravure Frontispiece. Three Coloured Plates and many other Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. (Second Impression.)

"Every page of the Letters is enthralling."—Westminster Gazette.

BEFORE AND AFTER WATERLOO.

By EDWARD STANLEY sometime Bishop of Norwich. Edited by J. H. ADEANE and MAUD GRENFELL. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 14s. net.

"In these Stanley Letters there are many vivid impressions of great characters and interesting scenes."—Tribune.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF FRANCE.

By EMILE FAGUET. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. (Library of Literary History.)

"It is literally crammed with information; every page is interesting and valuable."—Spectator.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF THE ARABS.

By R. A. NICHOLSON, M.A. With Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. (Library of Literary History.)

"Mr. Nicholson has performed the work he set himself to accomplish with remarkable ability, and his book will henceforth be a standard one on the subject."—Daily Telegraph.

THE MATTERHORN.

By GUIDO REY. Illustrated by EDOARDO RUBINO. With a Preface by EDMONDO DE AMICIS. Translated from the Italian by J. E. C. EATON. With 14 Coloured Plates, 23 Pen Drawings, and 11 Photographs. Super-royal 8vo, 21s. net. Fine Paper Edition (limited to 15 copies). Price on application.

"You can set Guido Rey's 'Matterhorn' as the gospel of the mountaineer."—Spectator.

THE PALACES OF CRETE AND THEIR BUILDERS.

By ANGELO MOSSO. Author of "The Life of Man on the High Alps." With 187 Illustrations and 2 Plans. Royal 8vo, 21s.

THE BRAHMANS, THEISTS, AND MUS- LIMS OF INDIA.

By JOHN CAMPBELL OMAN, D.Litt. Illustrated. Medium 8vo, 14s. net. (Second Impression.)

"A most valuable contribution to our knowledge of religious thought in India."—The Times.

THE ANDES AND THE AMAZON.

Life and Travel in Peru. By C. REGINALD ENOCK, F.R.G.S. With a Map and numerous Illustrations. Medium 8vo, 21s.

CHILE.

By G. F. SCOTT-ELLIOT, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by MARTIN HUME. Illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

YOU MUST READ THIS STRIKINGLY ORIGINAL ROMANCE—

THE BLUE LAGOON.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE, Author of "The Crimson Azaleas." (Now in the Third Impression.) Price 6s.

Please send for copy of Mr. Fisher Unwin's New Announcement List. Free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

The Week in the City.

AFTER the success of the Bank in securing the gold available in the open market on Monday, the downward movement in discounts continued, and as more and more banks in the United States get back to a cash basis, the prospect of easier money steadily improves. The Bank Directors, however, wisely retained the rate at 6 per cent. on Thursday. But unless the unexpected happens, we shall see it at 5 in a week or two. It is to be hoped that the arrest of Mr. Heinze, who was one of the immediate causes of the panic, means that the American laws will now be directed to the essential work of punishing big criminals. Roguery in high places was the main cause of a catastrophe that has occasioned untold losses to the American nation, and unspeakable misery to the multitudes of poor people who have been thrown upon the streets. Unfortunately, the prospects of currency and banking reform in the States are quite dismal. The new Bill for emergency currency is more likely to do harm than good. It will encourage speculative inflation, by providing an easy means of curing the shortage of currency that ensues when the crisis comes and people take the alarm. Mr. Aldrich's Bill fully maintains his reputation as a legislative humbug.

THE TRADE RETURNS.

The Board of Trade returns for the year 1907 seem to have been specially designed by Providence (as the "Westminster Gazette" showed in a brilliant article on Wednesday) to destroy the statistical foundation of Mr. Chamberlain's Tariff Reform speeches. Mr. Chamberlain's thesis was that in the thirty years, 1872 to 1902, the population had grown 30 per cent., while British exports had only grown 9 per cent., the explanation, of course, being that 1872 was a year of booming trade and inflated prices, while 1902 was a year of depression, caused by war. Corrected by index numbers the export trade had grown quite satisfactorily in the period. But since 1902 prices have risen and trade has expanded enormously; and when we compare 1907 with 1877—a year of depression—we find a gigantic increase of 217 millions in British exports, which is a rise of no less than 109 per cent. compared with a rise of 30 per cent. in population. As a reply to Mr. Chamberlain, this is horribly crushing; for, as he said at Liverpool on October 27th, 1903: "My case is that the trade of this country, as measured—and I think it ought to be measured—by the exports of this country . . . has during the last twenty or thirty years been practically stationary." What is of more immediate interest about the returns is, however, the showing for the month of December. Here we find distinct proof of the slackening off of the trade boom, and it is quite likely that the year 1908 will show a decline of foreign trade compared with 1907. Indeed, if the cotton dispute in Lancashire is not settled, we shall be faced with a terrible growth of pauperism and unemployment, Lancashire, as so often happens, leading the way. Up to the present, however, British trade has held up far better than German under the same monetary crisis. It should be quite exhilarating for those who delight in the misfortunes of their neighbours to read the commercial reports from Germany showing how badly German trade has been hit by dear money and by the frightful addition which the German tariff has made to the cost of living.

THE GERMAN LOANS.

This brings me to the sudden output of public loans in Germany, which comes at a most unfortunate moment for the banks, which can ill afford to see a further depreciation of public credit. The Prussian 4 per cent. loan, issued at 98½, has caused great uneasiness, especially as the Government has refused to fix the amount. Württemberg is following soon, and then will come an Imperial loan to fill up the huge Imperial deficit. It is safe to predict that financial pressure will do more to pacify Germany than any number of Hague Conferences and humanitarian addresses. In another month or two it should be possible to invest money very advantageously in German public debts, with the certainty that when the inevitable cold fit of economy comes your holdings will appreciate materially. Some people in the City are predicting that before the year is out Russian bonds will have taken precedence of Japanese; but there are some signs that the military and naval men who have been running and ruining the Government of Japan, are now beginning to meet with formidable opposition among bankers and commercial men. If this be so, the decline of Japanese credit may be arrested; but there has certainly been of late a good deal of well-informed selling of Japanese bonds.

THE COTTON CRISIS.

Much anxiety is felt about the cotton crisis. Evidently the operatives do not understand the influence of dear money. If only they could see that the masters would not be at all disinclined to close their factories for a few weeks, they would hardly have threatened to strike, and demanded better terms of employment just now, when employment and wages are declining (with trade) all over the world. However, the latest news is better and points to a settlement.

THE "TIMES."

In the City, the capture of the "Times" by fanatical Tariff Reformers like Sir Alexander Henderson and Mr. Arthur Pearson is regarded with undisguised dismay. The former is the active, clever, American type of railway magnate, just the kind of man who should not own a sober and conservative newspaper. The latter is the American type of newspaper man, just the type that should have been barred, though I believe he is a good employer, which is more than can be said of one of his rivals. Altogether it is a terrible blow to the prestige of the "Times," which still shone though with diminished radiance so long as it was known to be in the control of the old family. There is something rather absurd in the thought of England, the home and fortress of Free Trade, being represented in so many distant courts and capitals by an organ of the Tariff Reform League.

LUCCELLUM.

"CANADIAN Constitutional Development," by H. E. Egerton and W. L. Grant (Murray, 10s. 6d. net) contains a selection of speeches and despatches, with introductions and explanatory notes, that will be of great use to students of constitutional history. In a brief though excellent preface, Professor Egerton points out that it is difficult to find a hundred years richer in constitutional experience than the hundred years ending in 1865, dealt with in the present volume. Though Canadian history presents no situation so striking and dramatic as the metamorphosis of the general of a hostile Dutch republic into the Prime Minister of a British Colony, endowed with full responsible Government, within the space of five years, still, compared to other historical precedents, the development of Canada has been rapid. Lord Durham's famous Report—the most important of all public papers relating to Canadian history—is not represented in this volume, Professor Egerton being of opinion that it must be studied as a whole. He points out, however, the one flaw in that document—Lord Durham's view that it was necessary to absorb the French national character in a dominant Anglo-Saxon type. The contrary policy has, luckily, been carried out, and with the happiest results. Still, Lord Durham's Report was, as Professor Egerton rightly says, "a work of genius, not a line or word of which should be neglected or ignored by the student of the Canadian Constitution."

WINTER EXCURSIONS.

The Great Northern Company's steam-heated corridor trains banish all dread excursionists may have of a cold journey during the winter months.

Every Sunday the popular half-day excursions to Huntingdon, Peterboro, Spalding, Boston, Louth, Grimsby, Grantham, Nettingham, Newark, and Retford, leaves King's Cross at 11.30 a.m. There are also one-day bookings to Grantham, Peterboro, Huntingdon, Luton, and Dunstable, and numerous stations in the Home Counties. Every Saturday, for various periods, to the principal stations in Hertfordshire, also Luton and Dunstable, and on Saturdays, January 11th and 25th, February 8th and 22nd, and on March 7th and 21st, bookings for various periods between 1 and 8 days to Nottingham, Lincoln, Grimsby, Leeds, Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, Scarboro, York, Middlesboro, Newcastle, and numerous other stations.—[Advt.]

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears

Omar Khayyam (modernised).

Is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:

MILD, 5d.

per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.

per oz.

John Player & Sons,
Nottingham, will forward
Testing Samples
post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate (Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

THE STAGE CENSOR.

An Historical Sketch, 1544—1907. By G.M.G.

16 Illustrations, 1/6 net. Post free of all Booksellers and Bookstalls.

STAMMERING.

Cleft Palate Speech. Lispering—Its Cause and Cure.

By MRS. EMIL BEHNKE

(who receives patients for treatment).

Price 1/- net. Post free of all Booksellers and Bookstalls.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd., 17A, Paternoster Row, E.C.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Twopence. Each Friday.

Established 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics, Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals, and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy men and women it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen post free on application.

Offices: 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

John Hamilton Thom Centenary.

JANUARY 10, 1908.

TO BE PUBLISHED IMMEDIATELY

second (Abridged) Edition of

A SPIRITUAL FAITH.

SERMONS BY

JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

Crown 8vo. Pp. 216. Price 2s. net. By post, 2s. 3d.

By the Same Author,
LAWS OF LIFE AFTER THE MIND OF CHRIST. First and Second Series. 2s. 6d. net. each.
CHRIST THE REVEALER. 2s. net.
A MINISTER OF GOD. Selections from Occasional Sermons and Addresses. With a Memoir. 2s. net.

London: PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex St., Strand, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.
THACKERAY HOTEL, Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements at moderate charges of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.

Telegraphic Addresses: Kingsley Hotel, "Bookraf," London. Thackeray Hotel, "Thack-ray," London.

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.,
Have the Largest Selection of Bibles, Prayer Books, and Church Services. Publishers of "The Marked Bible."
CATALOGUES POST FREE. CASH DISCOUNT, 3d. in 1s.

'Lectern Lesson Book,' 'Priest's Pocket Bible,' 'Daily Service Book,' &c.

Thousands of Bibles, etc., at HALF-PRICE

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

BOOKS.—A Catalogue of finely printed modern Books, choice editions, limited issues and large paper copies, post free on receipt of p.c.—A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.

CHOICE BOOKS are presents which give the most lasting pleasure.

The book-lover will find a mine of wealth in rare and choice editions in my Xmas Catalogue, sent free on request.

FRANK HOLLINGS, Great Turnstile, Holborn.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each). Saint Jude's Depôt, Birmingham.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL, Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mng'r.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. N. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

*Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRÜNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager.

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER, B.A., Camb.ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields: gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.; NEXT TERM, JANUARY 15th.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

ST. GEORGE'S PUBLIC CO-EDUCATIONAL SCHOOL, HARPENDEN, HERTS.

Headmaster—REV. CECIL GRANT, M.A.

The Spring Term begins on January 17th, 1908.

For Prospectus apply to "The Co-EDUCATIONAL PUBLIC SCHOOLS TRUST, LTD., 41, Moorgate Street, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the 'London Opinion Curio Club' 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To secure FRIENDS AND FRIENDSHIPS, join the CORRESPONDENCE CLUB, 10/6, and the ENGLISH-SPEAKERS' LINK, 2/6, of 350, Mansion House Chambers E.C.The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAIL.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

From GREENING & CO.'S LIST.

OF GREAT INTEREST.

THE MAMMOTH HUNTERS

An interesting work dealing with the Paleolithic Age in plain and popular style. By ALFRED E. CAREY. Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

LOTOS

A phantasy by HAROLD SIMPSON. 4to. Illustrated in Colour, 5s. net. Recited by H.S.H. Princess Henry of Pless at Chatsworth, and a copy has been accepted by HER MAJESTY QUEEN ALEXANDRA.

For Clergymen, Organists, Musicians, &c.

CATHOLIC CHURCH MUSIC

By RICHARD R. TERRY. 5s. net. This is a capital book for a Clergyman. It is written by the Organist and Director of the Choir of Westminster Cathedral, but it is designed to interest all who care for music, and it should be in the hands—says the Tribune—of all who direct the music, whether of Church, Chapel, Cathedral, or Mission Room.

A LAUGHTER-RAISING BOOK.

For those who like to laugh and appreciate satire and nonsense, the Book of the Season is

THE PONGO PAPERS

By LORD ALFRED DOUGLAS. 2s. 6d. net. Illustrated by DAVID WHITELAW. This is a most amusing satire. In the volume is also published "The Duke of Berwick," an intensely funny nonsense rhyme.

EVERY WOMAN SHOULD POSSESS

WOMAN AND THE WISE

An anthology compiled by G. F. MONKSHOOD (Author of "Woman and the Wits," &c.) Foolscap 8vo, cloth, gilt, 3s. 6d. net. Leather, gilt, 4s. 6d. net. A really charming and artistically produced little book.

THE ROYAL HOUSE OF STUART

By SAMUEL COWAN, J.P. (Author of "Mary, Queen of Scots," &c.) 2 Vols. Profusely Illustrated. Large post 8vo, cloth, gilt, £2 2s. In active preparation.

SEEN AND UNSEEN

By E. KATHARINE BATES. Second Edition. 6s. Is full of true ghost stories, uncanny happenings, and weird narratives of actual facts. Mr. W. T. Stead describes it as "a wonderful book." "A Borderland Classic." While the Pall Mall Gazette says: "Certainly the believer, the sceptic, and the mocker should all read her book."

DEAN SWIFT'S WORKS

Bound in neat Cloth at 2s. net per volume.

FOUR VOLUMES ARE ON SALE:—

- Vol. I. The Tale of a Tub.
- " II. Polite Conversation.
- " III. The Battle of the Books and Directions to Servants.
- " IV. Miscellanea.

NOW IS THE WINTER

OF OUR DISCONTENT, MADE GLORIOUS SUMMER BY READING

Greening's Fireside Fiction.

LADY LILIAN'S LUCK

A society novel by THE COUNTESS DE BREMONT, 6s. (Author of "Daughter of Pleasure," &c.)

THE GOLDEN HORSE SHOE

A romance of South America. By ROBERT AITKEN. 6s. (This is a novel to be read.)

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY

FICTION LOVERS MUST NOT MISS THE NEW STORY BY MR. GERALD BISS.

SECOND EDITION NOW READY OF

THE WHITE ROSE MYSTERY, A Tale of Conspiracy by GERALD BISS, 6s.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:—"A breathlessly exciting novel . . . It is a wonderful story. In some imperious fashion of its own it compels attention, you simply cannot help reading it. Its vivacity is infectious."

THE GANG

A humorous romance by DAVID WHITELAW. Illustrated by the Author. Cloth. 3s. 6d.

THE ABDUCTORS

The story of a week in Vienna. By JOSEPH PRAGUE. Cloth, 6s.

A CHARMING GIRL

A delightful story by ESME STUART, Author of "In the Dark." 6s.

LOVE THE CRIMINAL

A really dramatic tale by HARRIS BURLAND, Author of "The Financier," &c. 6s.

A New Romance by the Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

The most important novel of 1908 will undoubtedly be

BEAU BROCADE,

By the BARONESS ORCZY, Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

As the demand for "Beau Brocade" is already very large, readers are advised to place it on order at their booksellers' NOW. 6s.

A NEW STORY BY A NEW WRITER OF UNUSUAL MERIT

THE LOVE SEEKERS

A Modern Novel of Temperament, by MARY WALPOLE. (In preparation.) 6s.

LONDON: GREENING & CO., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C., and Published by THE SPEAKER PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, JANUARY 11, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 16.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 18, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 1d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 553	Music-Hall Wrestling. By P. Beaufoy ... 570
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	British Journalism and the Anti-Christian Movement. By "A Paris Correspondent" ... 570
The Prime Minister and Armaments ... 556	"The Recurrence of Disease." By Lieut.-Col. D. Scot Skirving ... 571
Free Traders and Confederates ... 557	"New Worlds for Old." By Archibald Constable & Co. ... 571
The New Education Bill ... 558	"The Virgin Birth." By Wm. Windsor ... 571
The Last Stand of the Moors ... 559	"The Best Children's Books." By "Early Victorian" ... 571
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	Village Libraries. By Lady Rendel ... 571
The Conquerors ... 561	Children's Thoughts. By "Parent" ... 572
When We Can Fly ... 562	"Premature Burial." By Jas. R. Williamson ... 572
The Soul of Religion ... 563	The Tactics of Women Suffragists. By E. L. C. Watson ... 572
The Mother-Confessors ... 564	Mr. Stead and the Navy Estimates. By H. S. Perris ... 572
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	REVIEWS:—
The Popular Struggle in Prussia. By Edward Bernstein ... 565	The Empress Pulcheria ... 573
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 566	The Eversley Tennyson ... 574
Books to be Read ... 566	The Last of Medieval Art ... 575
THE DRAMA:—	Mr. Gladstone's Churchmanship ... 575
Towards a National Theatre ... 567	The Near East ... 576
POETRY:—	Novels of the Week ... 577
Ut Caro Infirma! By Lucy Lyttelton ... 567	BOOKS IN BRIEF ... 577
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	INSURANCE ... 582
Letters by a Working-Man. By "A Mere Pen-Driver" ... 569	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 584
The Housing Question in German Towns. By T. C. Horsfall ... 569
The Premier's Pledges. By "Retrenchment." ... 570

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Social Democrats of Berlin organised an imposing demonstration on Sunday, on behalf of equal voting and the secret ballot in Prussia. Meetings were held in every quarter of the city in the morning, and thereafter crowds, estimated at 50,000 persons, paraded the streets and attempted to force their way to the Palace. The police held the bridges, and there were several sabre charges by mounted men, but the casualties were few, and not more than a hundred arrests were made. Prince Bülow's flat refusal to introduce the Reichstag franchise into the voting for the Prussian Landtag, or even to consider the secret ballot, finds little support in the Press. But the Radical and Liberal papers are as far as possible from making common cause with the masses. The Socialists on their side express a bitter contempt for the Liberals, who profess democracy in principle, but will do nothing to advance it. In the Landtag, where they are quite impotent, they are willing to make speeches. But in the Reichstag, where they hold the balance of power, and could at any moment overthrow Prince Bülow, they prefer to adhere to his Liberal-Conservative coalition. But there are obviously some elements in the Radical Party which view the attitude of its leaders with growing disapproval. The Socialists are now committed to their campaign, and will doubtless continue their demonstrating, though it is doubtful whether anything short of a general strike would make much impression on the ruling classes of Prussia.

NEWS has arrived this week of a coup d'état, carried out at Fez during the first three days of the year. The people put pressure on the priests, who promptly deposed the Sultan, and elected the Pretender, Mulai Hafid, in his place. This unexpected movement, which we discuss elsewhere, has interrupted the negotiations for a loan of £6,000,000 to the Sultan, which were proceeding in Paris, and, indeed, disorganised all M. Clemenceau's plans. The "Temps" does not attempt to disguise the gravity of the position. It is disposed to make General Drude responsible, but it recognises, as even the extremer members of the Colonial party do, that in the present circumstances France can only mark time and await events. The Sultan, who was a week ago the protégé and ally of the Republic, has suddenly become an impotent claimant to a throne which is now in other hands, and his partisans make no attempt to disguise the cooling of their friendship.

THE "Times" is already betraying its new associates by declining or abating its historic function of fair and adequate reporting. On Wednesday the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Foreign Minister made speeches of great importance, dealing with foreign affairs and the problem of the Navy, and partly disclosing the programme of the Session. Both were compressed within a single column. On the Navy Sir Edward Grey did not press for fresh expenditure, but declared that if the new foreign programmes were carried out they would render continued reductions impossible, our interest in the maintenance of the fleet being not merely the protection of our commerce but the national life and independence. At present our navy was "perfectly adequate to meet any probable combination that could be brought against us," and there was no reason why we should rush hurriedly into increased expenditure.

MR. ASQUITH, at Lancaster, announced that the new Education Bill would be a short Bill, a simple Bill, and a drastic Bill. It would not be enough to provide pensions for those able to help themselves. But it would not be possible to establish them by the "wave of a magic wand." The system must be built up step by step, and all classes, "including the workmen, must contribute to it." Mr. Asquith's reference to workmen's contributions has excited much controversy. It has been supposed to suggest a partial reliance on the rates, but it is more probable that the Chancellor referred to the sugar tax, and indicated that this would be retained at its present figure (a remission has virtually been promised). The suggestion of a workman's quota in any shape has been resented by one or two Labour members, who, however, approve the general non-contributory basis laid down by Mr. Asquith. But the serious part of the speech is the conclusion which many have drawn from it, that the new demands for the Navy are impinging on the pensions fund.

MANY Liberals will feel a measure of sympathy with two proposed amendments to the Address. The first is a proposal by Sir William Holland to raise the Board of Trade to the rank of a department, headed by a Secretary of State. No modern State can resist such a claim. The Board of Trade is our Ministry of Commerce, and trade is the prime concern of the British Isles and the British Empire, a matter which in the end dictates most forms of public policy. We hope, therefore, that the Government will at once accept the proposal, and turn Mr. Lloyd-George's Department into a Secretaryship of State. The second amendment with which we sympathise is Mr. F. E. Smith's proposal to abolish the right of capture at sea, which we should like to see supported by every unofficial Liberal in the House of Commons. Such a vote would only reinforce a minority of the Cabinet, which at some not remote day will, we hope, be turned into a majority. It is important to note that the proposal comes from a Conservative representative of one of the greatest of British sea-ports.

* * *

THE Prime Minister has made a cautious but fairly reassuring reply to the Liberal memorialists concerned at the recent proceedings against Dinizulu. He said that the Natal Government had undisclosed information which they held to justify their action, but that Lord Elgin had informed them that the Government could not sanction any policy unaccompanied by enquiry and a redress of grievances, had insisted on a "fair and open inquiry" into Dinizulu's conduct, and had pressed for the earliest possible termination of martial law. But they could not disallow an Indemnity Act after a responsible Colonial Government, like that of Natal, had approved it. Meanwhile, that Government has refused Miss Colenso access to Dinizulu, through an edict of the Minister of Justice. This gentleman, acting against all law, vetoed the magistrate's permit, and has been rebuked by Judge Wilson as exceeding the rights of the Executive.

* * *

THE almost extinguished Free Trade section of the Unionist Party have called Lord Cromer to their help and invited him to a dinner of the Unionist Free Trade Club at Glasgow. At this function Lord Cromer stoutly repudiated the ostracism of Unionist Free Traders and declared that Free Trade was the soundest basis of Imperial policy, for Protection, by stimulating Anglophobia, led directly to an increase in our war-like expenditure. Repudiating Socialism as common to extreme Radicals and to Tariff Reformers, he declared against even the beginnings of a non-contributory scheme of Old Age Pensions, which, in its development, might cripple the national resources. Repudiating in form "a policy of pure negation," Lord Cromer, in effect, proposed a course of "reflection on radical changes." Lord Balfour of Burleigh thought that there might be a germ of compromise in Lord Lansdowne's suggestion that Free Traders, in accepting reunion with the Opposition, would be committing themselves not to Colonial Preferences but only to the summoning of a new Colonial Conference. But he hinted that attempts were being made to take from Free Trade Unionists "by force" what could not be taken by argument.

* * *

MEANWHILE, the development of the propaganda for stamping out Free Trade within the Tory Party proceeds apace. It was set on foot by Mr. Balfour's speech at Birmingham, especially by his address at a smoking concert, where he spoke of Free Traders coming into line with the rest of the party. On this hint the Tariff Reformers have acted. They have established a "Confederates' Club," with headquarters in London, provided with ample funds. This body is a kind of political Mafia, for the tracking down of Free Trade candidates. It has already intervened in Nottingham. Lord Henry Bentinck has now denied its assertion that he had been compelled to accept a ten per cent. tariff on imported foreign goods, and to promise to abstain from opposing food taxes. But the propaganda continues. The "Morning Post" of Wednesday contained an announcement in large type headed, "Free Trader as Conservative Candidate. Incredible Report," and declaring that the Conservative headquarters had sanctioned the selection of a Free Trader for West Nottingham. This proves to be inaccurate, for Mr. Lygon, the candidate, declares himself a Protectionist. Now the "Post" hints darkly that Mr. Morrison, the Unionist representative for East Nottingham, is the man. He is a "reputed Free Trader." We hope he will be able to clear his character.

WE understand that the Prime Minister and Mr. McKenna will receive, on Thursday next, a deputation of Churchmen on the education question. The deputation, which will include both clergy and laity, favour the system of undenominational religious teaching, and will ask for its inclusion in the Education Bill. It has the support of the Bishops of Hereford and Carlisle, and of several Deans of the Established Church.

* * *

THE statement of M. Schollaert, the new Belgian Premier, on meeting the Chamber, confirms the hopes which his nomination suggested. He undertakes to press forward the scheme for the annexation of the Congo, but recognises frankly that the clauses relative to the Crown Domain have evoked legitimate criticism. The scheme, he hints, may be remodelled, and this will cause a certain delay. Meanwhile the answers are published to certain questions raised by M. Schollaert some time before the death of M. Trooz and his own assumption of office. The surplus revenue of the Domain from rubber and ivory is given as about £250,000 per annum, with large possibilities of increase. We are told that this was spent last year on the King's palace at Laeben, the Town Hall at Brussels, and certain architectural embellishments at Ostend. Even if it were true that the King really spent the money on purposes so relatively impersonal as these, the scandal would be sufficiently gross. It would be much as if we were to impose forced labour in Nigeria, and use the proceeds of monopoly trading to beautify Brighton, build a County Council Hall, and add a new wing to Sandringham. Since the early days of the East India Company, tribute has never been so openly levied on a subject people. The natives of the Congo are being taught the "dignity of labour," in order that Ostend may increase the profits of its Casinos.

* * *

It is announced informally that Canon Barker, the Rector of Marylebone, is to be the new Dean of Carlisle, in place of Dr. Ridgeway, now Bishop of Chichester. Mr. Barker is a preacher of force, if not of striking eloquence, he has for years been a conspicuous advocate of temperance, and he belongs distinctly to the ranks of the Liberal clergy. But he is in his seventieth year, and a real recruitment of progressive views in the Church of England can only come through the elevation to the higher clergy of the younger leaders of the more enlightened school of thought.

* * *

NEWS of a remarkable Congress of the Turkish "Parties of Opposition" has been published in "l'Humanité." It represented the Armenians of the "Dushak" group, and two Young Turkish leagues, led by Prince Sabaeddin, a nephew of the Sultan, and Achmet Riza, the ablest of modern Turkish authors. They agree to set aside their sectional and racial aims, and to work together for the reform of the Empire as a whole. Their manifesto embodies a programme of reforms, which begins with the deposition of Abdul Hamid and the calling of a Parliament, and lays down a joint plan of action. A fusion even among the exiles and "intellectuals" of these two races is a sufficiently striking event. But it only reflects a movement towards unity which for some months has been going on in Asia Minor itself. In all the towns whose names suggest to us only massacre and hatred, Van, Erzeroum, and Bitlis, Turks and Armenians have been acting together in resisting taxes and expelling oppressive officials. In the villages, moreover, a Turkish revolutionary organisation, with ideal reminiscences of Jack Cade and Wat Tyler, is said to be gaining many adherents, and industrial strikes have begun at Diarbahir, where also Turkish workmen made common cause with Armenians. All this would seem a fairy tale, had we not the object-lesson of Persia before us.

A FRIGHTFUL case of inhumanity to two children was proved on Saturday against Mrs. Rushworth, wife to the clerk of the York Education Committee, who was himself involved in the charge. Her conduct showed not only gross neglect of the children, who were practically treated as slaves, but a peculiarly morbid and ingenious form of physical cruelty. Thus one of the girls was branded with iron and made to plunge her hands in boiling water. The woman was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment; her husband, who does not appear to have shared the cruelty, but was judged responsible for the neglect, was fined £50. The case illustrates the need for the work of the excellent Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, which, we are afraid, is an indispensable check on bad parentage. The society rarely prosecutes without success; but behind this punitive work lies a far wider range of preventive effort, which acts by way of warning to callous parents and guardians. Forty thousand such cases occur in a year; a terrible index to the mass of brutality and ignorance with which the home rearing of British children is encumbered.

* * *

THE Abyssinian raid in Italian Somaliland, our Rome correspondent writes, has again opened the question whether the young Kingdom is adapted for colonial enterprise. The general answer seems to be in the negative. There is so much to colonise and civilise at home that no one can imagine why a country having still over 40 per cent. of illiterates and vast regions of uncultivated land should try to settle colonies in distant lands. Both Government and country have demonstrated an entire lack of preparation for colonial organisation. Erythrea and Somaliland are not self-supporting but weigh heavily on the home Budget. No industry has been started there, so that they have remained merely a field for the culture of officials. After the severe lesson of 1896, when the defeat of Adowa opened the eyes even of the blind, the firm resolution was taken to avoid at any cost a new war. To give a tangible proof of this intention, the garrisons of both Colonies were so reduced that if the Abyssinians wished they could easily over-run them, finding little resistance. In one point, however, this policy was in contradiction with its own general and avowed aim, in the occupation of Lugh, the furthest interior place in Somaliland, which the Abyssinians claim as a portion of their territory, while the Italians refuse to take this view. Discussion on this subject has now been going on for over ten years. Menelek did not recede from his claims, and the Italian Government temporised, meanwhile continuing to hold Lugh, an isolated spot, 250 miles from the coast, garrisoned by one single officer with 100 native soldiers. In other words, while the Government was forced by public opinion to abandon any warlike enterprise and attitude, it has kept open this question of Lugh as a source of fresh and serious trouble.

* * *

A CURIOUS action is proceeding between Sir Julius Wernher, of the great firm of Wernher, Beit & Co., and a Frenchman named Lemoine, who claims to have produced genuine diamonds by treatment of various chemicals in an electrical furnace. The artificial production of diamonds is not new; the question is whether it is a commercial enterprise. It appears that M. Lemoine obtained £60,000 from Sir Julius on the strength of his experiments. The "Daily Mail" publishes an earlier form of contract which Lemoine concluded with a Mr. Cohen, in which he claims that his invention was a variety of the "boron" diamonds, which resemble the carbon diamonds in hardness and resistance to fire. M. Lemoine's invention was called ferro-boron.

* * *

WE note that the new Quarterlies discuss with some point the disclosures in the Esher-Benson collection of the late Queen's letters, of her many attempts to deflect the policy of her Ministers in the direction of her own personal or dynastic leanings. Thus the Master of Peterhouse, writing in "The English Historical Review," admits that the Queen "neither affected an admiration for 'us constitutional countries' nor an inborn reverence for the 'constitutional fiction of responsible Ministers.' " He also notes her inclination, only overcome by pressure, to refuse Lord Derby in 1858 the dissolution advised by him in the case of an adverse majority as a typical instance of her determination to strengthen the influence of the Crown by every means in her power. "The Edinburgh Review," standing fast to its Whig traditions, declares that "these three volumes show that not a little firmness was required on the part of Liberal statesmen to hold the course of the nation straight and steady in support of the rising spirit of European nationality and Liberalism." When the Sovereign, continues the Edinburgh reviewer, on several occasions "said she must 'insist' to Lord Derby, Lord John Russell, and Lord Palmerston, each felt it to be his duty to remind her that her Ministers were responsible for the action of the Crown, and that if their advice was disregarded, the Sovereign must seek advice elsewhere." It is just as well to have this old constitutional maxim thoroughly re-stated and re-established.

* * *

LORD AVEBURY hardly deserves the rare title of thinker, but he is a pleasant observer of life, and this faculty came into agreeable play on Thursday, in his Rectorial Address at St. Andrew's University. The vein was optimistic. Nature breathed no sigh of despair; her voice was rather a "song of love and joy." If there were but one spring in a man's lifetime, or only one sunrise in the year, we should still have a right to conclude that she tended to happiness. Sadness came from within, not from without. But delightful as was the exterior world, beyond it lay a silent and shadowy region, full of awe and mystery. The relief to this shadow of the unknown must be found in the cheerfulness and unselfishness of the individual life, which would be found to ensure an ample supply of inward peace.

* * *

THE Third Test Match has been easily won by Australia, in spite of the absence of Cotter, the fast bowler, and the illness of Mr. Trumper and Mr. Hill. The home eleven were partly beaten by better cricketing, partly by heat. The match went in their favour on the two first innings, and up to the fall of the seventh wicket in the second Australian innings. Then Hartigan and Hill, the latter rising from a sick bed, came together, and under a blazing sun, tired out bowlers and fieldsmen, making 276 runs between them. The Australian total was 506 runs, and the English reply almost collapsed. Only 183 runs were made, and the Australians won by 245 runs. They have now secured two victories to our one.

* * *

THE current three-man show at the Leicester Galleries includes an exhibition of landscapes by the late Henry G. Moon. Little was seen of this phase of the artist's output during his life. He was known as an exquisite and minute draughtsman of botanical subjects, especially of the orchid, but of the larger style of painting of which he was capable, only a few personal friends were aware. Consequently the fine quality of these landscapes comes as a revelation. Like Corot, he was a lover of the willow and the poplar, and the entire feeling of these tender, quiet-toned canvases evidences the strong inspiration he derived from the French master. But he was far from being a mere adapter of another's style. An individual sense of poetry gives the work a peculiar fragrance, while behind the broad treatment there is the knowledge of form and structure, that is inalienable from the highest landscape art.

Politics and Affairs.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND ARMAMENTS.

"THE common interest of peace," said Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, writing in the first number of THE NATION, "proclaimed for the first time by the community of nations assembled at the Hague, and carried forward since then by successive stages, with a rapidity beyond the dreams of the most sanguine, has been confided to the guardianship of the Admiralties and Foreign Offices of the Powers." Since the Prime Minister spoke, the Hague Conference has been held, his proposal for a common reduction of armaments has failed, and if the action of the German Government is to be followed by that of the British Administration, the "common interest of peace" will again be remitted to the guardianship of the European war services. We understand that large demands for the increase of the Navy Estimates have been made by Lord Tweedmouth, speaking for the same experts who, a few months ago, guaranteed the overwhelming superiority of the British Fleet on the basis of the two-Power standard. Such a superiority could not, indeed, be denied. It rested on the fact that, taking the number of new and powerful battleships, the German Fleet was about one-fourth as strong as our own; that, taking tonnage and fighting power into account, it was less than one-fourth; and that France and Germany, combined in a union which, though politically impossible, is the strongest existing material combination, could not muster much more than one-half of our own effective striking force. Our commanders knew then, as they know now, that one section alone of the existing British fleet—the King Edward VII. class—is so powerful that it could blow the German war fleet out of the water without ever coming within range of its guns. Sir Edward Grey barely describes this superiority by the phrase that our navy is "perfectly adequate to meet any probable combination that could be brought against us." What, then, has caused the change, and excuses the new demand? The answer is simple. The sole existing cause is the new German estimates; it is against Germany alone that, in spite of the affectation of the two-Power standard, we build, and Germany, we know, is an isolated Power.

On this point there is no need for error or misunderstanding. We strongly deprecate the revised German shipbuilding plan. It is of bad omen for the peace of the world. But the main effect of the new start in German fleet-building has long been understood and discounted. The German naval strategists made a series of errors. They built small ships, which were completely dominated by our larger and better armed vessels. But they were not stirred to serious emulation by their incontestable inferiority to our own re-constructed and re-organised Navy. Their anxiety was primarily due to the fresh departure in the French Navy. That, as Lord Eversley has clearly explained, was provoked by our sudden advance from a type of battleship far more powerful than any existing class in foreign navies, to a kind of fighting machine of unheard-of power, the now famous "Dreadnought" and "Invincible." For the momentous consequences of that new thought in warfare we are responsible. France, our ally, when she knew of it, developed a corresponding policy. Germany, our supposed rival, finding that her fighting line was being out-classed by the Power with whom she has a traditional quarrel, followed suit. France again retaliated, and the key to this struggle is to be found in the remarkable parity of strength between the new French and German navies. Germany's last retorting programme has been enlarged, to the extent of an addition to her fleet, in a sequence of ten years of shipbuilding, of three warships comparable in fighting strength to the "Dreadnought." But we have gained the advantage of our early epoch-making essay in these monster vessels. Before Germany can begin to overtake, not us so much as the French start in "Dreadnoughts," we shall have a fleet of such vessels actually riding the waters of the Channel. Mr. Stead talks of the necessity of building two British "Dreadnoughts" for a single German "Dreadnought." As things will stand even two years hence, the sum will work out at seven to nought. But this is not the full measure of our security. We build faster than any of our rivals—judging by our recent feats in construction, more than twice as fast. Even if the early rate of "Dreadnought" building be not maintained, we can still outbuild Germany, who is invariably late in the execution of her programmes. Our shipbuilding and engineering resources, as Sir William White showed in a series of convincing articles in the "Times," are incomparably greater. This, again, gives us the signal advantage of watching the more slow and toilsome progress of our rivals, and appropriating the full fruits of the latest scientific discoveries in the art of destroying ships or of saving our own ships from being destroyed. In the three unmatched and incomparable fleets which now move in constant watch and ward over the home waters, we have probably gone to the limits of our power of supplying men for the vast mass of material energy that we have accumulated. No such Armadas ever rode the seas or were maintained by the busy people of these islands. As they stand, a third of our ships are manned by recruits who have only been a year at sea, and have not even overcome the landsman's trouble of sea-sickness.

And now the demand is for more. The German programme is still a paper programme. It has not been passed by the Reichstag. Grave financial and political difficulties intervene. No party in the German Parliament is agreed as to the method of meeting the naval Budget, and of extricating the national finances from the embarrassment of a double deficit. Baron von Stengel's financial statement was, says the correspondent, of the "Daily Telegraph," "a recital of errors, miscalculations, disappointed hopes, increasing expenditure, enormous deficits, burdensome new taxes, and general pecuniary embarrassments." The entire programme again is contingent on large plans for the deepening of the Kiel canal, and of altering the dock accommodation to suit the new type and scale of naval construction. Where, in such a situation, is the ground of fear for us, with our force in being, and our unequalled power of developing it at top speed by the time—say, eight years hence—when this paper German programme may become formidable? Where is the occasion for a new "scare" programme, largely called for by a journalist who never served a cause that he did not injure by his extravagance, and who, having made a kind of "corner" in the peace movement for a sensational propaganda of his own, now proposes to hand it over to its enemies?

It is for this reason that we say that the Liberal Government is under a pledge of loyalty to itself and to the party that brought it into being to disregard the unthinking movement for a fresh start in naval expenditure, itself following on the great "Dreadnought" development. Who will take the responsibility for such a departure? Not, we hope, the Government, fixed to old age pensions, and now asked deliberately to deplete its old age pensions fund. Not a progressive and peaceful administration, pledged to economy to the very hilt. Not a body of conscientious statesmen, called on to advance towards what Captain Mahan calls an "unending programme" of naval expenditure, leading to "unending expense," now incurred at the rate of nearly two millions a battleship. It would be irony indeed if the party of Gladstone were to spread such a lure before the eyes of Europe when it knows well that the incessant call for more speed in our battleships, and ever heavier tonnage, means that with every fresh construction we lock up the revenues of a province within the iron ribs of a single ship of war. Is there to be no mercy on the poorer peoples of the Continent who bear these burdens, and is rich England, secure by the power of nature and by her vast acquired strength, to become their scourge? We appeal in this matter to the Prime Minister. He has an unexampled position. No British statesman ever led such a party as he leads. No such trust as he enjoys was reposed in the most magnetic and most powerful of his predecessors. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman will be the first to acknowledge that it was not given to squander in armaments, to add, without adequate cause, to the sum of warlike power piled up since the Boer war, the last dangerous period in modern British history. Moral force has been amply forthcoming to sustain the great improvement in our material position. The Prime Minister and the Foreign Minister have had their share in constructing the network of insurances against risk which binds us to every naval Power of account in the modern world, save Germany alone. For years to come we can take Sir John Fisher's well-timed advice and sleep quiet in our beds: for no assault on our power is possible. With perfect safety we can go to Europe, to Germany, a year hence, and with a moderate naval programme, call afresh for a stay in armaments, an all-round and proportionate diminution of expenditure. We observe that Sir Edward Grey, speaking at Alnwick, suggests that we do not need to go forward in fresh expenditure until the foreign programmes crystallise in action. The Prime Minister is a man of caution and discrimination; he can rise above the mechanical fears of "experts," and survey broadly a political situation that lies open to the gaze of all intelligent men. If he likes he can bow the knee to a weak sensationalism, as others have bowed before him. But he will be the first to perceive that in such an act he will have lost his moral authority with his party, and quenched a light that he himself set plainly forth in the eyes of the world.

FREE TRADERS AND CONFEDERATES.

THE small band of Unionist Free Traders is apparently approaching the crisis of its fate. Through the week the air has been full of contradictory rumours. The existence of a dark and desperate band of "Confederates," sworn to have the blood of every Unionist Free Trader, has been revealed to a shuddering world. Mr. Chaplin and Mr. Austen Chamberlain, or some masked men acting in their behalf, were displayed holding a dagger to the throat of Lord Henry Bentinck and forcing him to assent to a 10 per cent. tax on imports and withhold opposition to food taxes. A day or two later the "Yorkshire Post" denied the whole story, and Lord Henry "walked erect before his fellow man"—a consistent Free Trader. The "Morning Post" meanwhile sought to slay Free Trade Unionism with a headline, and gave as an "incredible report" the story of the selection of a Free Trade candidate by the Conservatives of West Nottingham. We are to deem it "incredible" in these swiftly moving days that anyone should be chosen as a Conservative candidate who adheres to the creed of Lord Salisbury. Clearly, whatever virtues there may be in Conservatism, no one in future will support it on the ground of its "safe" adherence to tradition; the solid foundation of its principles, its determination to resist change till change is proved overwhelmingly unnecessary. But about Nottingham, too, there seems to be a puzzle. The Conservative candidate for West Nottingham, who was aimed at, wrote to prove that he is as bad an economist as anyone else, and is therefore irreproachable. It must be East Nottingham that is the plague spot. There for the moment the question rests. Possibly before these words are printed, the East Nottingham division will have risen to vindicate itself from the charge of adhering to the fiscal policy of Peel and Northcote, of Salisbury, Churchill, Goschen, Ritchie, and Hicks-Beach.

One thing is certain, that the process of absorbing the Unionist Party in that of Tariff Reform is now advancing rapidly to the destined end. What will be the fate of individuals is a matter of interesting speculation, but the interest is merely personal. As a group the Unionist Free Traders have done little to avert their fate. Betrayed by Mr. Balfour, who at first had the whole situation in his hands, they were partially paralysed by the unexpected weakness of their natural leader, Lord St. Aldwyn, and were doomed to sterility by the hide-bound negations of their policy. An excellent passivity will not serve in a country where the social problem is acute, and the Labour Party can already boast a million adherents. Excellent as Lord Cromer's speech the other day was in its exhibition of the political value of Free Trade, nothing could be more deadening than the attitude indicated to those social reforms which alone can struggle with Imperial enthusiasm for supremacy in the popular interest. The condition of the permanent maintenance of Free Trade is that Free Trade finance should be made compatible with social progress.

Tariff Reformers believe that there is no such compatibility. They reckon on new sources of income which will solve such questions as the financing of Old Age Pensions, the development of State Education, the feeding of children, and the like, and all without putting on the taxpayer a burden that he will appreciate. They will appeal to two enthusiasms at once, to the Imperial idea, and to social compunction for the poverty in our midst. They will throw in the spice of anti-foreign feeling, and the savoury brew will be complete. Make the German pay for the comfort of our aged poor and the solidity of our Empire—here, it might certainly seem, is the basis for an alluring, if not in all respects an ennobling appeal. It is only when we look a little closer into the facts that the inherent contradictions are revealed. The "preference" which is to consolidate the Empire can only be given by the taxation of food or raw materials or both, and this part of their programme Tariff Reformers are likely to drop, as its unpopularity is clearly no passing feeling, but the result of a perfectly clear apprehension of the facts on the part of the people. The taxation of manufactured imports, though equally unsound in principle, might be made more popular. But, unfortunately for Tariff Reformers, it is easy to show that it cannot produce the revenue that they require to perform their magnificent promises. The great bulk of our enormous imports consists of food, raw materials, and partially manufactured goods, and even of the small percentage which the Board of Trade classify as completely manufactured, a substantial proportion consists of goods required for future use in industry, so that to tax them would be to increase the burden on the manufacturer. The Free Trade principle is secure in England because its logic is illustrated with peculiar clearness by the circumstances of British industry. A great population living on foreign food, engaged in transport, banking, and the highest processes of manufacture, is peculiarly dependent on importation from abroad. If our manufacturers were less concerned with final processes, if we did no ship-building and made fewer machines, we should have been less susceptible to injury by the taxation of foreign imports. As it is, Tariff Reformers will beat their heads in vain against the hard amalgam of sound theory and solid fact.

Their only hope can be in the failure of Free Trade finance. If Free Traders give way to foolish scares and insist on spending all their surplus revenue on increasing the paper strength of the Navy, if they fail to grapple with the taxation of site values, and the graduation of income tax, that is to say, if they can find no way of turning to social uses a due share of the enormous wealth which the Free Trade system accumulates in private hands, and too few hands, then the time will come when the working classes, tired of the destitution in their midst, will turn from them to those who, however delusively, promise better things. Free Trade is not the last word of Liberal finance, but the first.

THE NEW EDUCATION BILL.

MR. ASQUITH said at Lancaster with some significance that the Education Bill which is to be introduced early next session will be "a short Bill, a simple Bill, and a drastic Bill." Some such announcement was anticipated, and we have no doubt will be received with general satisfaction by the Liberal Party. On the face of it, it describes a measure in salient contrast with the Bill of 1906. Mr. Birrell's scheme was neither "short" nor "simple" nor "drastic." We believe that in its final form Clause Four extended to over three pages of print, and offered to the scrutiny of lawyers and officials an almost interminable series of qualifying propositions. The structure of the measure was complicated, for it set up types of sectarian schools conflicting in various degrees with the national system. But above all, Mr. Birrell's measure was a compromise. It offered two concessions; the first to the Roman Catholics, the second to the Anglican Church. The first was accepted by the Irish Catholics in the Commons, but rejected by the Catholics in the Lords; the second was rejected altogether. In the effort to obtain a concordat, the root ideas of the Bill, for which alone the Government possessed any clear electoral mandate, were seriously overlaid. Only by a stretch of language could it be said that the public had obtained control over the elementary school system, and that public teachers had been freed from religious tests. We are bound, therefore, to assume that Mr. Balfour, the Church of England, and the House of Lords, having among them refused a plan conceived in a spirit of overflowing liberality towards their claims, the offer cannot be renewed. The Government are driven to recur in the main to the principles of educational reform on which the great mass of their supporters secured their seats. These principles are three. The first is the acceptance of public control in return for public maintenance. The second is the abolition of religious tests for teachers; and the third is the setting up, as a normal rule, a simple and elementary form of religious instruction, such as in the main obtains in our secondary and public schools. Such a solution corresponds roughly with the general religious habit of the people and with the marked tendencies of the type of faith to which they are attached. If we are told that it conflicts with the modern and thoroughly Liberal doctrine that the State, being a secular organisation, should confine itself to secular things, and that the Church, being a religious body, should apply itself to the teaching of religion, we answer that a purely secular system of instruction lies within the scope of our present method of elementary education and cannot be excluded from it in the future. The local authorities have always disposed of this matter, and if they generally decide for what is known as "Cowper-Templeism," it is hardly the business of the State to force their hands.

If, therefore, we interpret Mr. Asquith's speech aright, Mr. McKenna's new Education Bill will provide for only one type of public school, that, namely, which accepts State control in return for State aid. If the Church, blind and deaf to the signs of the times, will not come in to a national system, even though it largely guarantees and establishes the form of faith to which she is nominally attached, she must stand outside. But as we in this country are not accustomed to deal hardly with dissenting minorities, the terms that the Church will be asked to pay for her unwise abstinence are sure to be fair and moderate. Rate aid she can hardly have, for she repudiates its obligations. But we see no reason why the Government should not construct a more liberal system of grants than that which prevails to-day. "Contracting-out" must necessarily have its limits. It could only be extended to urban districts, where public schools are available. It could not be applied to the rural districts where only one school exists, and where, indeed, the only open question is whether the local clergy may not properly receive some facilities for the teaching of Church formularies and for giving special dogmatic instruction. In the main the repudiation of a common form of Christian teaching comes from the High Church party and represents a reversal to Catholic views of doctrine and practice. In other words, it is a sectarian and a limited demand, proceeding from a section of the clergy rather than from the general body of the laity. We need not say that in France the écoles libres, or specifically Catholic schools, are only too pleased to convey such instruction at their own expense. In this country the State would always make a very large contribution to the maintenance of such establishments, and only ask in return a very small quota from the religious community. For our part we should be glad to see some specially favourable terms set up for the benefit of the Roman Catholic community, which is very poor and has done much for the maintenance of its special religious ideals among the young. But we think the time has fully come when a Liberal and Progressive Government should feel itself strong enough to apply to our public schools the national and unsectarian principles which thirty-seven years ago were applied to the great English Universities. Under those principles the Church of England has fully maintained at Oxford and Cambridge the pervasive "atmosphere," half social, half religious, which marks her power over the governing classes, and all the ground that she has lost has been due to the wider intellectual influences of our time and her own inability to represent them.

Here, therefore, are simple and obvious lines of advance. Compromise has been rejected, and compromise cannot be repeated. The Church has no right to look for more than a temperate application of the established principles of Liberalism. One new alternative has, indeed, been set up by a section of the Conservative party, represented by a Northern Bishop and a Liverpool Conservative member, and that is the affirmation of the parent's right to determine for his children the precise form and colour of religious teaching which they are to receive. We rather regret that no trial of such a system is possible, for we are convinced that the mass of English parents incline to the simple form of Christian teaching to which in practice nearly all religious training for children, save in the Roman Catholic Church—and to some extent even in that community—is necessarily reduced. But for good or for evil no such experiment is possible. The Anglican Church will not have it. She fears the future. She thinks that too many schools will slip away from her. The clergy, as a body, have decided to close their doors and stick to their trust-deeds. They accept State maintenance, but they will open their higher schools and training colleges to one class of citizens only. Thus step by step the Church denationalises herself and proclaims her isolation from the main current of the national life. The State, therefore, is all the more bound to act for itself, and on the lines laid down for it with singular clearness two years ago.

THE LAST STAND OF THE MOORS.

THE Moroccan complication has entered upon a fresh phase, but at last it is the Moors who have reacted against European pressure. In the long train of events which have caused the various crises to succeed each other like rolling breakers during the past three years, the Moors had never yet acted deliberately or consciously. The disproportion between their spasmodic and volitionless movements, and the calculated and elaborate dispositions of Europe, has been at once pathetic and ludicrous. The Kaiser's visit to Tangiers, the diplomatic game which so nearly ended in a European war, the conference of all the Powers which sat month after month at Algeciras, all the complicated arrangements of warships and transport and scientific butchery concentrated at Casa Blanca, the occupation of Ujda and even the swift campaign on the Algerian frontier—there is little enough in it all of wisdom or broad statesmanship, but what a complexity of brainwork, of slow purposes and nice adjustments, it all involved! On the Moorish side there has been nothing but a few angry murders by some street crowds, the resistance of local tribes to the French invader, an act of brigandage by Raisuli, and one of usurpation by the Sultan's brother. One thinks of some vivisected animal, deprived of its brain, and moving a claw or a foot, unconscious of a purpose, amid all the frowning apparatus of the laboratory. But at length an event has happened in which one seems at last to discern a purpose and the stirring of a people's mind. The people of the capital, led by their priests, have deposed their feeble Sultan, and chosen in his stead a Pretender, who seems to have some manhood and some conception of national dignity. Had they delayed, even for a few weeks, the process of absorption would have entered on its final and irremediable phase.

The meeting between the Sultan Abdul Aziz and M. Regnault at Rabat seems to have resulted in some sort of pact between him and the French Government. The Sultan, indeed, looked for armed assistance against his brother, the Pretender, as a reward for his refusal to proclaim a Holy War. So far the French would not go. But their "neutrality" has been highly benevolent. French troops hover near Rabat to protect him. By the good offices of the French Government, French bankers have already lent the Sultan some £80,000 for his immediate needs. A further loan of six millions sterling had almost been concluded, and M. Pichon's visit to Madrid (to be followed, it is said, by a visit from Sir Edward Grey) marked the importance of the occasion. One can well understand that a step so decisive as this required careful diplomatic preparation. For a loan so considerable, to a country without a government and without resources, must have involved a virtual protectorate. The Sultan, as the debtor of France, would have become her protégé. To defend a stake so large, she would have been compelled to assure his authority, to vanquish his enemies, to reconquer his country for him, and, if necessary, to govern it for him. The signing of a cheque would have sufficed to reduce Morocco to the position of Egypt or Tunis.

This danger the priests of Fez had the intelligence to realise, and they acted promptly. The Sultan felt himself compelled, from his temporary court in Rabat, to send to Fez to obtain the sanction of the priesthood for this loan. His dependence on their approval is, perhaps, the most interesting aspect of this whole affair, and confirms an opinion which we argued recently in this review—that a Mohammedan monarchy is always in a sense limited, and is a despotism much less absolute than the foreign rule which Europeans put in its place. A Sultan must act within the Sacred Law, which serves in effect as a fixed constitution, and for every important decision must obtain the approval of the Ulema, who are its interpreters. In this instance, the Sultan omitted to pay the customary bribe, or else the Ulema were afraid to accept it. They made themselves, as usually happens, even in corrupt countries in grave crises, the spokesmen of public opinion. They refused to sanction the loan, and they deposed the Sultan himself, choosing his brother, Mulai Hafid, in his place. Since neither prince was within striking distance of Fez, the probability is that this decision was spontaneous. It is indeed the first decision freely taken in cold blood by the more intelligent class among the Moors, since the present crisis began. In nominating Mulai Hafid, they may or may not have made a wise choice. But undoubtedly they have done well from their own standpoint to depose a peculiarly feeble and childish Sultan, who was in the act of selling his country to secure his throne. For the rest, the decisions taken at the same time by the Ulema show the limitations of their statesmanship. They propose to resist the foreign police, and talk of an alliance with Turkey—doubtless, in this connection, a euphemism for Germany. That is the old hopeless path of intrigue. On the other hand, they declare that no further taxes may be imposed without the assent of a popular assembly—a startling indication that even the reactionary and obscurantist priesthood of Morocco have felt the stirring of the democratic "revolt of Islam," which is making itself felt in Persia, in Egypt, and in Asia Minor.

The immediate consequences of this coup d'état at Fez are already apparent. Mulai Hafid, last week a mere usurper with a doubtful hold over a few provincial towns and tribes, has now some claim to be considered the rightful Sultan of Morocco, and he may in time consolidate his rule through the greater part of the interior. Of the loan we are likely, for the present, to hear no more. The speculation would be much too risky. The "Temps" insists, in accents which at last carry conviction, on the neutrality of France in this intestine quarrel. French policy will now hardly look beyond the policing of the coast towns, which are still loyal to Abdul Aziz, and of the regions that border on the Algerian frontier. Even in this restricted mission there are risks, but at least the tremendous adventure of the conquest of the interior has been averted for a season. Had the loan been concluded before Fez revolted, France could hardly have escaped the heavy burden of reducing the whole of Morocco to submission. For her the new turn of events makes a timely escape from a most dangerous entanglement. How long the respite will last is quite another question. If Mulai Hafid, as the nationalist champion, should be betrayed into a reckless anti-foreign policy, the necessity of intervention would reappear in a new form. Or, if the two brothers have vitality enough to bring their claims to the arbitrament of a determined civil war, again it might be difficult for France to stand aloof. In the considerable force which now lies camped at various points between Rabat and Casa Blanca she has a sword which it will be difficult for her to refrain from throwing into the scales. But, for the moment, her plans have met with an unexpected situation, and she may be able to take advantage of it, to return to the moderation and reserve which she certainly has wished to observe during most of the phases of this long and difficult complication. The Moors, in their belated effort to act with consciousness and intelligence, evoke a certain sympathy. But is it hard to feel any hope for their future. Like all the Arab peoples, they know how to die; they have rarely known how to live. To will resistance to Europe is easy; to discern the danger requires but a moderate mental effort. But to face the tremendous work of reconstruction, which alone would enable them to survive as a people, is almost certainly beyond their powers. Consciousness has come too late. A nationality which had not vitality enough to preserve its ancient culture or to realise its own ideals of just government is not likely to save itself at the eleventh hour. In its overthrow it will be impossible to discern the death of anything which was worth preserving. This pathetic rally in extremis can only make the agony more difficult and dangerous, and set a problem for France which will mean for Europe many a nervous year.

Life and Letters.

THE CONQUERORS.

THE conquering race, secure, imperturbable, profoundly indifferent of opinion outside; so the astonished foreigner sees the Englishman abroad; so M. Marcel Prevost, in a delightful article in the "Figaro" of last Sunday, beholds the Englishman at Biarritz. "I see them at work," he testifies, "and never perhaps have I better known and understood their Anglo-Saxon energy than here, on the French soil, in a French hotel, kept not by Germans or Swiss, but by the French of the Midi." He applauds even while he criticises: he mingles his irony with admiration. He sees the conquerors, not triumphant over the conquered, not consciously brutal to the conquered, but simply brushing them aside as irrelevant; never, indeed, seeing them at all. He sees, in fact, this English colony contemplating certain cities of France, not as a land with centuries of history beaten into its soil, but as a place where the amenities of climate enable them to transplant into a Southern air a portion of England. Of the French—even in the towns of the stranger, where the French colony is numerous, in London or in Barcelona, for example—they never give the impression of a civic garrison engaged by the Mother Country. Whilst a few hundreds of English people in a French town, "obstinately speaking nothing but English, only inhabiting English lodgings, only dressing in the English fashion, practising their religion, their sports, and their games, with an easy ostentation, end by persuading us," he ironically complains, "that we are the strangers—or at least the conquered nation." It is this sublime mingling of security with indifference that fills him with envy and despair. Of Biarritz, of Pau, of Dinard—he might have said of the whole "côte d'azur" of the Riviera—"the English have conquered us," he declares. "Excellent milieu pour étudier leurs procédés de conquête."

In the attempt to analyse the secret of this supremacy, he fixes attention especially upon three points. First, the English are at home abroad. When we go to foreign lands, says M. Prevost, it is the stranger who interests us, his manners and habits, his peculiarities, the ways in which he differs from us. When the Englishman goes abroad, the customs of the country, the opinion of the people amongst whom he lives, count for nothing. He comes to Biarritz to live his life, the traditional English life made up of bounteous feeding, of violent physical exercise, of clubs, and of bridge. He describes the types which he finds at the Hotel Victoria, all entirely complacent, all self-sufficient, all just blandly tolerant of the occasional presence of the native inhabitant in this frontier post of Empire. "Yes: all those people are entirely at home there. It is I who am the stranger, the profane, since I look upon them with curiosity, since I wish to learn something from them." This accusation is an old one: accepted since the famous definition of the Continent in the verdict of the genial British tourist, as "ruins, inhabited by imbeciles": since the refusal of the English lady to speak French in Paris, because, as she protested, "it only encourages them." Here at least, amid much that has changed, the type is unchangeable. The conquering race cannot understand the conquered. No conquering race ever has understood the conquered. If the English in India, for example, commenced to understand India, the episode of English rule in India would be nearing its close. The second "instrument of invasion," this acute observer finds in a "Discipline of Life, unanimously accepted." Their plan of conquest is traced in advance. They stamp their life upon the life of the invaded cities: demanding, and in consequence readily obtaining, those things which they judge indispensable to the discipline of their life. These include specially "l'installation hygiénique et l'installation sportive." At Biarritz to-day, the villas which are not entirely sanitary do not let. This is a more effective pressure than any byelaw of a local authority. They create—through their demands—hot air and vapour baths, certain conditions of ventilation, electric light, "le seul qui ne

'mange pas d'oxygène' disent-ils." They make also their sports: golf, tennis, polo, hunting, shooting. They even patronise automobilism, whilst declaring, says M. Prevost slyly, "that it is not a true sport; they accuse it of not being an English sport." To this they join their religion, or at least the true outward manifestation of their religion. (One thinks of English "chaplains abroad.") Given also to this an imperious complacency of costume, and all the materials are offered to provide the Anglican colony abroad with the impression of "un corps d'occupation ayant son uniforme, ses titres, ses chefs. Ce sont bien des conquérants."

But beyond all these more superficial truculencies this observer finds a deeper interpretation of the cause of these triumphs. He finds the English, in these new Englands that they have made abroad, less intelligent, less generally cultivated than the French; less cultivated, less scientific, artistic, and laborious than the Germans. Yet it is these "barbarians," not the French or the Germans who have attained, almost without effort, the overlordship of the world. He ascribes this attainment to the fact that to-day the English are the only people who have truly national manners and characteristics. In a different order of things, but in equal measure, they exercise upon the manners of the world the Authority which the French exercised in the eighteenth century; when even those who hated them were compelled to copy them. "Manners and Customs of France," he asks dejectedly, "what is it that can be developed to-day under this title? We have no longer 'Manners and Customs.' But the English retain their manners and customs with a stubborn placidity." "You can love—more or less—certain qualities of this conquering people," he concludes, "but how is it possible not to admire its strong national discipline?" "That is what ought to be learnt from it," he exhorts his fellow-countrymen, "rather than ways of smoking or rules of play."

There is much sound common sense under this quiet irony and badinage. The qualities which have produced an English domination of Biarritz or Cannes are the qualities which have given us an Empire dominant over four millions of variegated peoples. The qualities which have made us unloved at the Continental watering places are the qualities which would cause our subject peoples for the most part to contemplate the abandonment of our rule without regret. Strength, energy, and a certain crudity make up the blend of the Imperial races. It was so with the Romans: a conspicuous efficiency, a rule equally just and indifferent; aloofness with a certain disdain in it; an exercise of power almost startling in the disproportion of end to means. You may see it all before you, stamped in stone, in that gigantic fragment of a vanished world, the Pont du Gard, near Nîmes. Those three vast tiers of arches, raised with incalculable labour, stride across the ravine for the purpose of bringing a tiny rivulet of water to supply the baths of a provincial city. The same effect is created by the still menacing and colossal stone arenas for public pleasure at Rome and Arles and Verona: exhibiting a certain brutality and grossness, and disproportionate estimate of the purpose of human building, as if effected by vehement but clumsy giants. No Conquering Race can possess much power of introspection, of self-examination. "They do not fret and whine about their condition," says Whitman of the animals. He could equally have said it about the English. No Conquering Race can possess patience; else it passes into the acquiescence of the South, whose favourite word is "to-morrow," or the acquiescence of the East, which is content to let the thundering legions pass, and plunge in thought again. No Conquering Race can possess irony: else it will uncomfortably suspect that its conquered peoples are secretly laughing at it, and this suspicion will excite it to resentment and reproach. No Conquering Race can possess humour; for then one day it will find itself laughing at itself; and that day it dies. Those who would help mankind must not expect much from them, is the half sad, half cynical verdict of worldly wisdom. Those who would rule mankind must not expect much from themselves beyond rulership, is the lesson of history upon all Imperialism. Above all those who would do the work of the world must not trouble themselves very much whether the work itself is worth the doing.

WHEN WE CAN FLY.

LAST Monday may mark something like an epoch in the history of the world. On that day Mr. Henry Farman challenged and successfully accomplished the conditions which were demanded for the award of the Deutsch-Archdeacon prize of fifty thousand francs for aerial navigation. For the first time in the history of the human race (for the experiments of the brothers Wright in America are still somewhat of a mystery) a man directing a machine heavier than air swept above the ground at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour, circled round a fixed post, and returned to the starting post again: "looking like a great white bird," as the spectators described it, alighting quietly and easily on the ground. The whole flight was less than three-quarters of a mile: it was accomplished in one and a-half minutes. The future may reckon on those one and a-half minutes as more momentous than many similar periods of centuries. The feat was accomplished with an aeroplane, driven by an extraordinarily light fifty horse-power motor; with three wings of the box kite pattern; a propeller and steel frame, covered with canvas, presenting an entire surface of some 52 square metres, the whole weighing about one-third of a ton. This extraordinary apparatus may some day join the "Rocket" as an example of the rude pioneer from which has been evolved even more complicated and efficient machinery. The man who has thus suddenly sprung to international fame is only thirty-three years old, an Englishman, previously distinguished as a reckless rider in the international motor-car races of Europe. His success on the parade-ground at Issy was received with extraordinary enthusiasm, by that kindly Paris people, who acclaim so generously any advance in human achievement. The hero of it all is to be fêted and banqueted and made much of. He intends to come to England, and compete for the various other prizes which have been offered to stimulate invention in flying. In a popular newspaper he has been indulging in rosy forecasts of the future. He recognises the dangers of the work, in the difficulty of balance and steering, the obstacles of buildings, the challenge of great winds. There are dangers also in the machine itself; in propeller blades revolving at 1,400 revolutions a minute. In experimenting previously, one of these aluminium weapons snapped suddenly in a downward direction, and buried itself three feet deep in the ground. If the blade had broken off in an upward direction, "one of my wings would have been smashed to pieces, and I should have come heavily to the ground." "If the blade broke off horizontally instead of vertically, it would travel like a cannon shot for a short distance," and, he adds philosophically, "inevitably kill any living being on its trajectory." Despite these minor imperfections, however, he is confident that his year's work will see flights from Paris to Rouen, and London to Manchester; that within twelve months aeroplanes will be constructed able to fly from fifty to a hundred miles quite easily, and that the time can be foreseen when aeroplane omnibuses will travel from Paris to London in five hours.

Discounting all the generous dreams of a successful inventor, and recognising that we are far indeed from any universal occupation of the air, we yet can realise that its conquest has been drawn appreciably nearer: that the human triumph in this element which has long baffled man's invention, may now be delayed, but cannot be denied. For many years, perhaps, aerial navigation may be the sport and plaything of rich and adventurous spirits, like the first motor cars; creating occasional sensations by circling round St. Paul's Cathedral, or descending unexpectedly in other people's back gardens. That is the stage when mankind will gently rejoice in the ingenuity of its inventors, heedless of the tremendous changes which such inventors must ultimately force upon the world. Then the airship will find itself utilised for military purposes with startling result. Then for locomotion and the transfer of people and merchandise from place to place above the recognised boundaries of ocean or territory. Finally, it will appear as a normal factor of men's life, as much transfiguring the world as the steamship or the railway; in the service of the poor as well as the rich, in private as well as public control. It must eliminate natural boundaries which have exercised a dominant influence upon human life since human life first was. This "precious stone set in a silver sea" with its moat defensive "against the envy of less happier lands," would find itself suddenly helpless and vulnerable before armies dropping from the skies. War itself would either become impossible or utterly destructive. The fierce fury of the conquered party could always find vent in the mere blind effort of retaliation. No organised military frontier, pushed forward by the invaders over the conquered lands could prevent desperate men eluding this line; invading in vast circuits, in the darkness, the hitherto secure places, dropping terrible explosives on the cities of the victors. Such reprisals would excite more brutal revenges; one sees a vision of two peoples thus engaged like two ants clawing and biting each other into a cosmic annihilation. Protective barriers disappear and the ingenuities of the construction of a scientific tariff melt into thin air. Man, whether he would or no, is drawn inevitably nearer to man. He must federate or perish in homicidal mania and blind impulse of hatred and revenge.

On the other hand, quite apart from the question of national rivalries or the old impelling causes of the madness of war, there is the further consideration of the influence of such accomplishments upon the delicate fabric of the body and soul of mankind. At best, any large accomplishment of flying must mean an increased hustling and speeding up of human life; more hurry, more bustle, more breathlessness, more triumphant supremacy of material things. In all our mechanical ingenuities we have constructed masters for us, rather than servants, being compelled, immediately such ingenuities have found fruit in invention, to adjust our lives to the new conditions which these, and not we, have laid upon us. We are compelled, for example, to avail ourselves of the telegraph and the telephone; we are driven to the express train, the motor omnibus, the various other expedients which are adapted to acceleration rather than to happiness. If we do not adjust our lives to such acceleration, we are swept aside or trodden under by the crowds which press behind; just as those who fail in the daily leap for the Brooklyn cars at New York are swept aside or trodden under almost unheeded. Has all this violence and tumult made life a richer, fairer, more generous experience for the bewildered family of mankind? Or is man losing in the mere blind effort of acceleration some of those great experiences which once transfigured and glorified his little span of days? "Can you really turn a ray of light by magnetism?" shouted Carlyle scornfully. "And if you can what should I care?" Matthew Arnold complained that the modern Englishman "thinks it the highest pitch of development and civilisation when his letters are carried twelve times a day from Islington to Camberwell and from Camberwell to Islington, and when railway trains run to and fro between them every quarter of an hour. He thinks it nothing that the trains only carry him from an illiberal dismal life at Islington to an illiberal dismal life at Camberwell, and the letters only tell him that such is the life there." Airships journeying daily from Paris to Pekin might excite exultation in a humanity which has emulated the exploits of Icarus, without exciting, like Icarus, the wrath of the jealous gods. They may be found merely to transfer to Paris an existence which has become intolerable at Pekin, and to Pekin an existence which has become intolerable at Paris. It is a remarkable fact in the history of European development that all the astonishing success of scientific and mechanical invention has been accompanied by an ever profounder questioning of the advantage of it all; so that to-day, when we seem on the verge of such discoveries as would have made our ancestors shout for joy in the mere triumph of creative energy, we are questioning, with more bitterness and uncertainty than ever before, whether life itself is not a bankrupt and impossible thing. Mr. H. G. Wells, in the brilliant opening of his new story, "The War in the Air," in this month's "Pall Mall Magazine," has shown the old potato digger, "a greengrocer by trade, a gardener by disposition," confronting with a deepening disgust the restlessness of progress. "Heaven had planned him for a peaceful world. Unfortunately, Heaven had not planned a peaceful world for him. He lived in a world of obstinate and incessant change." In a whimsical frontispiece he is shown in his little garden; gas works and electric power stations rising up to heaven beside him, mono-rails running across his head, flocks of balloons and aeroplanes clouding the horizon; everywhere on earth and sky the impression of a hustling, distorted, dissatisfied energy, writhing into fresh forms of grotesque invention. "This here Progress," is his dull conviction. "It keeps on. You'd hardly think it could keep on." It is not only Mr. Tom Smallways who is bothered with such doubts. The vision of all poverty and sweat of labour vanishing by the occasional pressing of a button, while mankind lies at ease on the hillside like the Olympian gods, has joined the vision of all disease abolished by scientific ingenuity. Flying will bring men together, abolish boundaries, multiply the facilities of exchange, increase the wealth of a few. Can it offer humanity the satisfaction of one of the necessities of the soul? There will always be those who find a bracing and tonic in the roar and exultation of riotous life, who find a music in the league of lights and the clashing of the wheels, and the mingling of the machine with the inspiration of the crowd. There will always be others who will seek satisfaction in quietness and common things—the untroubled horizon, the secure possessions of the heart of men.

THE SOUL OF RELIGION.

RELIGION is probably as old and as universal as humanity itself, but it is only in comparatively recent times that men have begun to ask themselves what it fundamentally is. In the sacred literature of the Hebrews we have no explicit, formulated definition of religion; nor is such a definition to be found in the canonical writings of primitive Christianity. In the Old Testament it was generally conceived and spoken of as a covenant between God and man; in the New Testament this conception was deepened by the ideas of sonship and fatherhood, and was symbolically expressed, especially by St. Paul, as a communion of life and love between an eternal father and an earthly son. The old fathers of the Church attempted in a superficial way to arrive at a definition of religion (which to them it must be remembered was exclusively the Christian religion) by means of an etymology of the word. In the writings of men like Luther and Zwingli, religion is defined in mystical terms as a "life in God," or the "possession of God." Most of the old Protestant dogmatic writers intellectualised the conception of religion; and in the eighteenth century this process was developed until it culminated in the definition of religion as a knowledge of God. The emotional, imaginative, mythological, and practical elements in the religious consciousness were almost entirely overlooked by writers in the eighteenth century, whether theologians or laymen. But a new outlook was opened out by Schleiermacher. He pointed out in opposition to both lay and ecclesiastical rationalism that the soul of religion was to be found not in thought but in feeling; that it was primarily an emotional rather than an intellectual quality in the heart of man. It is not correct to say, as is sometimes said, that Schleiermacher reduced religion to mere blind feeling. In his terminology feeling is not undisciplined, wayward emotion. It is an attitude of mind which includes our highest efforts, moral and intellectual, but transfigures and transcends them both. It is what poetry is to prose.

Matthew Arnold was walking in the steps of the great German theologian when he described religion as morality touched with emotion. But it is more than morality; it is a conception of man's ultimate relations with the universe as well as of his relations with his fellow men. In other words it is a philosophy as well as an ethic; a way of looking at things which does not interpret man by the mechanical processes of nature, but nature by the mind of man. Religion is an interpretation of the deepest meaning of the world and human life. But all attempts at interpreting these obscure and mysterious problems immediately carry us above and beyond the range of science into the domain of Faith. And in this connection it must be remembered that every attempt to interpret the ultimate meaning of the mighty scheme of things or the assertion that such an interpretation is impossible is also an act of faith. Materialism and agnosticism are in this sense faiths quite as much as Mohammedanism or Christianity. Neither the materialistic nor the agnostic outlook upon the world and man is the result of science; it is a result of beliefs about men and things which are incapable of rigid scientific proof. When it attains its highest forms the religious interpretation of the world is to the effect that in spite of troubling shadows and obscurities there is a profound import in the heart of things; a meaning which is identical with all that is best and highest in ourselves. When religious faith becomes religious experience, when men actually trust and follow their highest aspirations they are stimulated and vivified by the practical conviction that their lives are moving forward in harmony with the Supreme Power, the purpose imbedded in the depth of things.

In the letters which have been appearing in this paper on the Decline of the Oxford movement some of our correspondents who probably hate the name of rationalism are yet falling back upon the rationalist conception of religion and define it as "a cast-iron creed." To them religion is not, as most of the great religious thinkers of the nineteenth century believe, an inward disposition of the heart, but a set of intellectual propositions; an affair of knowledge, not an affair of life. It is a theoretical, not a practical matter; it consists in correct thinking rather than in a correct life. They do not seem to be aware that a deeply devout spirit is compatible with very primitive and chaotic conceptions of transcendent and indefinable realities; and, on the other hand, that a mere intellectual assent to a cast-iron creed is often to be found hand-in-hand with an utterly frivolous and contemptible life. Religion regarded as adherence to an intellectual system is an aristocratic conception which would confine its meaning and import to educated and intellectual circles. As a matter of fact the history of religion in all ages and among all peoples teaches us that religion is the reverse of aristocratic; it is one of the most democratic elements in human life. More than anything else it is the soul of the masses; the passionate cry of their spirit; the deepest expression of their distress and aspirations. An intellectual belief a "cast-iron creed" may be a form of faith adapted to a select coterie. But it will always be a hole and corner belief; it will never impress itself on the mind and conscience of the masses of men.

The conception of a cast-iron creed is incompatible with the fact of development; it immediately suffers shipwreck when confronted with the universally accepted results of religious history. Historical enquiry into the religious beliefs of the past arrive in every case at the conclusion that these beliefs are never stationary. They are never in the cast-iron state except as a preliminary to their putrefaction and death. It is true that among barbarous and unprogressive tribes religious beliefs remain in a phase of comparative immobility; in this respect corresponding closely to the immobility of their individual and social life. But among all the progressive races of mankind religious ideas are continually passing through the same process of modification which we find to be at work in every other department of their existence. In most cases the mass of people ignore the changes which are taking place in their religious conceptions. But the process goes on, whether they are conscious of it or not. It would be easy to produce illustrations of this from a variety of sources; but the most familiar and the easiest of access is to be seen in the evolution of religious ideas among the Hebrew people. This wonderful race first appears upon the stage of history as an Oriental nomadic tribe. When we examine the religion of this nomadic tribe what do we find? We find that it has reached a stage corresponding to the wandering habits of an Eastern Sheik. It is a form of belief adapted to the simple circumstances of his life. In process of time these nomads rise to what is usually considered a stage higher in the scale of civilisation; they cease to be wandering shepherds and settle down as agriculturists upon the soil. In the midst of this new set of external circumstances we find the old nomadic religion developing into a peasant religion; a religion not so much for shepherds as for tillers of the soil. In the teaching of the prophets the Hebrew religion reaches a still higher stage of development. Before them the God of Israel was one among many Gods, mightier, it is true, but not the only God. The aim of the prophets was to impress the conception of an ethical monotheism upon their people; to proclaim the great idea that "Jahwe our God is one God." A further development of Hebrew religion took place after the return from Babylon, in the institution of the Law, and its final culmination was reached in the person of Jesus of Nazareth. In all these things we see no cast-iron creed but a continuous process of development. The development of the religious consciousness has not come to an end. It is just as much in progress to-day as it was in ancient Israel.

THE MOTHER-CONFESSORS

THEY may be beautiful or only plain, judged by the standard of mere feature beauty, but they are seldom pretty, because the broader mouldings of their faces forbid the term; more often they have open homely faces. But the light of an inviting sympathy shines in their eyes, and their mouth is soft, to form low soothing words, with full-lipped curves, which never really straighten to a line, or droop—even in age. For by their sympathy with others' trouble they alleviate their own, and in sharing others' joys they keep always young.

They may be broad-lapped mothers, or childless wives, or single women, spinsters by reason of a philosophic strain; but they all look out on to the world with clear, discerning, kindly eyes, and the rounded contours of their mother-faces suggest an instinctive sympathy which understands, beyond the range of woman's usual wit, the varied workings of man's impulses, and knows by intuition what to say. So that by instinct and a certain shining smile they are revealed to those who need a helpful listening friend, who will not blame or preach; and many seek them to confess a wrong, or gain relief from some unburdened sorrow, or tell of dreamed ambitions, or merely to speak their thoughts, for comfort or advice.

It is not that they agree with all, in placid indifference to right and wrong; for, from the very largeness of their heart, they abhor the petty sins of littleness, and speak out cuttingly against mean things, and mete out to droning grumblers and self-pitying egotists the truth in jest. But theirs is the sympathy which can forgive, and make allowances, and cheer, because they understand; therefore, they are sought out when parents, wives, and friends are shunned or fended off, because of their sternness, jealousy, or wit.

And the limit of their sympathy no man can gauge; and most have tried it, but none who have need of it have found it tired. For as they soothe the sobbed-out utterances of a child's mistake, so they give sympathy with almost a caress to tired men and chafing youths who drop, on impulse, the armour of disguise, drawn by an unreasoning certainty of appreciation.

This strange, intangible, pervading invitation goes with them always, so that they never show surprise when suddenly the polite smooth tones of their companion change to awkward short unchosen words, and they hear strange stories of the inner lives of men—regrets and fears for love, and hopes of fame, and bitter hints of folly and of sin.

At dances, on stiff wall-seats underneath the light, they seem to watch the sway and shimmer of the waltz; but they hear all the bitterness of a life's mistake, blurted out by reason of the brooding thoughts of years, and turn exactly at the proper time to speak the simple kindly words, so that the man looks up to look his thanks. From easy garden chairs in the shadow of a tree, they smile back encouragement to enthusiastic eyes, and listen with wonderful understanding to the large vague yearnings of ambitious youth. In the safe seclusion of fashionable crowds they kindly look away, or watch the nervous jabbing of the stick, as young men ask their help to meet some inaccessible, desired girl; but they read the full meaning of the seeming careless words, and suggest, as carelessly, an opportunity. Even between the acts of funny plays they press close up against the cushioned arm of a theatre seat to catch the murmured story of a love which will not hope and dare not take its chance, or the enumeration of another woman's charms, or a tale of gambling and loss; and though they laughed before the curtain fell, and settle in their seat to laugh again, as all goes black, their low-voiced sympathy is none the less sincere, and no mere conventional contortion of the face. For more than anything they love to help.

Even so, they seldom ask for what they hear. They are not curious. But even in the chance proximity of the diner's lot they draw out, with kindly question and accompanying smile, the interrupted hint of surcharged feelings, until it becomes the story of a life; and they give as is required—encouragement or delicately-worded sympathy. And for the few lucky ones they will always crush their skirts to make a seat, and will openly invite them to disclose, or will even stay at home on sunny days, in prearranged seclusion, to listen to long tales of work, and difficulties, and plans; if by so doing they can really help.

It is always by their instinctive knowledge that man must needs confide, that they unconsciously reveal themselves to men. So that men find them everywhere about the world: watching the phosphorescent swirl against the side of ocean-going boats; pacing the well-swept strips of moonlight on the paths of the palm gardens of the South; waving aside the importunities of those who sell in the hotel verandahs of the East; in all the crowded places of the earth.

And seldom do they who consult them have causes for regrets; for in their large understanding they are wise with the larger worldly-wisdom that sees beyond, and seeks for more than merely an immediate relief for present need.

Thus they are arbiters of many fates. By hinted pity they break down the stern reserve which shuts out all the world, because of one deception or mistake; and by their answer to the hard-wrung words they point the way to other efforts and new beliefs. They hear, patiently without reproof, the fierce complaints of youth misunderstood, and counsel the necessary patience with quiet reasonings, because they know the sufferings are real. With kindly-wise decisions they make homes which, but for their sensible coercive words, had never been, except in the pictures of the mind's regrets; and by discerning arguments they arrest the threatened pitiful estrangement of too-exacting husbands and self-willed sons. They brighten with brave all-feeling words the long black period of hopeless days, which comes to all who try, when temporary failure seems permanent defeat, and help the crushed senses to a new conceit, so that the broken struggler can begin again, only remembering the past to learn.

For to all their many confidants they give what is required in return—not penal condemnations of the past, nor futile irksome questions about what is, nor platitudes, but the carefully considered wherewithal to save, or help, or soothe. And by such functions they earn their name.

Letters from Abroad.

THE POPULAR STRUGGLE IN PRUSSIA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The movement for a democratic franchise in Prussia has at last acquired a more vivid character. The declaration of the Government, read by Prince Bülow on Friday last in the Lantag, was unsatisfactory in almost every respect, but nobody who knows the strength of the forces to be considered could expect a different pronouncement. Of all the parties in the Diet, only a small section of the Freisinnige are true friends of a democratic franchise, i.e., the universal suffrage, with the secret ballot, and their followers in the country are not numerous enough to form a sufficient counterpoise against the open or disguised enemies of a radical reform.

With the latter must be reckoned the Catholic Centre Party. It has repeatedly declared for the democratic franchise, but its tendencies, as engendered by the social doctrine of the Church and the material composition of the party, go in the direction of a modernised representation, according to estates. The party voted for the democratic franchise when it was in Opposition, and abandoned this line when it formed part and parcel of the Governmental majority. Although it may at present vote for it again, it will do little or nothing to support a serious agitation in its favour, or to force the hands of the Government. The National Liberals, on the other hand, would certainly want a redistribution of seats, but are opposed to the equal vote, and are in consequence only a temporising or neutralising influence in the Reform movement.

Hence the mainly negative character of Prince Bülow's declaration. The Government does not propose to introduce in Prussia the franchise, as valid for the Reichstag, nor does it intend to introduce the secret ballot. The only measure it held out was an alteration of the graduation of the voting power, which would mean a plural franchise, instead of the present three class system. From a democratic standpoint this is the antithesis of reform. A plural vote, given to "age, learning, and property"—to use the words of Prince Bülow—can only favour the propertied classes, and disfranchise the great class of the wage-earners.

Under these conditions it is encouraging to see that the latter have begun to take to other forms of demonstration than those hitherto observed in Prussia. Already, on Friday last, the day of Prince Bülow's declarations, the streets surrounding the Prussian Diet were crowded with workers, who by voice and attitude showed that they did not mean to be satisfied with a sham reform. To-day, not alone in Berlin, but in nearly all the towns of the Kingdom, processions of workers, numbering on the whole several hundred thousands, if not considerably over a million, have demonstrated resolutely against the mock reform suggested by Prince Bülow.

These demonstrations must not be underestimated. Although on the whole peaceable enough, they signify something of a revolt. The laws on meetings and associations in Prussia, the emergence of the reaction after 1848, make meetings in the open air dependent upon a permit of the police, and forbid any meetings or processions in the town where the King is staying, and its environs. But readers of THE NATION do not need to be told that such precautions are without avail if a people is prepared to fight for its liberty. What can the Government, what can all the police do, against an army of hundreds and hundreds of thousands? They have not prisons enough to put them in, and the workers on their side were to-day sensible enough not to provoke bloodshed, or other serious encounters. Here and there minor conflicts occurred. But in general the demonstrating workers confined themselves to waving red handkerchiefs or pieces of red cloth, letting loose small red balloons with the inscription, "Long live universal suffrage," and shouting words to the same effect. Their presence in such vast numbers, and their determined and buoyant attitude spoke loudly and distinctly enough. This is the first time since 1848 that the capital town of Prussia and other big towns of the Kingdom have seen demonstrations of this kind. Only to-day they were much larger, and much more consciously determined in aim and endeavour than even in the year of the revolution.

It was, indeed, a very important demonstration. At a blow the Socialist workers have set at nought the regulations which deprived them of the right to manifest their will and opinion in the street.

What will the Government do? As far as the demonstration of Friday last went, the semi-official Press did its best to minimise its effect. But this expedient is futile, in view of the demonstrations of to-day. It is possible that restrictive decrees of some kind will be tried; but they would only confirm the importance of the movement, and on the other hand the workers would find other ways and means of demonstrating in the open air. The ice is broken, and the German worker during the years of the anti-Socialist law, has shown abundant shrewdness in outwitting the police.

A different question is the effect of the demonstrations on the decision of the Government and the dominant parties in regard to the reform of the franchise. On Friday last Prince Bülow declared with proud emphasis that no street demonstration would influence the Government. But this has often been said by Governments who afterwards had to give way. As long as they remain peaceful, the demonstrations will not in themselves force the hands of Prince Bülow and his Royal master, and it is not very probable that we shall have serious fighting in the streets. But in all probability the demonstrations will have an invigorating influence on a great section of the population hitherto neutral, or, so to speak, sterilised by the tactics of the non-Socialistic parties and their leaders. Amongst the adherents of the Friesinnige and of the Catholic Centre Party there are a good many who only very reluctantly follow the present tactics of these parties. The Catholic wage-earners, the wage-earners and salaried employees in the Liberal camp, have surely very little to hope from a plurality franchise. Voices to this effect have already been heard in their ranks, but until now the party tie was too strong to allow them due weight in the decisions of the party leaders. Doctor Theodore Barth, the most courageous and consistent of the Friesinnige, and his friends have, so far, been preachers in the wilderness. And even the fact that they had to a large extent the help of the "Berliner Tageblatt," the widely read Liberal paper, did not suffice to create a strong movement in other than Socialist circles for a really democratic reform. It is to be expected that the demonstration of to-day will convince many of the waverers that there is a much more earnest determination in the ranks of the wage-earners than they have thought, and the enthusiasm shown by the latter may by contagion influence the attitude and judgment of many who until now have doubtfully stood aside.

We are on the eve of the election of a new Diet. Of all the announcements of the Prussian Government in the matter one is surely to be welcomed, viz., the decision to leave the reform to the new Diet. The distribution of parties in the present Diet is such that no reform of any value could be obtained. Prince Bülow was silent on the question of the redistribution of seats, because the Liberals want it as much as the Conservatives are against it, and yet it is one of the crucial questions of the home policy of State and Empire. The present distribution gives the agrarians and the clericals excessive advantage over the industrial sections of the nation, and the representatives of the former have the majority in the present Diet. Only a vigorous and deep-rooted popular movement can give the forthcoming General Election something of a revolutionary character, and nothing short of this will end the rule of squire and priest in Prussia.—Yours, &c.,

EDWARD BERNSTEIN.

Berlin, January 13th.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

By an odd coincidence, just as everybody is discussing the changes in the management and direction of "The Times," Mr. Murray announces the approaching publication of the life and correspondence of the famous English editor—John Thaddeus Delane. The book has been compiled from Delane's private diaries and correspondence by his nephew, Mr. Arthur Irwin Dasent, the Assistant Clerk in the House of Commons. Although Delane's early bent was towards medicine, he was in a sense from his early years educated for the editorship of "The Times," as his father held a post in the office of the journal, and the boy's quickness of apprehension and power of assimilating new ideas soon drew the attention of the late Mr. Walter. He became editor in 1841, when only twenty-four, and during the thirty-six years of his editorship "The Times" was the best informed and most authoritative organ of discussion and opinion in Europe. Delane did more than any other editor to establish those traditions of journalistic dignity, power, and breadth of view which form the most valuable of the commercial assets that Mr. Pearson has just acquired.

* * *

ALTHOUGH Delane was a great editor he never was a writer. His great gifts were his skill in choosing his contributors and his insight in suggesting the general lines on which they should treat their subjects. It is a striking testimony to his tact that although he had to deal with practised writers, many of them older than he, rarely did any one of them object to his revisions, alterations, or suppressions. While Delane was editor of "The Times" thirteen British Administrations rose and fell—one under Melbourne, two under Peel, three under Derby, one under Aberdeen, two under Palmerston, two under Disraeli, and one under Gladstone. The period also saw such momentous events as the Repeal of the Corn Laws, the Crimean War, the Indian Mutiny, the Schleswig-Holstein dispute, the Reform Bills of 1866 and 1867, the Fenian Conspiracy, the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, the Franco-Prussian War, and the recrudescence of the Eastern question. As many of the prime movers in these events were among Delane's correspondents, the political interest of the memoir should be little inferior to that of Queen Victoria's recently published Letters. It should also be rich in literary and social interest, as letters by Lord Brougham, Charles Greville, Monckton Milnes, Bernal Osborne, Abraham Hayward, Mrs. Norton, Lady Waldegrave, and many others will be included.

* * *

ANOTHER book announced by Mr. Murray, which promises to be of special interest, is the "Correspondence of George Canning and Some Intimate Friends." It will contain a selection of hitherto unpublished letters, jeux d'esprit, &c., by George Canning, Hookham Frere, Charles Bagot, William Wellesley Pole, Lord Lyttelton, George and Charles Ellis, the Rev. J. Sneyd, Lord Binning, Bootle Wilbraham, and others—a shining galaxy indeed. Canning has formed the subject of several biographies, but none of them give a worthy portrait of the gifted Prime Minister and brilliant author of "The Anti-Jacobin."

* * *

THE fifth volume of "The Cambridge Modern History" on "The Age of Louis XIV." is to be issued about the middle of February. Some of the chapters promise to be of great literary interest. M. Brunetière, who was to have written on "French Literature under Louis XIV. and its European Influence," is replaced by M. Faguet, who lays stress upon the French influence as seen in such writers as Addison, Pope, and Waller. Addison, he says, is the pupil of Boileau, more gifted, more refined, and more brilliant than his master, but still never forgetful of his master's teaching. "Taking everything into account, we find Addison so exquisitely French in his methods that we are often tempted to say of him as Valentine of Milan said of Dunois, 'He was stolen from us.'" M. Faguet inclines to believe that Swift owes little to French models. He had too original and too individual a nature to allow of his being cited as an example of any kind of external influence. Mr. Harold H. Child deals with "The Literature of the English Restoration, including Milton," Professor Gwatkin with "Religious Toleration in England," Mr. Rouse Ball and the late Sir Michael Foster with "European Science in the Seventeenth and Earlier Years of the Eighteenth Century," and the Rev. M. Kaufmann with "Latitudinarianism and Pietism," including such writers as Chillingworth, Hales, Jeremy Taylor, Stillingfleet, and the Cambridge Platonists. Other contributors are Professor A. J. Grant, Mr. Arthur Hassall, Professor Firth, Dr. Hume Brown, and Professor Wolfgang Michaels, of Fribourg.

* * *

MESSRS. CHATTO & WINDUS have made arrangements to publish a book called "The Colour of Paris," illustrated by the Japanese artist, Yoshio Markino, whose pictures in "The Colour of London," issued last year, were talked about so much. A novel plan has been adopted for the letterpress. It is by the members of the Goncourt Academy, each of whom contributes a chapter on some special aspect of Paris. J. K. Huysmans was to have written on the churches of Paris, and had, we believe, almost completed the manuscript before his death last May. The members of the Academy are MM. Léon Daudet, Paul and Victor Margueritte, Gustave Geffroy, Octave Mirbeau, J. and H. Rosny, Lucien Descaves, Elémir Bourges, and Jules Renard. The book will be translated into English, but copies with the original French text will also be on sale.

* * *

THE week has brought news of a serious loss to letters. Dr. Robert Atkinson, Professor of Romance Languages and of Sanskrit at Trinity College, Dublin, was one of the most learned scholars produced by Dublin University during the last century. He had an amazing gift of acquiring languages, and was said to have known as many as Cardinal Mezzofanti. He lectured and examined in French, German, Italian, Spanish, and the vernacular languages of India; and he knew besides Russian, Portuguese, Dutch, and Chinese, as well as being an authority of European reputation on Coptic grammar. But his most valuable services to scholarship were in the field of early Irish. He was one of the few who had mastered its intricacies, and though he had many controversies with enthusiasts of the Irish language movement, maintaining that no great literature existed in Irish, he always held that its value to the student of philology was immense. As a teacher Dr. Atkinson was most inspiring. He was far from being a pedant, and though his abrupt manner and vehement expression were often disconcerting, all his students held him in affection. Among his services to scholarship may be mentioned an edition of the medieval "Vie de St. Auban," his criticisms of different editions of South Coptic texts, his Todd lectures on the "Leabhar Breac," and his splendid glossary of the Brehon Laws, a work of enormous research and of extreme value to the Royal Irish Academy Dictionary now in progress.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Wanderings in Arabia." By Charles M. Doughty. (Duckworth. 2 vols. 16s. net.)

"Sixty Years of Protection in Canada." By Edward Porritt. (Macmillan. 5s. net.)

"No. 10, Downing Street, Whitehall; Its History and Associations." By C. E. Pascoe. (Duckworth. 21s. net.)

"Mother Earth." By Montagu Fordham. (Chiswick Press. 5s. net.)

"Ludwig the Second, King of Bavaria." By Clara Schudi. Translated by E. M. Hearn. (Sonnenschein. 7s. 6d.)

"The Book of Elizabethan Verse." Chosen and Edited, with Notes, by W. S. Braithwaite. (Chatto & Windus. 6s. net.)

"Wild Honey." Poems. By Michael Field. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"Christianity and the Social Order." By the Rev. R. J. Campbell, M.A. (Chapman & Hall. 6s. net.)

"The Blue Lagoon." By H. de Vere Stacpoole. (Unwin. 6s.)

"Correspondence et Voyage à l'Etranger." Par Th. Dostoevski. Traduit du Russe par J. W. Bienstock. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France. 7fr. 50.)

"Etudes de Diplomatie Anglaise de l'avènement d'Edouard Ier. à celui de Henri VII." Par Eugène Déprez. (Paris: Champion. 5fr.)

"Paris sous Napoléon—La Religion." Par L. de Lanza de Laborie. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 5fr.)

The Drama.

TOWARDS A NATIONAL THEATRE.

THE volume which Mr. William Archer and Mr. H. Granville Barker have compiled* is fascinating to read as a romance. Here are no vapourings of unpractical lovers of the theatre who content themselves with the vague statement that England should have a national theatre, but a hundred practical details of its management and elaborate estimates of its cost, from the salary of the director down to the wage of the scene-painter's labourer. Nothing has been forgotten. The seriousness of the authors grips the imagination, and one can almost hear the sharp sound of the bricklayers' trowels at work on a National Theatre, and there seems hardly time enough to settle the repertoire and engage the players before the curtain will be ready to roll up for the first time. The scheme is not half-hearted. There is no advocacy of small beginnings. Our authors estimate that the total sum required to set a National or Central Theatre afoot, with every probability of success, amounts to £330,000. This sum is made up of £75,000 for a site, £105,000 (the authors seem, however, to have made a trifling mistake of £1,000 in their addition) for the building and equipment, and £150,000 for a guarantee fund. "Supposing," it is added with pathetic liberality, "that we are £50,000 out in our reckoning, and that a total of £380,000 proved to be necessary, is that a sum which should have any terrors for the wealth and public spirit of England?" The question is embarrassing. Nothing ought to be easier than to raise £380,000 for a National Theatre, but when even our hospitals have to go begging for necessary funds the prospect of finding even a third of the money Messrs. Archer and Granville Barker demand is sufficiently remote. They do not expect Parliament to grant money; they rely on the last resource of all, the millionaire who has the interests of British drama at heart. He should put down his £104,000 or £105,000 (according to one's power of addition) for the building and equipment, and one hundred and fifty rich gentlemen would follow with £1,000 apiece for the Guarantee Fund. A second millionaire would have to provide the £75,000 for the site, unless the London County Council or the Government made it over for nothing or for a mere song. At first blush this estimate seems excessive, but it must be borne in mind that the authors are calculating the expense of a permanent National Theatre on margins which would allow the experiment to be worked out for all it is worth. The money would not be entirely sunk in the case of the theatre being a failure. When the Guarantee Fund is reduced to £30,000, and there is no possibility of raising more, the theatre would be sold, and it is estimated that each of the donors would receive about fifty per cent. of their donations. An original feature of the scheme is that the profits would be devoted to buying the theatre from the donors, and settling it as a national concern. It is to be hoped that this volume will be perused by several millionaires, who will not be discouraged by the genial and easy manner in which Mr. Archer and Mr. Barker juggle with their thousands.

In the meantime, it may well be asked if so much money is really needed for the foundation of a National Theatre. To begin with, it would surely be possible to obtain a site from the London County Council for considerably less than £75,000, or even £50,000. Nine years ago, when the Council was approached with the view of subsidising an opera-house, the memorial was sympathetically received, and a report stated that the Council recognised that it would do well to co-operate with private individuals to ensure the permanence of such a scheme. Instead of waiting for the shy millionaire, would it not be more practical to have the theatre built by the London County Council on such terms as would be favourable alike to the promoters of a National Theatre and to the interests of the community? According to the estimate of Messrs. Archer and Granville Barker, the outside cost of the building would be £80,000, and the value of the site £75,000—in all £155,000. If this money were advanced on mortgage at the low rate of interest which the public good of a National Theatre would permit, the undertaking would not be saddled with an excessive expense. At three per cent. it would amount to £4,650 per annum and the Council might quite properly waive all questions of rates and taxes. Indeed, Parliament might be asked to grant a small subsidy which would more than cover this expenditure. The annual total expenses, according to the estimates, would amount to £71,000 odd. The full capacity of the house is estimated as £300. If the average receipts were only £100, there would be a deficit, it is calculated, of £30,000 on the year's work. This includes the formation of a Pension Fund, which might be left over at first. Would it not be sufficient to obtain guarantors for £90,000, which would cover the deficit of three years at the low average receipts of £100 a night? There is still the equipment of the theatre to be paid for, calculated at £20,000, so that some £110,000 would have to be raised. That is a formidable sum, but not quite as impossible as Messrs. Archer and Granville Barker's £330,000. If one rich man, or several rich men, or hundreds of moderately rich men, could be persuaded to subscribe this amount, there is little doubt that the building and site would be provided by Municipal or State authorities on the terms already suggested. The trouble is that no persistent effort has been made to raise this money, and until private individuals have shown that they are willing to give practical support to such a scheme, Municipal or State aid, in however modified a form, cannot be expected. But the most futile form of expectation is that a millionaire will put down his £180,000, and that another £150,000 at least will be subscribed for a Guarantee Fund.

*"A National Theatre: Scheme and Estimates." By William Archer and H. Granville Barker. Duckworth & Co. 5s.

As to the necessity of a National Theatre there is no room for doubt. Year after year the state of the British theatre has become more and more chaotic. The players are marred by the long runs; the plays are marred by the actor-managers. In addition, there is now a most unhealthy state of competition fostered by the methods of American syndicates and those who have to fight them. The long run is absolutely necessary to success in the present state of the theatre, and the long run means that no play, unless it appeals to the mass of theatre-goers, can be mounted at a commercial theatre. That, more than anything else, keeps our best minds from writing for the stage. Even those theatres which aim at something higher than the provision of digestive entertainment are compelled to throw artistic aims aside in order that a big public may be attracted. Above all, the ordinary commercial theatre is compelled to charge prices which make play-going impossible for all but wealthy people, or those who do not object to intolerable discomfort. The scheme put forward by Messrs. Archer and Granville Barker is based on prices which would be within the reach of all. It is a mistake to suppose, however, that a National Theatre would therefore be in competition with the vested interests of the commercial theatre. On the contrary, it would probably act as a stimulus to theatre-going by attracting numbers of people who have lost the habit of witnessing plays. Such a theatre would help in the renaissance of our dramatic literature, and, by its affiliated school of acting, would do much to raise the standard of the actor's art.

Poetry.

UT CARO INFIRMA!

KEEP, O my heart, the lifted road
Unsoiled and silent and remote,
Where, if the mists about me float
They stir with whisperings of God.

Yet tread, my feet, the dusty way,
The common highway filled with men;
Give back, mine eyes, their looks again
And touch, my hands, their hands all day.

Ah God! that cloud on cloud should roll
Down 'twixt the human eyes and me.
That darkness in the day should be,
Dust in the pathways of the soul.

LUCY LYTTTELTON.

Letters to the Editor.

LETTERS BY A WORKING-MAN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Though my tool is the pen and not the spade, I hold myself in a very real sense a working-man. As such I have been much interested to find myself and my fellow labourers directly addressed in a series of educational letters by "J. St. L. S." in your contemporary, the "Spectator." In his latest dissertation the writer kindly says that he will put his argument (which is concerned with something that he calls Socialism) in "the simplest form possible, the form which is sometimes patronisingly called suitable for children." I feel duly grateful. I like to get at the A.B.C. of a thing, and it is certainly in the A.B.C. of economics that "J. St. L. S." lives and moves.

Indeed, he is reconstructing the science from the base. His arguments have knocked the bottom out of all those clever young Extension lecturers from Oxford, whom I have sometimes attended, and who seemed to know so much about capital and labour. He exploded the seeming learning of Professor Marshall and all the other economists whom they gave me to read. The books and the lecturers told me that there used to be a theory of the Wages Fund which laid down that wages were paid out of capital and limited by the amount of capital, so that to increase capital was to increase wages. Now they told me that this theory was dead as a door-nail, that it was slain by Thornton thirty or forty years ago, and that Mill went to its funeral and certified the death. They said that there was no one so far behind the times as to revive it. They reckoned without their "J. St. L. S." What does he say? Good man, he wants to "give the working-man a greater share in the profits of industry." So far he merely resembles everyone else who sets out to lecture the working-man on the methods which he is employing to secure such a share. But mark the difference. "In my belief there is only one absolutely certain way of doing this, and that is by increasing the amount of capital in the world." Here is the old wages fund theory again—slain, perhaps, by Thornton, but re-incarnated in a newer and wiser personality. More power to the elbow of Pierpont Morgan and Rockefeller. The more their millions pile up the more pennies they can afford to the working-man. Do you ask proof? Look across the Atlantic at this moment.

I used to think that my employer hired me for wages. But "J. St. L. S." has set that right, too. It is I who hire him, I find, and my bosom swells with pride. It is he who earns wages, I find, and I who pay them. "Capital is always trying to earn wages under the name of interest." . . . "The men who do work of all kinds, mental or mechanical, are in the best position when they can go into the market and hire capital cheap to help them in the work of production." This has made me think a bit, and I am in two minds whether I shan't tell them at the office next Saturday that they must take a reduction or quit. But there is one thing that bothers me. "J. St. L. S." says that the lower the rate of interest on capital the more money is left over for wages. But the political economists always said that it was not interest but profits which wages cut into. They told me that profits and interest were things which no one but a beginner would confuse, and they appealed to my own knowledge to show that the employer who runs the mill is not necessarily the same as the capitalist who advances the money. They said I could not begin the serious study of the subject without distinguishing these things, and yet here is the supreme wisdom coming out of its cave to set me right and lumping them all together. I admire, but I am puzzled. However, I quite understand one point. I "want to breed capital, just as a farmer wants to breed cows and horses," only I want to breed in my own savings bank, and not, oddly enough, in the pockets of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan. I don't want to "destroy" capital; I want to have some of my own.

In the second edition of the A.B.C. "J. St. L. S." tells me that if the workmen are to gain more wealth there must be more wealth in existence. Of course, I agree with "J. St. L. S." that 2 and 2 make 4. But 1 and 3 also make the same sum, and 1 may say to 3, "Divide more equally, and the total product will go round satisfactorily enough." This is a part of the Socialist's position, and, though it may be quite wrong, I think, with submission, that it really wants something less A.B.C.-like than "J. St. L. S.'s" argument to refute it. I have talked with various Socialists in my time, but never with one who would admit that his object was to "confiscate private property and dole out to each individual a subsistence portion." I fancy, too, that most Socialists would maintain that the "compulsion" to work, which they recognise as part of Socialism, is not so very far from the "self-interest" which, according to "J. St. L. S.," is the mainspring of competitive industry, viz., the necessity (which they would apply to all classes alike) for each man to earn his own living, and the desirability of improving his position by honest and useful effort. Perhaps there is some "compulsion" in the existing order. Could anything but necessity lead a woman to work twelve hours a day for ten shillings a week? Are nail and chain workers properly regarded as free to follow where enlightened self-interest leads, or are they shut in to a Hobson's choice between semi-starvation on the one side and the workhouse on the other? I am afraid that unless "J. St. L. S." will advance a little further than the A. B. C. of the subject, he will not satisfy even simple-minded working penmen like myself, to say nothing of silencing those wily fellows who get the ear of the mob. In all humility, then, I would urge him to go a little further. After destroying Jevons and Marshall, and re-writing economics, let him descend upon the prosaic facts of our time, not in that spirit of simple idealism with which we were familiar in the nursery, but in a manner more suited to an age when even working men have become sophisticated. Pending this development of his argument, which no doubt will follow in due season, though prepared to hear and obey, I must confess to some mental reserve.

I do not know how it is, but somehow a good deal in these matters seems to depend on the point of view. "The essential thing," says "J. St. L. S.," "is to leave capital and labour alone"—as they did a hundred years ago. Well, if I could get hold of a little mill and have a few women and children in my employ, I rather think I should agree. If I could keep the mill going all the twenty-four hours with two relays of children of five and six working twelve hours each, with no pay but only their keep, and a whip to keep them awake, I rather think I could make my cent. per cent. as men did in those roaring times. And with each dividend my factory would grow, and more children would be taken on, and of course I could pay larger sums in wages or in keep. Then I should see clear; then I should whole-heartedly agree that when things are left alone "labour will get its just reward in a greatly increased remuneration." Then I should be sure that "most of the things that we do nominally to help labour really injure it by reducing wages." Indeed, I should read a little lecture to the children every Sunday after the brimstone and treacle had been served out. I should prove to them conclusively that, struggle as they might for shorter hours and more pay, they could only injure themselves, while every extra pound that they earned for me was potentially a pound for them. And, my sense of humour being developed on "Spectatorial" lines, I should expect them to believe. But, Sir, as it is, I am a working-man myself, and I have read a little history. I have also read a book called "Mary Barton," and it has given me a tolerably vivid picture of the "good old days." And so long as I remain a working-man, though I yield not a jot in my admiration and awe, I am afraid I cannot altogether agree about leaving capital and labour alone. But give me a little capital for myself—and you will see.

This last point is my sole justification for the length of this letter. But it is one on which I feel very decidedly.—Yours, &c.,

A MERE PEN-DRIVER.

THE HOUSING QUESTION IN GERMAN TOWNS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Bernstein, in his interesting letter on "The Land Question in German Towns," says: "Recently I have seen in an English paper much praise of the German system of mapping out whole plans of town enlargement before any permits of building in the respective districts are granted. Systematic laying out of street plans, &c., has surely its advantages. But before imitating the German example, people would do well to get information on all the features and effects of the system. For until now it has been practised in a way that has made it one of the most powerful agencies of raising the price of building lands to quite usurious levels." The last sentence of this passage has probably caused some readers of Mr. Bernstein's letter to feel anxiety for which there is no real foundation. Mr. Bernstein's statement is quite accurate, but a fuller statement respecting the facts to which he refers will show that the harm which has been caused in some German towns by the misuse by very undemocratic municipal authorities of one of the powers conferred on them by town-planning Acts—the power of deciding what shall be the width of each street—could not be caused in our towns, owing to the difference between our housing customs and those of the Germans, and also to the difference between our and the German municipal franchises. A brief examination of the Prussian Street Lines Act of July 2nd, 1875, will give some idea of the powers respecting town-planning given by the municipal authorities in all parts of the German Empire. The Act says that the street-lines and building-lines for the making or alteration of streets and squares in towns and country places are to be decided on, in accordance with the public needs, by the executive part of the municipal government in conjunction with the elected members, subject to the agreement of the local police authority; and that lines can be fixed for single streets and parts of streets, or, to meet the foreseen needs of the near future, can be laid down by means of building-plans for larger areas. Owners of land have to give up the land needed for half the width of the street, provided that the street does not exceed twenty-eight yards in width, and they have to bear the cost of making the land into a street ready for traffic.

The Act has received a very large interpretation. The foreseen needs of the near future are held in most places to be those of the next twenty or thirty years. The power to make plans is held to include that of deciding in what direction each street shall run, whether it shall be straight or curved, of what width it shall be, whether it shall be planted with trees or not, what squares and planted open spaces and playgrounds shall be provided, what sites shall be reserved for public buildings; and the power is also held to include that of reserving different districts for different uses—some for dwellings and others for mills and works—and that of allowing dwellings of different heights, and either in rows or detached or semi-detached, to be erected in the different residential districts—dwellings of five storeys in rows in one district, detached or semi-detached, dwellings of only two storeys in another. All these various powers, with the exception of that of allowing or enforcing the making of wide streets, have been used in the new districts of most large German towns with great advantage to the whole community. The power to allow, or enforce, the making of wide streets has been by no means wholly mischievous. German towns have gained very great advantages from wide streets in the right places—in places, that is, where there is much traffic. But a great deal of harm has unquestionably been done by having all, or nearly all, streets in residential districts of great width. It is this arrangement which has been the chief cause of the rapid production of blocks of barrack-dwellings, and of the remarkable rise in the price of building land and in rents of houses. How the construction of the wide street involves that of the barrack-dwelling-block and the rise of the price of land and of rents is very fully and lucidly explained by Professor Eberstadt in his "Influence of Speculation on the Construction of the Modern Town,"* and much less fully and less clearly in an article, partly based on Dr. Eberstadt's book, which I have contributed to a recent number of the "Municipal Journal." Here I can only say that the cost of making half the width of a wide modern street, with all the necessary sewers and pipes, is so great that interest on it cannot possibly be included in the rent of a house of only two storeys, and that hence those who build on such streets are compelled to carry their buildings to the greatest height allowed by the by-laws, which in Germany is now five storeys; that the German by-laws enforce the use of thick walls and fire-proof staircases, and that therefore every part of a five-storey building is very costly; that, as very wide streets cannot be placed near each other, cheap plots of land adjoin each street, the whole of which, owing to the excessive use made of all land in German towns, is so dear that it must be covered as fully as possible with buildings, and therefore side and back-blocks of barrack-dwellings are added to the blocks which adjoin the wide streets; that thus each complete block, which holds three or four hundred persons, is so large and expensive that very few persons can afford to build one, with the result that most such blocks are built by the owners of the land on which they are built, now generally speculators who build in order to realise the higher value which building on it gives to their land; that, having built the block, the speculator, as a rule, parts with it to a man who has little capital and who pays perhaps a tenth of the price, perhaps nothing, and gives a mortgage for the unpaid part, and makes a high rate of interest on his little capital if he can maintain or raise rents, and is ruined if rents fall; that half the seats in a German Town Council are reserved for house-owners, many of whom are of the kind just described, and that two-thirds of the members are elected, under the "Three-class system," by the class to which land speculators belong. This compressed description will suffice perhaps to show that, as it is to the interest of all holders of land that the value of their land shall not be lowered by the competition of cheaper land, and to the interest of all owners of barrack-dwelling-blocks that their high rents shall not be reduced by the competition of cheap dwellings, there is a probability that the power to decide what width new streets shall have, given by town-planning Acts, will continue to be so used in many large German towns as to ensure that most new streets shall be very wide and most new buildings shall be of the barrack type, while in this country of two-storey houses and democratic town councils it would be almost impossible that the power should be used as it has been too often in Germany.

Mr. Bernstein mentions that Dr. von Mangoldt believes the first condition of an effective reform in German housing to be the right of compulsory expropriation of land, and a democratic reform of the municipal franchise. I think that Dr. von Mangoldt is right with regard to the need of a reform of the municipal franchise, but I can see no reason to believe that the giving to Town Councils of the power to expropriate land would much lower the price of lands or rents. German towns have the right to buy land in the open market, as our towns also ought to have, and they find the right a most valuable one. But it is evident that the holding by towns of a great deal of land does not suffice to make land cheap, or to lower rents. For many German towns already own much land; Frankfurt-on-the-Main, for instance, owns 58 per cent. of all the land within the town boundaries, without reckoning the area of streets and other roads, or the beds of rivers and pools, Hamburg and

* "Die Spekulation im neuzeitlichen Staedtebau." Von Dr. Rud. Eberstadt. Jena: Gustav Fischer.

Aachen 45 per cent., Munich and Mainz 20 per cent., and even Berlin has a large amount of land; and yet land in and round all these towns is far dearer than in and round our large English towns, which hold very little land. The cause of the difference is that German towns allow a much larger population to be crowded on to their urban land than is found on ours. So long as an excessive use is made of land, it does not matter at how low a price the land is sold; the people who use it are sure to have to pay its full market price. The true cause of the great dearness of Berlin land, and of the high rents of Berlin dwellings, as compared with land-prices, and with rents in our towns, is that the population per acre in Berlin is 160, while that of London is only 62. If the German authorities will use the powers given them by their town-planning Acts to limit the population in new districts all round their towns to the London average, they will lower the price of land and bring down rents without having to expropriate land.

In justice to German municipal authorities I must say in conclusion that, if we judge the German and English systems by their fruit, the condition of their inhabitants, we have to admit that the German system is on the whole the better of the two. All observers who are neither German nor English, and who know the towns in Germany and here, so far as I know, and many English observers believe that the physical and mental condition of the urban Germans is higher than that of the urban English. It is true that the death-rate is higher in German towns than in ours, but one chief cause of this is probably the fact that the greater severity of the German winter makes it necessary to use stoves instead of our open fireplaces. The Japanese seem to have been so much impressed by the good quality of German town-government, that they have gone so far in imitation as to adopt even the German "three class system" for the election of Town Councils!—Yours, &c.,

T. C. HORSFALL.

Swanscoe Park, near Macclesfield.

January 13th, 1908.

THE PREMIER'S PLEDGES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am delighted to see that THE NATION still presses the Government to save its own credit by announcing a policy of retrenchment. Its procrastination so far has been entirely disastrous both to the taxpayers and to the Liberal Party; and I venture to express a sincere hope that for the sake of his own good name and future reputation (which should surely count more than the temporary advantage of placating a handful of Liberal Jingoists), Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman will now abandon the impossible task of sanctioning, on the one hand, the new, costly, and bellicose schemes of Lord Tweedmouth and Mr. Haldane; and on the other of promising new expenditure on social reform, so soon as funds are available. It seems extraordinary that a peace and economy Government should within the last year have (1) sanctioned the most costly reorganisation of the British Army ever proposed, one moreover that is less pleasing to its own party than to the Compulsory Service League; (2) initiated the most wasteful naval harbour and dock scheme ever foisted on the taxpayers; while at the same time (3) committing itself to a universal scheme of old-age pensions. All this is for a year of declining trade and decreasing employment, when a war tax on sugar that robs every working man's family of several pence a week is still required for the ordinary expenses of Government. These sharp inconsistencies become accentuated in the light of your quotations from Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman's speeches as leader of the Opposition. If the excuse for procrastination is that the Liberal Imperialist Ministers make economy impossible, the answer is, "Why did they join the Government?" And surely in any case the fulfilment of solemn pledges and of a great national duty should override personal feelings.—Yours, &c.,

RETRENCHMENT.

London,

December 13th, 1907.

MUSIC-HALL WRESTLING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter of "A Spectator" on this subject is most admirable. Music-hall wrestling either bores or brutalises. It is absolutely out of place in such surroundings, and is nauseous and irritating. I hope that it will soon disappear entirely from the variety-houses. The most painful part of the business is to see the enthusiasm which it excites in women.—Yours, &c.,

P. BEAUFAY.

The Playgoers' Club,

January 14th, 1908.

BRITISH JOURNALISM AND THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A press cutting agency has sent me an extract published in the "Catholic Times" of the 4th inst., from an article with the above title by a Mr. Richard Davey in the "Catholic Union Gazette," the official organ of the Catholic Union of Great Britain, of which the Duke of Norfolk is president, and Mr. W. S. Lilly secretary. The article contains the following passage:—

"Our Press half a century back was fairly independent; to-day it is controlled, in most cases, by proprietors and even editors who are not of our race, history, or religion. English journalism is now almost exclusively represented on the Continent by men of Oriental origin, generally Agnostics, to whom Christianity, if not absolutely repugnant, is of little or no account, and, therefore, they see no great harm in its annihilation, but quite the contrary."

In plain English, the British Press is in the pay of the Jews, and its foreign correspondents are "almost exclusively" men of Jewish extraction inspired by a bitter hatred of Christianity. One might pass over in silent contempt this manifestation of the anti-Semitic mania, were it not put forth under the auspices of the leading Roman Catholic society in England, of which Mr. Davey is, it would seem, an official. But, since this is the case, perhaps you will allow me to call on Mr. Davey to substantiate his assertions.

We all know who are the principal proprietors of the London daily papers. It is true that Mr. Walter, Lord Glenesk, Mr. Arthur Pearson, Lord Northcliffe, Sir George Newnes, Mr. Cadbury, Sir Alexander Henderson, the Messrs. Lloyd (to take some names at random) are not Roman Catholics; since England is not a Roman Catholic country, it is hardly to be expected that they should be. But we have been accustomed to regard them as fellow-countrymen. It would be interesting to have the evidence which has convinced Mr. Davey that they are not of British "race, history, or religion."

In regard to the foreign correspondents, I can only say that, so far as Paris is concerned—and, from the context of Mr. Davey's article, Paris would seem to be specially indicated—the statement quoted above has no relation to facts.

I call on Mr. Davey to state how many Paris correspondents of English papers are, to his knowledge, of "Oriental origin," and to produce evidence for his assertion that they are "almost exclusively" men who "see no great harm" in the annihilation of Christianity.

What this representative of the Catholic Union really means is that those whom he attacks do not regard it as part of their duty to revile the French Republic, to excite anti-French feeling in England, or to distort facts in the interest of the papacy. And some of them have committed the crime of pointing out that the policy of Pius X. is ruining religion in France; in so doing they are but expressing the private opinion of the intelligent minority of French Catholics—bishops, priests, and laymen.—Yours, &c.,

A PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

Paris, January 11th, 1908.

"THE RECURRENCE OF DISEASE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I was glad to see the able letter signed "J. H." commenting on the above article. The direct defence of vivisection is not now so frequent in the Liberal Press, but it is indirect and persistent. In August, 1906, you were good enough to insert a letter from me protesting against the insidious pro-vivisectionist assertions in a review of Professor Metchnikoff's book, and there have been other instances of it since.

As I said in 1906, the vivisectioners are quietly dropping discredited claims of vivisection proper (cutting up animals alive, &c.), and they have substituted new claims from the new line of inoculations, which in their turn become discredited. As to Professor Metchnikoff ("the great sane optimist" of your article writer), the vista opened up by his serums is indeed wondrous. He predicts serums against old age, "only injecting animals with finely minced atoms of human organs, such as brain, heart, &c., when serums would be drawn off capable of acting on these organs" ("The Nature of Man," p. 246).—Yours, &c.,

D. SCOT SKIRVING,
Lieut.-Col. (Retired).

Wokingham.

January 13th, 1908.

"NEW WORLDS FOR OLD."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In THE NATION of January 11th, Mr. Wells' coming book, "New Worlds for Old," is described as a novel. We enclose a description of the book, from which you will see that your announcement is quite incorrect. We should be much obliged if you would contradict this announcement in the next number of your journal.—Yours, &c.,

ARCHIBALD CONSTABLE & Co.

January 14th, 1908.

"THE VIRGIN BIRTH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The gist of your reviewer's reply to my criticism is evidently contained in the words: "Considering that no contradiction is offered by the author to the paternity of Jesus, I thought his weight went with Philip's phrase." I have tried to imagine the introduction of such a contradiction into the narrative. It does not seem possible to conceive of it as other than an incongruity. I suspect, had it appeared, critics would have been found by the score to suggest that it was, obviously, an interpolation of a later date. It still seems to me that your reviewer's assumption is a somewhat slender support on which to rest a statement of such importance to his argument.

My remarks on the use of the word "throughout" raised a point of minor importance. I am sorry your reviewer has not quoted with precision the words to which my criticism referred. They were, "The fact that He is throughout spoken of as 'the seed of David according to the flesh'." The italics are mine. Your reviewer now substitutes "regarded as," for "spoken of as." He will, no doubt, say that, though the use of the one expression is not the precise equivalent of the other, the change is immaterial. In my simplicity, however, I accepted "spoken of as" quite literally, seeing that the scripture words which followed were in inverted commas. Had "regarded as" been used in the first instance, I should certainly not have done so.—Yours, &c.,

WM. WINDSOR.

Lyndhurst, Lancaster Road, Birkdale,
January 13th, 1908.

THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As an early Victorian myself, might I add to Lady Rendel's list of children's books the names of some I devoured before the age of nine?

"Anna Ross" was a great favourite. The story was laid in 1815. I must remark that my unregenerate mind preferred the first to the latter half of the book. The "Fairchild Family" consisted in the original edition of three volumes. Now, alas! only volumes one and three have been reprinted. Volume two was much the more interesting, probably because it was the most worldly, mentioning the little misses going to their dancing lessons in "mob caps, laced aprons, and slips of lilac silk with pink spots." This description was entrancing to one whose family and friends thought hankering after a pink sash a notable step onwards to perdition.

"Laneton Parsonage," three volumes, was absurdly straight-laced. The second best bad girl for acquiescing in a deception in which she had neither act nor part was visited as punishment, I presume, by a severe illness. For a young French governess, whose depravity was such as to drive out with gay friends in the Bois de Boulogne on a Sunday, a broken neck was the probable consequence.

"Henry and his Bearer," by Mrs. Sherwood, a goody story, but as children we liked it; also stories on the Church Catechism by Mrs. Sherwood, and as the plot is laid in India, one got interesting details of life in barracks in the early 'eighties. On the heroine's return to England the book becomes stupid.

"Charlie's Discoveries," really a useful little book, not spoilt by Charlie becoming a prig.

"Hunting Mrs. P.," meaning Pride, more amusing than you would think.

The "Fairy Bower," a sequel (to what?), by Miss Moberley, written in the early forties.

My child's library was limited, being but a child, but before I was ten I had read all through Lady M. Wortley Montagu's letters. We were a large family; our reading was encouraged, but "Memoirs," chiefly pious ones, were specially recommended, though not appreciated by our youthful minds.

"Amy Herbert" was not supposed to be "quite sound"; this sent me hunting from cover to cover to find out in what the book failed. I failed signally to discover any unsoundness, unless it were that the heroine was shocked at her cousin not attending the church services on Wednesdays and Fridays.

My experience is that in a usual way very young children do not care for stories of their contemporaries if the latter are made to talk "babyishly." They consider "nursery talk" beneath their dignity, and resent it as "silly." A child of four, especially if he has younger brethren, is not, as he will tell you, a baby. My definition of a "prig" is a young person of either sex whose virtues and knowledge and self-appreciation are what a small relation of mine would call "excelsior." The same young person being a regular Miss Malaprop, insists upon the term train-bearer being synonymous with a trainer.

Many "Early Victorians" must have enjoyed, as I did, having the memory of our childish libraries rubbed up in Lady Rendel's delightful letter to THE NATION. I should add to her list Jacob Abbott's "Famous Stories," which were a ceaseless joy to me. I have a strong impression that the beloved "Camp of Refuge" has been reprinted during recent years. Where our well-worn copy went to I cannot tell. Some horrid person impeached its historical accuracy—as if that mattered when a child's mind has had noble nourishment from it. I remember finding Kingsley's "Hereward the Wake" a very pale affair after "The Camp."

"The Swiss Family Robinson," Miss Porter's stories, "Elizabeth, or the Siberian Exile," "The Prairie Bird" (Sir C. Murray), are not necessarily for children.—Yours, &c.,

January 11th, 1908.

EARLY VICTORIAN.

VILLAGE LIBRARIES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I wish, through your columns, again to thank the kind friends who have helped me to put right one or two inaccuracies which I undoubtedly committed in my recommendations of children's books. I am also as much interested in your article on "Village Libraries," and I should like to proffer some few remarks upon them. I have had some slight experience in the village life in Wales, as well as in England.

The Welsh are certainly more ready to read, more quick to understand, discriminate, and pass on their acquired knowledge. Are not these frequent Eisteddfods held even in the small towns a proof of this? Prizes are offered for essays on various subjects, and I believe these prizes are allotted with the utmost care and fairness. Till I went to Wales I imagined the Eisteddfod perhaps an annual institution, achieved through great trouble and effort; now I find that the Eisteddfods are numerous, and also to be described as various. I only mention this as indicative of the Celtic spirit of enterprise, which reveals itself so frequently, so creditably, and so successfully in the individual Welshman. To prove what I have said about the Welshman's greater love of books, let me mention that on two occasions, once in a shepherd's hut away in the hills, I found a shelf of books; the second time in the cottage of a woman who kept the gate of the level crossing still more books, and when I looked through them in each case, the books were of a strongly religious turn, abstruse and theological, and in both cases I borrowed a book which interested me deeply. My friend at the level crossing was still attending the Sunday School class for adults, which your readers will know is the custom in Wales, and this custom was brought most particularly to my notice during a visit we had from the late lamented Tom Ellis, M.P., who, spending a Sunday with us in Surrey, begged to attend the Sunday School class (as it was his habit in London and elsewhere to hold an adult class). I did my best, but the few urchins I could muster (the Sunday School being somewhat of an exceptional character in our village) were hardly worthy of the great man's attention.

About the choice of books for village libraries, I do beg those equally interested with myself in such a matter to start with the easiest and plainest, and not to venture on classics till they are asked for, or the applicants qualified to enjoy them.

Perhaps the exceptions might be Macaulay's Lays, most choice bits of Tennyson and Browning, Montgomery's "Climbing Boy" (chimney-sweep), to read to a juvenile class. For women and girls especially, "A Peep Behind the Scenes," "Only a Girl's Life" (Mercier), "Jill the Flower Girl," "Mrs. Blackett's Story" (C. Elliot), "A Trap to Catch a Sunbeam," A. M. Alcott's "Little Wives," "The Experience of Life" (Miss Sewell), all Pett Ridge, all Frank Bullen, most of George Macdonald's novels, Ian Maclaren, and very little, only the earliest ones, of Barrie.

Most American stories I find more ready to please than English, such as those by M. E. Wilkins, K. Douglas Wiggins, and Mrs. Coates.

Dickens' "Christmas Chimes," the three stories, "Cricket on the Hearth," I found too difficult for those I was reading to; the other choice bits of Dickens from his varied novels would have done admirably, but what is there more depressing and impossible than reading over the heads of your audience? It is much better to change the book at once than to discourage the listeners.

On one occasion, when a village library in Sussex was being started or furthered by a gift of books, among them were found several volumes of a gentleman's magazine, published in the early 'fifties, or before, and profusely illustrated by coloured sketches of gentlemen in costume, modes, and fashion plates, such as we have now in so many of our fashion magazines for ladies.

We agreed that our library would hardly benefit by accepting these, so they were relegated to the children and their scrap-books, for which these travestied fashion plates were eminently suitable.

If people possessing old or odd numbers of the good old "Chambers' Journal" or "Magazine," would dedicate them to help start a "village library," the readers would find material for amusement and edification, and library shelves would not much miss the folios. The type is small, more's the pity.

I feel that the few books I have mentioned in haste will be considered sadly inadequate by those who are studying the matter; but I shall hope to do better in a little while.—Yours, &c.,

ELLEN SOPHIE RENDEL.

January 13th, 1908.

CHILDREN'S THOUGHTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondents have been writing lately of children's books. You may be interested to hear an example of children's thoughts, often so obscure to their parents and teachers. On Christmas morning my small boy of six was taken to church by his sister. He is not usually devout, but on this occasion he buried his face in his hands, and whispered something with much earnestness. "What did you say?" asked his sister. "I said 'A Happy Birthday,'" was his reply.—Yours, &c.,

PARENT.

"PREMATURE BURIAL."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Referring to Mr. Basil Tozer's letter in THE NATION of the 11th inst., if one may judge by the extent of correspondence and comments in the Press, and the numerous inquiries for information, the question of reform in the burial laws, so as to ensure effective verification of death in all cases, appears to have taken a firm hold on the public mind. Every day, and for years past, letters reach the present writer from persons who are anxiously concerned in the movement for the prevention of premature burial. A majority emanate from women, who, according to medical observation and authority, are more liable to conditions of trance, death-like exhaustion, syncope, and other forms of suspended animation, which in some instances appear to be a suspension of life, as none of the ordinary so-called tests for death seem to apply. Not a few correspondents relate cases of narrow escape from living sepulture in their own families, and it is usually through witnessing the liability to such terrible occurrences that the writers have first had their attention called to the subject. Clearly this reform, which has been now for many years demanded in the interests of humanity and for the safety of the public, should be made a matter of urgency by Parliament.—Yours, &c.,

JAS. R. WILLIAMSON.

100, Chedington Road, Upper Edmonton, N.
January 11th, 1908.

THE TACTICS OF WOMEN SUFFRAGISTS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your criticism, in last week's NATION, of Mr. Haldane's speech, draws attention to an attitude now being taken by many Liberals, which is strongly at variance with every Liberal tradition.

The justice of our claim for suffrage is admitted, but we are to be refused the franchise because our tactics displease! Are these the principles of high statesmanship?—Yours, &c.,

E. L. C. WATSON.

Avenue House, Clifton, York.
January 14th, 1908.

MR. STEAD AND THE NAVY ESTIMATES.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am asked to draw your special attention to the following resolution, which was passed unanimously at the last meeting of the National Council, on January 10th:—

Resolution.—"The National Council of Peace Societies observes with great regret the statement by Mr. W. T. Stead in the 'Review of Reviews' for December, that 'the peace party' is 'even more anxious to maintain our naval supremacy than the Jingoos.' The Council, which contains representatives of nearly every peace organisation in the United Kingdom, is unaware of any 'peace party' holding the above-quoted opinion."

In view of the latest deliverance of Mr. Stead in the January number of the "Review of Reviews," the above declaration becomes increasingly necessary.—Yours, &c.,

H. S. PERRIS,
Hon. Secretary.

40, Outer Temple, Strand, London, W.C.
January 15th, 1908.

Reviews.

THE EMPRESS PULCHERIA.*

THE writer of this interesting book to some extent disarms criticism by her modest preface. She makes no claim to original research, and has been content to draw chiefly from secondary authorities of repute. It would have been well had she consistently adhered to this resolution. Here and there she refers to the original authorities in translations, and in a way which somewhat disfigures her notes. Notes in such a work should either be altogether omitted, or they should be full and accurate enough to serve as guide posts to students. But such notes as "Socrate's (sic) History, Bohn's Translation," or "Gibbon," "Finlay," "Bury," without reference to page, or even chapter, give no assistance or confirmation, and by their seeming carelessness arouse perhaps undeserved suspicion. We are also bound to take severe notice of the negligence with which staring mistakes, especially in the spelling of proper names, have been allowed to pass. Our eyes are offended by such forms as "pagent," "dyptich," "simonaical," "eclectical" for dialectical, "primercerius." But more striking is the guise in which some of the principal characters appear on the stage. The heroine is more than once Plucheria; the wife of Theodosius, Athenias; the Pope, St. Celestius; and these are matched by Placida, Rhadagasius, Honorious, Illyrium, Bythnia (at least three times). These may appear mere trifling slips of attention. But their number and repetition give an impression which, we are glad to say, is in many respects unfair to the authoress. For, accepting her own conception of her task, this book has considerable merit and interest. It is written from the standpoint of a devout Catholic, and its judgments, especially of great Churchmen and heretics, must be checked by those of more impartial writers. The authoress is from temperament and training inclined to glorify the ascetic life, and the characters who stood fast for the creed of Nicæa and loyalty to the seat of Peter. But with all this we do not quarrel much. Asceticism had a great work to do in the society described by John Chrysostom and S. Jerome. And the Roman See, when occupied by a Leo, in the wreck of the Western Empire, may rightly attract the admiration even of students far aloof from the Catholic Church.

Miss Teetgen fully recognises the scantiness of the materials for forming a clear conception of the real character of Pulcheria. Sozomen is a mere eulogist. Socrates almost ignores her. But the authoress is perhaps rather apt definitely to attribute to Pulcheria merits and political services on mere plausible inference or conjecture. As Mr. Bury has pointed out, much of the success of the reign of Theodosius was probably due to statesmen like Anthemius, and to the Byzantine Senate. Theodosius himself was a mixture of weakness and obstinacy, and was very much at the mercy of those who surrounded him. The great merit of Pulcheria was that she saved her brother from the allurements and corruption assailed by John Chrysostom. It was an immense change from the meretricious airs of Eudoxia to the severity of Pulcheria. The vigour of the great Theodosius survived in his granddaughters of the East and West. Left regent at sixteen, Pulcheria took a vow of virginity with her sisters, and headed a beneficent reaction against the tide of frivolous sensuality which had disgraced the court of Arcadius. The palace assumed the grave quietude and austere devotion of those great houses on the Esquiline where Paula, Lea, and Marcella had led a cloistered life, under the direction of S. Jerome, until they retired to the deeper seclusion of the convent at Bethlehem. The sisters of Theodosius gave their time to regulated devotion, sacred reading, and that needlework and gorgeous embroidery which were demanded by the lavish splendour of the Eastern Court. The education of Theodosius was carefully watched by his sister. He was trained in habits of devotion, according to monastic rules. Yet Pulcheria did not exclude the culture in grammar and rhetoric which had still a deep tinge of Paganism. She herself instructed him in the minute arts of kingly bearing, which were specially important at such a court. And the Emperor, in spite of weak health, became a sportsman and enthusiastic polo player. The splendid shows were maintained as of old; the furious contests of Red and Green still went on in the Hippodrome, and the Emperor, and even his nun-like sister, were compelled by opinion to attend them. In spite of his general weakness, Theodosius once faced the old tiger-like craving for cruelty with the haughty answer: "Blood flows not in my presence." But the monastic training gave the tone to his inner life. Like the brethren of the cloister, he spent long quiet hours in copying and illuminating MSS, in the study of herbs and gems, and in delicate painting on wax. Some of his work is said to have been still extant in the thirteenth century.

The marriage of Theodosius to Athenais, the daughter of a Pagan sophist at Athens, is a startling event in a court with an atmosphere of conventual devotion. The ghosts of old philosophies still haunted the groves of the Ilissus, and Athena had still worshippers on her holy hill. A strange destiny bore the young Pagan Platonist to the circle of Pulcheria. And, stranger still, the Catholic devotee took Athenais to her heart, and made her the bride of Theodosius. The pleasure of seeing her convert's baptism into Holy Church must have been reinforced by a fascination which at once captured the languid passion of the Emperor. The two women were parted in the end by a tragic fate. But for years, the new Empress and the masterful daughter of the great Theodosius seem to have lived in harmony. How far Athenais, or Eudocia, to give her her imperial name, influenced her husband we can hardly tell. But we may, perhaps, surmise that the foundation of the University of Constantinople, which, with the Theodosian Code, is the greatest glory of the reign, may have been inspired by the daughter of Leontius. The wavering policy of Theodosius in the Nestorian controversy may also have been due to dim influences of the Platonic schools.

It is curious to observe that the Eastern Empire, which at the beginning of the fifth century, might seem honey-combed with corruption, and doomed to a speedy fall, passed safely through the great crisis of Gothic and Hun invasions, and emerged in the middle of the century under a line of strong and reforming rulers. In the reign of Theodosius II., the Persian war and the invasion of the Huns were the only striking external troubles. The feuds of Churchmen and the ferocity of Councils, aroused by metaphysical subtleties as to the Person of Christ, occupy a far larger space in the annals. Miss Teetgen, in some good chapters, reminds us that it was far different in the West. In the childhood of Pulcheria, Sueves and Vandals had swept from the Rhine to the Pillars of Hercules; Rome had been thrice besieged by Alaric, and the magic of that great name was vanishing. In the year in which Pulcheria assumed the regency, the Visigoths, under Ataulph, were occupying Southern Gaul, and the Burgundians were spreading along the Rhone and the Upper Rhine. In the years when the fierce factions of Cyril and Nestorius were swarming in the streets of Ephesus, and convulsing Asia with savage conflicts over a barren dogma, Aetius, the last great general of Rome, was harrying the Visigoth in Narbonne, and holding back the Frank chivalry on the rivers of the North, while the Vandals were sweeping across Roman Africa, and stamping out Roman civilisation and the Catholic faith. Pulcheria, in the calm of the opening reign of her husband Marcian, heard from afar the tales of Attila's terrible march across Germany to the conquest of the West, and the defeat of his hosts on the Catalaunian Field by Theodoric and his Visigoths, fighting under the standards of Rome.

Pulcheria had to endure much before the peaceful and honoured close of her career. In the fierce theological conflicts of the time, even her spotless character did not escape the foulest aspersions. She was a steadfast, perhaps bitter opponent of the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies. Her sympathies were all with the Western Church. The baneful eunuch rule, which had re-appeared in Chrysaphius, struck at her power, and for a time led to her retirement from the Court. She had to bear the estrangement of Eudocia, and to witness the imperial household darkened by the scandal of Paulinus and the exile of the Empress to Jerusalem, where the daughter of the Pagan sophist, after her strange and brilliant career, was weaned from her heresies by the counsels of a lonely anchoret, and was laid to rest beneath the shadow of Olivet. Pulcheria died as she lived, wielding substantial, though often secret power over the secular and religious questions of the time. She regained all her old influence over Theodosius before his death, and formed a Platonic union for State purposes with the worthy Macan, his designated successor. The energy of her grandfather, flashed out in an order for the instant execution of Chrysaphius, the eunuch favourite who had darkened the court by his baneful ascendancy. Her last years were gladdened by the triumph of orthodoxy at Chalcedon, and the ebb of the Hunnish invasion of the West. The woman who apparently should have succeeded Paula as Superioress of the Convent at Bethlehem wielded for forty years immense power in the Councils of the Empire. She was probably a hard and narrow, but an energetic and ambitious character, one, perhaps, by nature more interested in the minutiae of dogma than in the fate of peoples. Yet, after all, she belonged to the elect order who, in an age of coarse luxury and cruel self-assertion, clung to the ideal of charity, and ministered to the poor and the diseased. She, probably, if we knew all her services to Church and State, deserves better of posterity than if she had buried herself in the impotent seclusion of an Eastern convent.

* "The Empress Pulcheria, A.D. 399-432." By Ada Teetgen. Sonnenschein, 10s. 6d.

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON.*

It is unnecessary to describe the format of the well-known volumes which belong to the Eversley series. Sufficient to say that Messrs. Macmillan are well advised in issuing their new edition of Tennyson in this form. The strong, simply-bound volumes are small enough to be held with ease, and substantial enough to take their place in a library; and along with those of Lamb, Matthew Arnold, Kingsley, &c., they are in suitable company. At present we have only the first volume of the new edition, containing all the authorised poems written not later than 1835, though some of them were first published long after.

The editor is Hallam, Lord Tennyson, son of the poet, whose object seems to be to present a reader's edition wherein there may be as little irritation as possible from editorial matter, and where the poet may be left to explain himself. There is no preface or introduction. The notes are reduced to small compass, and are put at the end. The editor mentions the date of publication of each poem, occasionally gives brief comparisons with other passages, or a few sentences from Fitz-Gerald, Arthur Hallam, and others, explaining the circumstances under which various poems were written. The majority of the notes are those of Tennyson himself.

The pieces are arranged, as in previous editions, chronologically; but this rule, hitherto pedantically observed, has here been departed from in one or two cases. For instance, "Mariana in the South," usually placed after "The Lady of Shalott," is carried back to its natural place after "Mariana." "The idea of this came into my head between Narbonne and Perpignan," is Tennyson's own comment on the later poem, and we have the words written by Arthur Hallam to Donne:—

"It is intended, you will perceive, as a kind of pendant to his former poem of 'Mariana,' the idea of both being the expression of desolate loneliness, but with this distinctive variety in the second, that it paints the forlorn feeling as it would exist under the influence of different impressions of sense. When we were journeying together this summer through the South of France, we came upon a range of country just corresponding to his preconceived thought of a barrenness . . . and the portraiture of the scenery in this poem is most faithful."

Many of these early pieces were afterwards touched up or considerably altered, and that is one reason why there is so little that is really crude among them. Tennyson told us of one alteration which George Eliot did not think an improvement. As it stands now we read—

"Heard a carol, mournful, holy,
Chanted loudly, chanted lowly,
Till her blood was frozen slowly,
And her eyes were darkened wholly,
Turn'd to tower'd Camelot."

* "The Works of Tennyson." Annotated by Alfred, Lord Tennyson. Edited by Hallam, Lord Tennyson. Poems. Vol. I. Macmillan. 4s. net.

George Eliot preferred the third line as it was originally:—

"Till her smooth face sharpen'd slowly."

There can be little doubt that, though the emended line is more regular and rhythmic, George Eliot is right; the earlier verse is infinitely more subtle and suggestive. Tennyson was always more sensitive to perfect musical expression than to the exact expression of an idea. He seems to feel real annoyance when Coleridge complains of his double words. "Coleridge thought because of these hyphenated words that I could not scan. He said that I ought to write in a regular metre in order that I might learn what metre was—not knowing that in earliest youth I had written hundreds of lines in the regular Popian measure." Had Coleridge lived to read the whole of his poetry surely this would have been the last criticism he would have made. Tennyson stands by the side of Wordsworth, Keats, and Coleridge himself as one of the few imaginative poets of this country who have achieved something little short of perfection of form.

And it is this which makes us certain that the fame of Tennyson will survive the attacks made upon him by the fashionable critics of to-day. In the poems which he wrote in the thirties he anticipated Victorian sentiment; he probably did much to create that sentiment; and there can be no doubt that he was adorned with the laurel and held his place in the hearts of his countrymen during the second and third quarters of the century because he so thoroughly expressed the ideas and feelings which were prevalent then. Now we live in the time of reaction against those thoughts and feelings. We are apt to be as scornful of Tennyson as we are devoted to—Mr. Kipling. We are apt to regard "New Year's Eve" as typical of his poetry; and it is true that the sentimentalism which is exaggerated in that poem does occur even in some of the best of his work, giving triteness to a thought which otherwise would have passed muster.

And yet there is that obvious fact which none of the hostile modern critics can deny. He had a perfect mastery of his tools, a faculty of putting magic into musical language such as no poet subsequent to him has had, with the single exception of Mr. Swinburne. And though there are passages of lyrical intensity in the latter which Tennyson could never have equalled, Tennyson on his part preserved a fidelity to his art and his ideals which enabled him to go on year after year, decade after decade, not only producing more poetry, but poetry which became more perfect as his own character became more mature. Mere quantity in poetry, if it is poetry at all, must always count. Though Tennyson never wrote anything of surpassing imagination like "Christabel" or "The Ancient Mariner," he was so completely endowed with the poetic nature that he went on ceaselessly writing beautiful poems without exhausting his powers. Nor was it by any means that he was facile. His art took toll of his energies, as he has told us; yet he died with the swan-song on his lips.

It is surprising how much that is still accounted great is to be found in this the first volume of the series. "The Lady of Shalott," "The Two Voices," "Oenone," "A Dream of Fair Women," and "Morte D'Arthur" are only some of the notable poems included. We are told that he himself considered the "Ode to Memory" as one of the best of his early nature-poems. This looking back to the "dewy dawn of memory," we can well understand, attracted Tennyson himself as it attracts most people advanced in life; but perhaps it specially pleased him because he loved to dwell lingeringly upon the habit of reflection and the philosophic attitude, not realising that here he was weakest; that (we must except "In Memoriam") his greatest strength lay in his supreme lyrical expression of simple moods and simple external things. Here, then, in these earliest of his published works Tennyson struck the note which speedily made him a popular poet, a poet who rejoiced in the ordinary things, thoughts, and sentiments of life, but who had the power of seeing them constantly idealised and made beautiful in the light of his own fine instincts. In his outlook he remains the same always. There is development in his technique and in his knowledge; but not much development in his philosophy or mental atmosphere. He goes on through half a century singing the same sweet songs, uttering the same child-like faith, seldom perhaps coming closely into touch with the harder sides of life. But his works remain, not a mass of half-digested words from among which we may cull a few masterpieces, but a consistent body of achievement, of literature finished and perfect of its kind.

We may end by quoting the second of two sonnets entitled "Love," which have not been included in other editions:—

"To know thee is all wisdom, and old age
Is but to know thee; dimly we behold thee
Athwart the veils of evil which enfold thee.
We beat upon our aching hearts with rage;
We cry for thee; we deem the world thy tomb.
As dwellers in lone planets look upon
The mighty disk of their majestic sun,
Hollow'd in awful chasms of wheeling gloom,
Making their day dim, so we gaze on thee.
Come, thou of many crowns, white-robed Love,
O rend the veil in twain! all men adore thee;
Heaven crieth after thee; earth waileth for thee;
Breathe on thy winged throne, and it shall move
In music and in light o'er land and sea."

THE LAST OF MEDIEVAL ART.*

It is but little that is known of the Van Eycks, but that little no one is better fitted to expound in its minutest details than Mr. Weale, who for years has subjected the lives and the work of the two painters, together with their surroundings and the circumstances in which they lived, to a fond and microscopic scrutiny. It is the results of this prolonged scrutiny which are gathered into the present ample and beautifully illustrated volume. We are presented, to begin with, with an exhaustive list of contemporary documents in chronological order bearing on the subject. This is followed by a similarly complete bibliography divided in three sections; the first comprising manuscripts and early printed books; the second dealing with the biography and art of the two brothers; and the third referring to their discoveries and technique. Next comes a brief chapter of five and twenty pages into which is packed, in the form of a slight biographical sketch, all the knowledge of importance which it has been possible to amass, and which, indeed, must seem but a few and scanty gold grains to result from such elaborate and extensive washings. Finally, we have a concluding and much longer section describing and analysing in detail all the recorded works of the two painters, a task which is rendered the more acceptable and interesting to the reader by the careful and admirable reproductions of the paintings which accompany the text.

Such briefly is the book before us. It contains probably all that ever will be known of the life history of the artists. To the select and studious band whose vision is concentrated on this particular niche in the history of art, a work like this is a necessary luxury, nor will such a trifle as five guineas be allowed to stand in the way of its acquisition. Outside this chosen few, however, its appeal cannot hope to reach. It is a book for the specialist and it is so because the art it deals with is itself an art of the specialist. For that, after all, is the truth about the art of the Van Eycks. However much we may bring ourselves to admire, and the more we examine the more we must needs admire, this art—the most delicate and perfect in technique that has existed and, moreover, so singularly fascinating in its combination of child-like naïveté with profound sincerity—we never can look upon it as really our own, or think of its methods and processes as instruments in the rendering of modern life. Faith, sincerity, simplicity, candour, humility, these are the lovely moral quantities that seem embodied in the conceptions of the Van Eycks and Memlings. But in the quality destined to be the governing factor in the modern world they are deficient. They do not possess intellect. We cannot imagine the art of the Van Eycks used to express the cultured broad-minded life of an intellectually developed age.

It is here we touch the difference between early Flemish and early Florentine art. In spite of all its loveliness, the early Flemish is a finite and finished thing. Purely medieval in its attitude of mind and moral qualities, it is medieval also in its intellectual poverty. There is in it no flexibility, no vitality, no promise. It marks the end, not the beginning of an epoch, and for future ages it will be rather a record of a state of things for ever passed away, than a still living and still active influence. But Giotto? . . . The mere mention of the name strikes a chord that still vibrates. It was the happy fortune of Florentine art to develop and grow in conjunction with a development and growth of the mind and intellect. The mind of Italy, when Giotto worked, had already produced Dante. Nothing of a like quality of mental depth and richness ever issued from medievalism, and this conjunction of Giotto with Dante should be sufficient of itself to convince us of the intellectual fecundity of the soil the Italian Renaissance was rooted in. In this the promise of greatness in Italian art lay. From the first moment of its awakening, its strength keeping pace with the strengthening of all the faculties of the mind, Florentine painting is on its way to the attainment of a foreseen ideal; and that ideal is to render itself the fit and flexible instrument for the expression of a life of all-round mental culture and intellectual development. In Giotto already that purpose is declared, and declared as with a trumpet note. It is Giotto, and this is his eternal glory, who first faced the problem how to make of painting a vehicle for the exposition of that wider life upon which Italy was then entering. It is for this reason that he is modern, that he lives, not with the interest of a record of the past, but with the force of an influence still vital, and moreover, is recognised as so living, not by those only who appreciate art, but by thousands who realise in a dim sort of way that his point of view, full-facing reality, was in the main our point of view, that it was, in a word, the intellectual, as opposed to the medieval point of view.

It is by realising all that early Florentine art gains by its intellectual appeal that we best understand all that early Flemish art loses for the want of it. Not until, in a later age, Flemish art has assimilated the vital Florentine teaching, will it become a living function. In the hands of the Van Eycks, painting, however beautiful in various ways, is a dead language; something which may interest and fascinate but which does not intimately concern and affect us. We may go to it, but it cannot come to us. And as there are few who can thus detach themselves from their own age and cast themselves back into another, the appreciators of these last exquisite utterances of medievalism must needs be few. Mr. Weale has probably gauged the situation rightly in the preparation of the present work. Little is known of the Van Eycks, but let what little there is be collected with an infinite care and research; let it be enriched with all documents touching, however remotely, the fringe of the subject, and, having been carefully bound and beautifully and profusely illustrated, let it be presented to the small band of the devout at the rate of five guineas a copy.

MR. GLADSTONE'S CHURCHMANSHIP.*

MANY persons would be inclined to doubt if this were worth the doing; the special study, at this time of the day, of Mr. Gladstone as a "Leader of the Church." Mr. John Morley and Mr. George Russell might seem, between them, to have fairly covered the ground. Most readers will be convinced, however, before they have closed this volume, that Mr. Lathbury has fairly justified its production. It is not a study of Mr. Gladstone as a man inspired by ardent religious convictions; who, behind all the show and pomp of worldly success, preserved that heart of fire whose full interpretation is not yet revealed. There is little here of the revelation, even as given in the "Diaries" of Mr. Morley's biography, of that "inner life" whose history, he himself declared at the end, "has been with me extraordinarily dubious, vacillating, and, above all, complex." Mr. Lathbury examines the outward energies of a statesman and writer, as these energies became woven into the record of the organised religious life of England. He describes an interest in Church affairs which never flagged or decayed, an absorption in the controversies of the day as well as of the centuries, a mind ever watchful, ever splendidly courageous, defiant even in defeat, as it brooded over the interests of a Church which commanded its utter devotion.

* "Hubert and John Van Eyck: Their Life and Work." By W. H. James Weale. John Lane. £5 5s.

* "Mr. Gladstone." By D. C. Lathbury. Leaders of the Church Series. Mowbray. 3s. 6d.

It is written—in a sense—to a definite position: in part to vindicate Mr. Gladstone's consistency in all those apparent changes of policy which led so many to brand him as dishonest and time-serving; in part to vindicate the old "High Church" position which was so repugnant to the minds of such large masses of English citizens. Mr. Lathbury has great pleasure in exhibiting this "Leader of the Church" as giving the lead along lines which he himself has advocated so strongly—in preference (for example) of secular education to "undenominational" education; in refusal to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the civil court in ecclesiastical cases; in an acceptance rather of Disestablishment than of any modified State-broadened Church of England. Mr. Lathbury is astounded, upon examination, as every biographer is astounded, at the almost superhuman toil of the man. In that "spacious and unwearied mind" there was found room for the energies of many ordinary inspirations.

"Many stories used to be told in illustration of his marvellous faculty of turning his whole attention to some question of theology in the very middle of a political crisis. Thus, in the autumn of 1856, when his reconciliation with Lord Derby and the Conservative party was believed by many to be imminent, and certainly held a large place in his own thoughts, Lord Aberdeen describes him as writing 'volumes upon volumes' about the trial of Archdeacon Denison, and complaining that it did not suffer him to sleep. In fact, no ecclesiastical issue escaped his eye, or was too small to claim his attention. He has an unquestionable right to be called the most eminent lay Churchman of his own, perhaps of any generation."

This critic admirably distinguishes the two bedrock beliefs whose clashings and combinations formed the key to all the variations of sixty years. The one was devotion to the Church, as a definite reality; a tangible and not a phantom instrument for the redemption of the world. With all its subtlety and often tortuous self-examination—the qualities which made Disraeli call him "The Jesuit of the Closet"—Mr. Gladstone's mind remained firmly objective. It was no subjective and mystic entity, but the Church as an external agency, operating in the lives of men, that claimed his allegiance. His apprehension of it arose quite suddenly in a vision in St. Peter's at Rome, where he declares he first understood the meaning of this cosmic organisation as a living teacher and guide. Afterwards the second principle crept into his soul and came steadily to effect more influence there as the years went by—the principle which, as he complains, Oxford had never taught him, of the absolute value of individual human Liberty, not as a means towards an end, but as an end in itself. That saved him from the narrower clericalism which so many of his own religious belief have to-day adopted—the notion that freedom of thought is too dangerous to be widely encouraged, especially amongst the lower classes; the notion that compulsory religion is distinguishable from no religion at all. Men who had been taught to believe that Gladstone (in the last phase) was "half a Romanist," were astonished at the fury with which he assailed the "Vatican Decrees" and held this to be merely an elaborate piece of duplicity. But the fury was easily explicable in the recognition that here he thought he saw the best thing in the world being converted into the worst. And so the decent Church squires and clergymen of the early eighties were equally convinced that he was acting a part when they heard the appeal in what was, perhaps, the greatest speech of Mr. Gladstone's life, by the greatest Christian in Europe, for the free admission of uncompromising Atheism into the House of Commons. "In myself," said Gladstone afterwards, "I think I can truly put up all the change that has come with my politics into a sentence. I was brought up to distrust and dislike liberty. I learnt to believe in it."

The progress from "The State in its Relations with the Church" to the Affirmation Bill is a long and adventurous journey, fully set forth in these pages. "The Protestant faith," he said at Newark in 1835, "is good enough for us, and what is good enough for us is also good for the population of Ireland." The argument appeared unanswerable until that strong solvent, belief in liberty, fretted and wore it away. Mr. Lathbury reveals, and endeavours with some success to interpret, the great moments of crisis in Mr. Gladstone's political life—almost all of them concerned with religious questions: the resignation on the Maynooth grant, the Gorham judgment, with the "going over" of Hope and Manning, the fierce, unaided fight against the Divorce Act which, in the minds of many competent observers, seemed to have made him for ever impossible as a practical politician. He expounded here unpalatable doctrines "to a House of Commons by turns indifferent, amazed, and indignant." An unfriendly chronicler, whom Mr. Morley quotes, describing a ten-hours' sitting on a single clause, states that "including questions, explanations, and interlocutory suggestions, Mr. Gladstone made nine-and-twenty speeches, some of them of considerable length." As to the Irish Disestablishment, his critics, says Mr. Lathbury, "did not read far enough, or think deeply enough, to realise that it was not Mr. Gladstone who had abandoned his theory, but his theory which had abandoned Mr. Gladstone."

Towards the end, the definite ecclesiastical interests become subordinate to the one dominating question of Ireland, which this man came more and more to believe, with the faith of a "practical mystic," he was called upon to settle by the direct calling of God. He fought through it, struggling in heroic combat against cowardice, compromise, and the accumulated evils of six centuries. These broke him in the end. The great adventure failed. The Irish Question remains still unsettled. Then, when all had been done that man could do, and all done in vain, he turned to the ultimate question of all. "I wish that every young man could have seen him," wrote the Bishop of St. Andrews, at the last, "as he weighed his life, not in the balance of earth, but of heaven, as he reviewed the past and anticipated the future." "He anticipated what everyone will one day learn when the books are open and the record of life is revealed."

THE NEAR EAST.*

IN "Europe and the Turks" Mr. Noel Buxton has written not merely the best and most useful handbook to the Eastern Question; he has made it at the same time a model of what such a piece of pleading should be. Not a phrase is overstrained, not a charge exaggerated, and the argument develops with a cogent logic which reinforces the evident sincerity and the depth of feeling which animate every page. Mr. Buxton inherits a great name and a proud tradition. He has led the movement for the emancipation of Macedonia with an ardour and a wisdom worthy of his ancestor who fought shoulder to shoulder with Wilberforce in the cause of the slaves. In this little book, which is brief without being slight, he shows an intimate knowledge of his intricate subject and a grasp of its history which ought to carry conviction even to the coldest critic.

There is perhaps little that is new in the chapters which describe the actual condition of Macedonia. On few questions of foreign policy is there such a mass of literature in existence, and there are few questions on which the authorities are so nearly unanimous. But Mr. Buxton has succeeded in retelling the story with vigour and skill, and his very conciseness is in itself original. His main argument starts from the Treaty of San Stefano, shows by what a wanton intervention English diplomacy robbed the Macedonians of the liberties which the Russian armies had won for them, and draws with irresistible force the moral of our historical responsibilities. The present chaos is our work, and on us more than upon any other Great Power falls the duty of leadership in the task of disentanglement. As to ways and means, Mr. Buxton is opportunist. Any solution which will rid the country of the direct rule of the Turks is for him a good solution, and he would welcome equally autonomy or European control or partition among the neighbouring Balkan States. The last solution is impossible without war; the first would be bitterly resented by Servians and Greeks. In some form of international European control lies no doubt the key to the future. But the great merit of Mr. Buxton's book is not merely that it states the facts clearly and well, debates the solutions with a catholic mind, and discusses the diplomatic difficulties with candour and a sense of responsibility. It makes an appeal to simple humanity and national honour with a direct eloquence and a forcible simplicity as precious as they are rare in the literature of modern politics.

* "Europe and the Turks." By Noel Buxton. John Murray. 2s. 6d.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.*

It is a pity that so many of our novelists should to-day sit down to write without first mastering the contents of Tolstoy's "What Is Art?" For although Tolstoy, in his campaign against "upper-class art," wrongly contends that "good art acts on people independently of their state of development and education," his complaint that a great deal of modern art is a counterfeit, an imitation of art, is only too well founded. According to Tolstoy, the essential quality of art—feeling experienced by the artist—is often entirely absent from novels and stories which otherwise may be well written and are often moreover filled with well-observed and carefully noted details.

After reading a hundred and forty pages of "The Explorer" without being affected by any emotion, we asked ourselves whether the novel does not fall within Tolstoy's category of "counterfeits." Many things are recounted in Mr. Maugham's pages. Lucy Allerton, the heroine, for ten years watches the ruin of the Allerton fortunes, and discovers that her brilliant father, "who had seemed such a paragon of chivalry, is weak, unreliable, and shifty." The old country house, "Hamlyn's Purlieu," is sold, and the family is broken up, and then Mr. Allerton, when an undischarged bankrupt, swindles a Mrs. Saberton out of eight thousand pounds, and is sentenced to seven years' penal servitude. Further, the career of the hero, the masterful African explorer, Alec Mackenzie, is traced for us, and we are told how he and Lucy Allerton fall in love, and how Lucy confides her brother George to the explorer to make "a good and strong man of him":—

"On a sudden, a thought flashed through her. She gave a little cry of amazement, for here was the solution of her greatest difficulty.

"Yes, you can do something for me. Will you take George with you?"

"George?"

"He remained silent for a moment, considering the proposition.

"I can trust him to your hands. You will make a good and strong man of him. Oh, won't you give him the chance of washing out the stain that is on our name?"

"Do you know that he will have to undergo hunger, thirst, and every kind of hardship? It's not a picnic that I'm going on."

"I'm willing that he should undergo everything. The cause is splendid. His self-respect is wavering in the balance. If he gets to noble work he will feel himself a man."

"There will be a good deal of fighting. It has seemed foolish to dwell on the dangers that await me, but I do realise that they are greater than I have ever faced before. This time it is win or die."

"The dangers can be no greater than those his ancestors have taken cheerfully."

"He may be wounded or killed."

"Lady Lucy hesitated for an instant. The words she uttered came from unmoving lips."

"If he dies a brave man's death I can ask nothing more."

"Alec smiled at her infinite courage. He was immensely proud of her."

Now this passage, which is neither better nor worse than ninety per cent. of Mr. Maugham's pages, does not convey anything of the subtle character of life; the conversation is leaden, regular, mechanical, falling from the lips of carefully adjusted automatons. There is no artistic feeling in it, and whether the author spun it out of his brain, or whether he felt anything when he wrote it, is a mystery to us. On the stage such a conversation might pass muster, because the actors by their personal touch would mask the lifelessness and abstract character of these unnatural phrases. Consider, for example, carefully: "Oh, won't you give him this chance of washing out the stain that is on our name?" "The danger can be no greater than those his ancestors have taken cheerfully." We might feel a wave of contagious feeling passing through an audience if this last sentiment were "carried off" by the personal force of a Duse, but in fiction the author has to supply by his art the slight, subtle touches in which the personal secrets of character lie. And without these his art is a dead thing. Those who have visited Rodin's studio may have noticed certain statues in marble, replicas of the great sculptor's work, executed by his apprentices, scored with tiny pencil marks which indicate where the subtleties of the contours have been missed. The ordinary eye will not notice the difference so long as the general effect is approximately true, so it is not surprising that at the other end of the scale the secret of the huge popularity of many of the most mediocre artists should lie in some crude and "striking" generalisation (say of Miss Marie Corelli) being carried out by details all of them false and all exaggerated. Mr. Maugham, however, is not a competitor with Mr. Hall Caine, and we ask ourselves how comes it that ninety per cent. of "The Explorer's" pages are artistically as dull as the passage above quoted? It is not as though he had no good work to his credit. "Liza of Lambeth" showed originality and feeling, though the notebook was too much in evidence. "The Making of a Saint" was highly imaginative, in the best sense; but in "Mrs. Craddock" and "The Merry Go Round" the author took to painting elaborate pictures of the dissatisfied, bored, or vapid life of men and women in society, and however correct was the information dispensed, the artistic feeling was almost negligible. The effect, indeed, of Mr. Maugham's later novels is as though they were written on a scientific formula, and the author had lost the power of feeling the life that intellectually he is comprehending. The point is of some interest critically, as in so many English novels we find a gallon of "information" to a ha'porth of artistic power. Thus in "The Explorer" the presentation of Mackenzie's career both in Africa and England is too flat and measured, and is in keeping with the tone of an essay in biography or a magazine article. Only twice in the novel are sensations of pleasure communicated to us, first in the scene where George Allerton defies Mackenzie and plays the blackguard—a scene that is probably inspired by the Stanley Relief Expedition—and secondly where Dick Lomas is proposed to by Mrs. Crowley. In the face of this amusing passage, remembering how Mr. Maugham has failed to arouse more than our sceptical indifference by his pictures of family disaster and dishonour, colliery accidents, tortured lovers, and the like, we suggest that the author should eschew sentiment and essay social comedy. His Mrs. Julia Crowley, the American woman, amuses us, and we wish to know her. In short, she makes us feel, and is not that, as Tolstoy says, the first test of a work of art?

In "Mr. Strudge," Mr. Percy White has written a clever piece of satire, which would be far more telling if it had not taken the autobiographical form. Maximilian Hereward Strudge, the son of a greengrocer, is adopted and educated by "The Pretorians," a philanthropic society, which is a composite photograph, so to say, of the dilettante ideas of middle-class Socialists of the 'eighties. It is the aim of the Pretorians to imbue the rising democracy with the altruistic ideals of "the service of man," and in the founders, Algernon Vyse and Mrs. Hessel, the author has "taken off" the spiritual lineaments of the schools of thought led by Edward Carpenter. Young Strudge by nature a cunning, greedy, and adroit rascal, assimilates easily everything in the "service of man" ideal which he can turn to his advantage, and after becoming the organising secretary of the "Pretorians," entraps Petronia Hessel, the daughter of his patroness, into a clandestine marriage. The least pleasing feature of the book is that its effect on the unsophisticated public is to tar Socialists, Radicals, and reformers generally, with the brush of humbug, the brush that has been used so freely of late in certain organs of the London Press. Mr. Percy White is not particularly convincing in his fabricated picture of "Pretorian" circles, but we confess that we find Strudge amusing when, after refusing to help them materially, he preaches the "higher altruism" to his father, mother, and brother, who indignantly protest that he is "a Socialist on the make." The ironic method is justified when Mr. Strudge is brought to book by the indignant young women of his own class, to whom he makes love surreptitiously, but it is a failure when Mr. Strudge is trying to blacken the social aims of a large body of disinterested people with whom the author is not in sympathy. Mr. Percy White has also fallen into the mistake of making his hero highly conscious of his own rascality, and he would have done better to have studied the restrained method used by Thackeray in "Barry Lyndon," where the illusion is sustained from the first page to the last. There is in effect no illusion in "Mr. Strudge," who has been obviously created as a purely satiric instrument, and the central vice of its construction thus impairs the human interest of what is otherwise a clever piece of work.

* "The Explorer." By W. S. Maugham. Heinemann. 6s.

"Mr. Strudge." By Percy White. Eveleigh Nash. 6s.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

IN the preface to the "Life and Works of Vittore Carpaccio," which Mr. R. H. Hobart Cust has rendered into English (Murray, £2 12s. 6d. net), Signor Pompeo Molmenti pays a generous tribute to the late Gustav Ludwig, his collaborator in the compilation of the work. Herr Ludwig, however, died before Chapter VII. was completed, and the remaining four chapters, together with the appendices, are therefore the production of Signor Molmenti alone, whilst the preparation of the whole for the press must also be accounted his. The book is precisely what one would expect from the learned author of the "History of Venice," at any rate in regard to the extraordinarily thorough detail it provides; and, inspired as it is by a sincere admiration for this most truly Venetian of Venetian artists, it clears up many a debatable point with respect to his origin and the paintings connected with his name. The writing is somewhat diffuse, and we are not sure that a clearer picture of Carpaccio would not have resulted had the authors spared us some of the intricate description of the places decorated with his work, the literary reconstruction of scuola and church long since destroyed, the people with whom he consorted, and the historic or legendary sources of his subjects. Be this as it may, their digressions from the main path, prompted by the desire to sift everything to its root, are at least concerned with interesting facts of the life of renaissance Venice, and are so ordered that they constitute a vivid setting for the painter's career. The main facts of Carpaccio's life are that he was a native of Venice (not of Capodistria, as some authorities have erroneously supposed), that he was born about 1455, and after a distinguished career died between 1525-6. In his art Venice and her people were his abiding models, and the authors compare him to Pinturicchio in the literalistic fidelity with which he reproduced the buildings and characteristic figures of his native place. To only one source besides the nature around him did he permit himself to go for inspiration. This was to the German painter Reuvich, whose drawings of the Orient are clearly imitated in several of Carpaccio's religious compositions, notably in the "Departure of the Betrothed Pair," from the "St. Ursula" cycle, the "Visitation," from the series originally possessed by the Albanian scuola, and the "Preaching to the People" from the "St. Stephen" cycle. Carpaccio's popularity waned when the free style of painting adopted by Giorgione and Titian took Venice by storm. Unlike Giovanni Bellini, he could not adapt himself to the new fashion which he despised as wanting the restraint that characterised his own work. The pupil of Lazzaro Bastiani (not the master of that painter, as the majority of art historians have stated), he embodied the spirit of quattrocentist art, and it was as a quattrocentist that he died. This volume is luxuriously illustrated not only with reproductions of Carpaccio's works, but with those of several contemporaries who may profitably be compared with him, and with plans and views of buildings, existing or ingeniously reconstructed, heraldic and other inscriptions, and so forth.

* * *

WITH the single exception of Mr. Nevinson, no other writer about Russian affairs has shown so wide a humanity, so nice a literary touch, and so real a sympathy for the characteristics of the Russian temperament as Mr. Maurice Baring in "A Year in Russia" (Methuen, 10s. 6d.). As politics and history it is curiously slight and incomplete. Mr. Baring, like Mr. Nevinson, was in Moscow during the bloody days of the December rising. Mr. Baring has contrived to be nearly dull; Mr. Nevinson has written about it one of the finest pages of modern English historical literature. Mr. Baring, however, makes his effects in his own way, and that way depends upon his knowledge of the language and his sympathy with simple life. On every situation he gives us the comments of his cabman, and most wise and amusing they often are. He interviews peasant deputies, and discovers among them self-taught sages who deserve a European reputation. The Russian peasant who has begun to read appears to have an amazing taste for the greater things in European literature, and his criticisms are often as profound as they are original. One is startled to read, for example, that "Paradise Lost," in a Russian prose translation, is sold by the thousand as a chap-book at Russian fairs. It is for these side-lights rather than for its desultory history and its somewhat immature if decidedly Liberal politics that this book deserves to live. In many ways, however, it certainly suggests a novel train of thought. Mr. Baring often recurs to a paradox which deserves a careful handling. Why is it that, despite the rigidity of its political system, Russia enjoys so large a liberty in matters of private morality and conduct? The rigid conventions, the fixed social codes, the confident habits of judgment and condemnation which exist among us, are nowhere to be found in Russia. Individuality is tolerated in everything but politics, and freedom of thought allowed to everyone but the agitator. Mr. Baring asks himself in a charmingly written dialogue whether this tolerance in the larger questions of life and morals is really natural to tyrannies, this worship of convention peculiar to democracy. Athens, after all, as Renan reminds us, had in plain terms an inquisition. But the chances are that the explanation is historical rather than political. This respect for individuality, this freedom from the trammels of authority and convention is, after all, a comparatively modern phase in Russian life. It dates, we imagine, from the Nihilist movement, which was not, as Englishmen are apt to suppose, an outbreak of political anarchism, but simply a passionate epidemic of individualism and rationalism in thought, morals, and conduct—a wider and more uncompromising Protestantism. It was the courage and the extravagance of the Bazaroffs which won for the modern "intellectuals" of Russia the freedom they now enjoy.

* * *

COLERIDGE'S metaphysics, said Lamb, were only "his fun," and Mr. Shawcross laments in the preface to his edition of the "Biographia Literaria" (Clarendon Press, two vols., 8s. net) that Coleridge's philosophy of art has never received in England the consideration which it deserves. There are several reasons for this neglect. Coleridge's aesthetic criticism is but a fragment of his general philosophy, his presentation of it is amazing in its lack of sequence and order, and his style far from attractive. But in spite of its faults of arrangement the "Biographia Literaria" cannot be neglected by any student of literature. It contains those six magnificent chapters on Wordsworth and the theory of poetic expression, which, together with the "Lectures on Shakespeare," are among the masterpieces of English literary criticism. Mr. Shawcross is to be congratulated on the production of this sound and workman-like edition. It contains everything that is necessary to a profitable study of the text. The notes are brief and to the point, and the value of the book as a manual of Coleridge's literary criticism is enhanced by the addition of the essays "On the Principles of Genial Criticisms," the essay "On Poesy or Art," and the fragments "On Taste" and "On Beauty." There is also a good introduction, in which the development of Coleridge's theory of the imagination and his relations to German thought are discussed.

* * *

THE latest addition to Mr. Lane's "Living Masters of Music" series is an excellent appreciation of "Ignaz Jan Paderewski" (2s. 6d. net), by Mr. E. A. Baughan. It gives a sufficient amount of information concerning Paderewski's training at the Warsaw Conservatoire, and later at Vienna under Lescheititzky, who gave him the brilliancy of execution and technique which is one of his great characteristics. Indeed, Mr. Baughan believes that the fault of Lescheititzky's "school" is a desire to be brilliant and startling at all costs. Of Paderewski's execution Mr. Baughan writes with enthusiasm, holding that "he has the power of moving an audience as no pianist since Rubinstein has been able to move it," and he also believes that "there is every probability that he will yet make a name for himself as a composer." The book, written as it is by one of the most competent of musical critics, and illustrated by a number of photographs, will be useful to those who wish to have an adequate criticism of Paderewski's art as far as it has hitherto developed.

* * *

RATHER more than half of Mr. William Toynbee's "Vignettes of the Regency" (the Ambrose Company, 6s. net), SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S LIST.LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.:*A Memoir. BY HIS WIFE.

With portraits, large 8vo. 10s. 6d. net.

The Spectator says:—"In this modestly written, but most interesting book, Lady Wantage has raised a worthy monument to her husband's memory."THE UNLUCKY FAMILY.

By MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE. With 23 illustrations by E. T. Reed. 6s.

The World says:—"If any one likes to laugh till he can laugh no longer, let him take up 'The Unlucky Family.'"THROUGH THE MAGIC DOOR.

By A. CONAN DOYLE. With 16 illustrations, crown 8vo, 5s.

Truth says:—"To speak of the book as a collection of literary essays would be to give but an imperfect idea of its real character and charm, not the least being a complete absence of anything like pedantry."A HOLIDAY IN THE HAPPY VALLEY WITH PEN AND PENCIL.

By T. R. SWINBURNE, Major (late R.M.A.). With 24 Full-page Illustrations in Colour, and a Map, demy 8vo, 16s. net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"A really delightful book. Major Swinburne is author and artist too, and his sketches are so beautiful that we should have liked more."NATURE'S MOODS AND TENSES.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON. With Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

Punch says:—"Genial and informing. The observer of the phenomena of the fields and woods could not have a more agreeable guide than the golfing sage of Ashdown Forest."THE LIFE OF CAVOUR.

By the Hon. EDWARD CADOGAN. With a Portrait. 7s. 6d. net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Cadogan has managed to give us not only a vivid picture of the man, but has also contributed a valuable addition to our historical shelves."PROSE IDYLS OF THE WEST RIDING.

By LADY CATHERINE MILNES GASKELL. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"They are very natural and romantic, quietly pathetic, never rousing one to any great pitch of emotion, but ever pleasing with their charm."JOHN HARVARD AND HIS TIMES.

By HENRY C. SHELLEY. With 24 Full-page Illustrations, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

The Westminster Gazette says:—"A notable example of constructive and conjectural biography."A HISTORY OF THE MINORIES.

By the Rev. E. M. TOMLINSON. With 4 Portraits in Photogravure and 9 Half-tone Illustrations, demy 8vo, 18s. net.

The Tribune says:—"An admirable example of historical research, and should be read by every student of London's great past."THE SOCIAL FETICH.

By LADY GROVE. With a Frontispiece, demy 8vo, 5s. net.

The Daily Chronicle says:—"Lady Grove is always entertaining. She discourses with wit and wisdom, for she has a merry humour, and she has cultivated the habit of thought."REMINISCENCES OF OXFORD.

By the Rev. W. TUCKWELL, M.A. Revised and Cheaper Edition, Considerably Enlarged. With 16 Illustrations, large post 8vo, 6s.

Punch says:—"Mr. Tuckwell's good things illumine every page, and are told with that brevity which is essential to success."HUMOURS OF THE FRAY: Rhymes and Renderings:

By CHARLES L. GRAVES. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Mr. STEPHEN GWYNN, M.P., in the Freeman's Journal says:—"More nearer to the quality of satire than anything that has been seen of late."POPULAR SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.*THE BROKEN ROAD. By A. E. W. MASON.

2nd Impression.

LAID UP IN LAVENDER. By STANLEY WEYMAN.

2nd Impression.

MY MERRY ROCKHURST. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE.HER LADYSHIP. By KATHARINE TYNAN.

2nd Impression.

THE AWAKENING OF BITTLESHAM.

2nd Impression. By G. F. BRADBY.

FRAULEIN SCHMIDT and MR. ANSTRUTHER.

By the Author of "Elizabeth and her German Garden."

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

No. 2.

NOW READY.

1/- Net.

THE INTERNATIONAL

The January number contains important Articles by leading Foreign Statesmen on THE CRISIS IN PORTUGAL, THE FUTURE OF AUSTRIA, THE LABOUR MOVEMENT IN BELGIUM, Etc., Etc.

SPECIAL FEATURES of the number are Articles on New Developments in Art and Literature, by WALTER CRANE, PROFESSOR REGNAULT (Paris), LILY BRAUN (Berlin), and DR. SCHOENHOF (Vienna); while the Editor contributes an article on the Awakening of Art in Oriental Countries, and the Sensational New Developments of Realistic Painting in Japan, beautifully illustrated with several fine reproductions of the principal pictures.

THE INTERNATIONAL

The Magazine which records ALL Important Reform Movements throughout the world.
Over 250 Foreign Correspondents.

MONTHLY 1/- NET.

Obtainable through any bookseller.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

WILD HONEY FROM VARIOUS THYME

By MICHAEL FIELD. Crown 8vo, Cloth. 5s. net

The Academy says:—"Michael Field is perhaps the greatest of our living lyric poets who are actually writing at the present time."THE CAUSES OF PRESENT DISCONTENTS IN INDIA

By J. C. O'DONNELL, M.P. Cloth. 2s. 6d. net.

A criticism of the policy of the present Government, and a plea for the adoption of conciliatory methods.

THE AGE OF THE EARTH And other Geological Studies

By W. J. SOLLAS, LL.D. Illustrated. New and Cheaper Edition, 6s. net.

A REMARKABLE NOVEL.

THE BLUE LAGOON

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE, Author of "The Crimson Azaleas." (Third Impression.) 6s.

A strikingly original romance.

EVE'S APPLE

By ALPHONSE COURLANDER, Author of "The Sacrifice," "Seth of the Cross," &c. 6s.

A Society romance with a strong ethical interest.

PLEASE SEND FOR A COPY OF THE JANUARY 'M.A.B.'

Post free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, Adelphi Terrace, London.

is taken up with the first three essays, which treat of the "Prince Regent and the Royal Family," "The Government," and "The Opposition." These are followed by five shorter chapters on Lady Holland, Lord Melbourne, Lord Brougham, Pitt's private life, and Sir John Moore, the hero of Corunna. Mr. Toynbee has a weakness for George IV., and is careful to point out how that monarch not only entertained Sir Walter Scott, but came forward with an offer of pecuniary help at the time of Scott's financial difficulties, how he appreciated the work of Raeburn, Lawrence, and Chantrey, and how he resolutely refused to pollute the "Fountain of Honour" by the indiscriminate distribution of ribands and peerages. The First Gentleman in Europe has up to the present found few champions, and may be allowed the little whitewash which Mr. Toynbee applies, but Thackeray's verdict on his character will probably, in its main outlines, be the final one. The period of the Regency is an interesting one, whether we regard it from a social, a political, or a literary standpoint. Mr. Toynbee seems to know it well, and his slight, though pleasant, and lively essays make agreeable reading.

* * *

"HOW TO COLLECT CONTINENTAL CHINA," by C. H. Wylde (Bell, 6s. net), is a manual which will be of great use to lovers of beautiful china. It contains a brief history of the chief Continental factories, illustrations of their typical work, and reproductions of the marks by which pieces may be identified. Mr. Wylde advises collectors not to trust to these marks as a proof of authenticity. The mark, he says, is the easiest thing of all for the forger to reproduce, and the clumsiest forger can copy a mark quite as accurately as is necessary to deceive the best expert who ever lived. Indeed, the mark is not infrequently useful evidence that the piece bearing it is not genuine, and Mr. Wylde instances the specimens of Sèvres porcelain decorated with enamels, and painted with a miniature portrait of Madame du Barry, the back bearing a date letter for a year between 1760 and 1765. The fact is that Madame du Barry retired into obscurity after Louis XV.'s death in 1774, while the enamelled decorations were only introduced by Cotteau about 1782. So that pieces combining Madame du Barry's portrait with the jewelled decoration and a date mark of 1765 are certainly forgeries.

* * *

BEGUN as a contribution to family history "Colonel Nathaniel Whetham, A Forgotten Soldier of the Civil Wars," by C. D. Whetham and W. C. D. Whetham (Longmans, 8s. 6d. net), has been published in the belief that the general public "might feel an interest in a career which, to some extent, was typical of those of the less prominent soldiers of the Commonwealth." Belonging to the younger branch of an old Dorsetshire family, Nathaniel Whetham was apprenticed at the age of sixteen to one Edward Tirrell, the baker to the Inner Temple. Some dozen years later he married his master's widow and took over the business, which prospered under his management. He was representative for the Fifeshire borough in Cromwell's Parliament, but on the outbreak of the war he joined the Parliamentary army and served with distinction at Northampton and the first siege of Banbury. He was rewarded for his services by the thanks of Parliament, the command of a regiment, and a grant of lands worth two hundred pounds a year. He bought the manor of the borough of Chard in 1647 from the Commissioners for the sale of Bishops' Lands, and retired there in 1647. He was dispossessed after the Restoration and left the Chard manor-house to spend his last years in a smaller house in the neighbourhood. Though Whetham's life differs little from that of many others of the period family piety seems to have preserved an unusual number of memorials of his career and these have formed a basis for the interesting narrative which has been written by his descendants.

* * *

MR. DANIEL O'CONNOR, who initiated Messrs. Dent's "Les Classiques Français" series, is now editing for Messrs. Bell another French series, "Les Classiques Français Illustrés" (5s. net), of which the first volume "Les Maîtres Sonneurs," by George Sand, has appeared. The book is beautifully illustrated by Miss M. V. Whitehouse, and there is a preface by M. Emile Faguet. M. Faguet lays stress on George Sand's feeling for nature. No French writer, he says, except La Fontaine and Jean-Jacques Rousseau, has so intimate a knowledge of nature as George Sand. But George Sand's femininity gives a peculiar quality to her feeling. La Fontaine is the friend of Nature, Rousseau is her worshipper, but George Sand is her lover. Like most other critics M. Faguet is most attracted by George Sand's tales of rural life. They are, he declares, masterpieces of French imagination and of French style.

* * *

THE happy valley of Major T. R. Swinburne's "A Holiday in the Happy Valley" (Smith, Elder, 16s.), is the famous vale of Kashmir, and the book describes Major Swinburne's experiences during a holiday there. So many writers have described Indian travel to us that another book upon the subject is hardly necessary. Still Major Swinburne knows how to use his eyes and ears, he has so keen an appreciation of beautiful landscape, his accounts of hunting adventures are so well told, and, above all, he is so dauntless an optimist—he can even be humorous on the subject of mosquitoes—that we have read this book with considerable enjoyment. The water-colours by the author with which the book is illustrated are well done, though several of them seem to have lost considerably in the process used in reproduction.

* * *

UNDER the general title of "The Art of Landscape Gardening" (Constable, 12s. 6d.), Mr. John Nolen, an American landscape architect of distinction, issues "Sketches and Hints on Landscape Gardening" and "The Theory and Practice of Landscape Gardening," the two best works of Humphrey Repton, the famous landscape gardener of the eighteenth century. Repton lived at the period when, under the influence of the early romantic movement, and also in part through the teaching of Addison and Pope, the formal style of gardening was giving place to the attractions of a natural rural landscape. He quickly made a great reputation and was engaged in the creation or improvement of more than two hundred important places. He was not a rash innovator, but could see the beauties of the formal style even at a moment when it was decried on all sides. His books have the advantage of being free from technical terms and trivial details. They form probably the best general introduction to the study of landscape gardening in the English language, and Mr. Nolen has done good service by issuing them in this beautiful edition.

* * *

THE opening number of "The Sociological Review" (Sherratt & Hughes, 2s. 6d. net) is a great success, and the publication is likely to become indispensable to all students of Sociology, using the word in its widest meaning. Professor L. T. Hobhouse contributes an editorial article defining the scope of the journal, and discussing in a most interesting manner the nature and province of the inquiries proper to the science of Sociology. Professor Westermarck's article on "Suicide" is an interesting contribution to the data of the youthful science of Comparative Ethics. He shows among other things that suicide is not, as is sometimes supposed, in any way peculiar to civilised peoples, though he maintains in opposition to Professor Durkheim that the more lenient view taken of suicide among ourselves is likely to continue. Dr. Douglas Morrison writes a well-instructed article on the criminal problem, which he justly concludes to be "more a social problem than a penal problem." Crime, in the opinion of that high authority, is to be cured not by "more elaborate methods of punishment" but by an improvement of social conditions. The tenour of the argument is a good illustration of the value of treating a specialistic problem in the light of general sociology. Mr. R. R. Marrett has a vigorously written article on Comparative Religion; and Mr. H. L. Fisher has an article full of suggestions on "The Sociological View of History," which is the more interesting as hitherto Sociologists and Historians have not understood one another particularly well. Contemporary problems are represented in the Review by Professor Geddes on "The Survey of Cities," and Mr. W. H. Beveridge on "The Unemployed Workmen Act in 1906-7."

MACMILLAN & Co. s

NEW BOOKS.

Rambling Recollections.

BY

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF.

G.C.B., G.C.M.G.,
Late British Ambassador in Spain,
With Photogravure and other Illustrations.
Two vols. 8vo., 30s. net.

Tuesday.

H. FIELDING HALL'S NEW BOOK: THE INWARD LIGHT.

By H. FIELDING HALL,
Author of "The Soul of a People," etc. 8vo, 10s. net.

THE THRESHOLD OF MUSIC.

An Inquiry into the Development of the Musical Sense. By WILLIAM WALLACE. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Tuesday.

Vol II. Now Ready.

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 vols. Globe 8vo. Vol. II.
POEMS. 4s. net.

A HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH SINCE THE REFORMATION.

By S. CHEETHAM, D.D., Archdeacon and Canon of Rochester. Crown 8vo., 10s. 6d.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS—New Volume.

JAMES THOMSON.

By G. C. MACAULAY. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

SIXTY YEARS OF PROTECTION IN CANADA, 1846-1907. Where Industry Leans on the Politician

By EDWARD PORRITT, sometime London Editor of the Manchester Examiner. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

MACMILLAN'S GUIDE TO EGYPT AND THE SUDAN.

Including a Description of the Route through Uganda to Mombasa. With 35 Maps and Plans. Fifth Edition. 5s. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

A new Monthly Magazine dealing with the Philosophy, Religions, Politics, Literature, Art,
&c., of the East.

ONE SHILLING NET.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

is the only Monthly Review in Europe exclusively devoted to the Eastern World.

FIRST ISSUE ON SALE

At Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Subscription rates, inclusive of postage—

14s. for 12 months; 7s. for 6 months.

If any difficulty in obtaining a copy send to

"THE ORIENT REVIEW,"

Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Publishing Office: 27, Chancery Lane, E.C.

Scribner's 1908 Magazine

FICTION

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE,
by John Fox, Jr. A strong Serial Story commencing in the January number.

Richard Harding Davis, James B.
Connolly, Thomas Nelson Page, will be among the contributors of Short Stories.

ARTICLES

The West in the Orient, by Charles M.
Pepper.

Château and Country Life in France,
by Madame Waddington, the author of the "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife."

Three Articles on South America, by Arthur Ruhl.

ART

ILLUSTRATED ARTICLES dealing with the work of Raphael,
Millet, Ingres, will appear month by month.
THE FINEST COLOUR WORK REPRODUCTIONS will appear throughout the year.

On Sale Everywhere. ONE SHILLING.
Annual subscription, 15s. post free, to all parts.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
New York and London.

TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS ST., E.C. Telephone: Holborn 5849

Insurance.

LAST YEAR'S HOME FIRES.

THERE has been no startling event in 1907 to disturb the equanimity of the fire insurance underwriter. It was well that it should be so, and that the quasi-principle of fat years succeeding lean ones should remain as a governing idea until the science of averages can supply more reliable data. Our home fires have, however, been numerous and costly, but they have been distributed about the country with fair impartiality as to class and district. The year just numbered amongst the past has had no "conflagration" to give painful distinction to its existence, or to mark it amongst its fellows as having laid a too heavy hand upon the reserves of the fire offices—in fact, no individual fire has involved a loss running into six figures. So many causes unite in bringing about fires that, like the poor, they must be ever with us. Indeed, it may truly be said that fires, if fairly spread, and controlled by judicious underwriting, prove the worth and necessity of insurance offices. Since the days of Charles II., to whom is accredited the original scheme of fire insurance, and in whose reign the appalling object lesson of the Great Fire of London in 1666 occurred, the fire offices have pursued their beneficent work. With the numberless small fires which 1907 has embraced and which furnish an almost incredible aggregate, we cannot, of course, here deal. Those which have individually reached the sum of £10,000 may be mentioned as affording interesting evidences that what we have stated is fully justified.

January.—Cooper & Co., Grocers, Glasgow	£20,000
Vulcan Foundry, Earlstown, Lancs.	20,000
Edward Lloyd, Ltd., Paper Mills, Sittingbourne ...	18,000
Eastman & Sons, Dyers, Acton Vale	20,000
February.—Farmer & Co. and Others, 10, 11, 12 Wood Street	50,000
Graphotone Printing Works, Enfield	10,000
C. Lallow, Solent Wharf, West Cowes	12,000
Hathershaw Cotton Spinning Co., Oldham	49,000
F. Jackson, Mansion, Hindhead	15,000
Hobbies Engineering Works, East Dereham	20,000
March.—Gardiner & Tidey, Farrand's Granaries, Bermondsey	20,000
Maxime & Co. and Others, Wood Turners, Featherstone Street, City Road	60,000
J. C. Caldicott, Leather Works, Wellingborough ...	10,000
Springfield Cotton Mill, Belfast	15,000
April.—Ismay & Co., Manufacturing Chemists, Newcastle-on-Tyne	18,000
T. Bolton & Sons, Metal Refiners, Widnes	20,000
May.—Rigby & Co. and Others, Packing-Case Makers, Edmonton	10,000
Coultown Mansion, East Lothian	20,000
Houghton & Co., Timber Yards, Cork	25,000
June.—G. & H. Green, Coventry Wharf, Shadwell, Thames	18,000
July.—Liverpool Warehousing Co., Vulcan Street, Liverpool	30,000
Roman Catholic College, Standon, Herts	10,000
T. & W. Bellhouse, Sawmills, Miles Platting ...	25,000
Naylor & Co., Sawmills, Warrington	12,000
A. Laidlay, Seacliffe Mansion, North Berwick ...	13,000
August.—Burroughes & Watts, Billiard-Table Makers, Bow Common	10,000
September.—Rawson & Sons, Boot Factory, Leicester ...	10,000
October.—Pilkington Bros, Glass Works, St. Helens ...	15,000
R. Barbour & Bros., Wigtown Street, Manchester ...	80,000
Hardy, Robson, & Co., Timber Yard, Newcastle-on-Tyne	14,000
November.—J. Rudd & Co., Worsted Mills, Bradford ...	20,000
Queen's Palace Theatre and Hotel, Rhyl	15,000
Gamage & Co., Holborn	15,000
December.—Foster & Co., Drapers, Newry	10,000
H. A. & D. Taylor, Maltsters, Bishop's-Stortford ...	28,000

One satisfactory feature noticeable in the foregoing list, is the comparatively small proportion of country mansions which have gone under. For several years past country mansions have proved most unremunerative risks and very costly waste. The mortality has naturally been mostly with ancient buildings, where oil lamps and defective hearths are in vogue, where timber beams in chimney flues have been traced as original offenders, and where miles have to be compassed before expert brigade assistance can be secured. In course of time—it is to be hoped fast approaching—the timber beam in chimneys must disappear, for the heavy experience in this class of risk must have wiped out most of them, and proved to the builder the danger of such an arrangement. It will come none too soon, for the patience of the fire offices was well nigh exhausted and drastic remedies were in contemplation. Stack fires—another burning instance of weary waiting and watching—have been less frequent, and it may be presumed that the notoriously wet weather which has prevailed throughout the most part of the year accounts for this in a great measure. In wet weather a stack is not so ideal a shelter for a tired tramp to sleep against with a live pipe in his mouth, or for him to hide against the wind when a light is required. So often does a half-spent match hastily thrown aside develop into a light which is not required. There is a sinful amount of waste from this cause alone, quite apart from the acts of the silly incendiary who imagines this to be a ready and speedy way of avenging his grievances with his employer.

In this connection reference may very fairly be made to the Railway Fires Act of 1905, which comes into operation this month. Its provisions and operations are distinctly limited. It only protects the farmer from loss to his crops through the sparks of the railway engine when such loss does not exceed the sum of £100. Why such a limit, or any limit, was fixed it is difficult to conceive unless it were intended to serve as a deterrent to the farmer against placing his stacks too near to the line of railway. Farmers are, we know, more apt to study their own convenience rather than give an ear to any outside possibilities. They cannot, however, be expected to keep uncultivated that portion of their land which is immediately adjacent to the railway, and if so it is quite conceivable that a fire so occurring to the growing crops in a dry season could well exceed the statutable limit. Workers in wood are old offenders and will probably remain so for all time. But as they are recognised as such from ordinary causes alone, they are charged commensurate rates and can, therefore, only be regarded by insurance men as fulfilling their unfortunate destiny.

FIRES IN THE FOREIGN FIELD.

Here there would have been no exceptional comment to make against 1907 had it not been for the mighty troubles which have been brought about by further occurrences of earthquake with fire combined. Before the year had hardly set in came the news that the business portion of Kingston, Jamaica, had been practically wiped out of existence making this the third catastrophe of the sort within a period of nine months. The fire companies have not regarded earthquakes or fires consequent thereon as properly coming within their category of liability, and they have given expression to this in a clause to this effect amongst the conditions of the cover granted by their policies. Where, however, the catastrophes are of so gigantic a character as at San Francisco, Jamaica, and Valparaiso, there is no disinterested public to appeal to for a jury, for all are sufferers alike and their sympathies are firmly secured before ever they get to the jury box. Hence it is that the claimants have had no hesitation in appearing in the law courts. At Mandeville, the first case was heard before a jury mostly composed of coloured men, and despite the fact that the summing-up of the Judge was all in the favour of the fire companies, the jury promptly pronounced for the claimants. Again, at Montego Bay, in the second case, like proceedings were invoked, and with like result and with the backing the Mandeville case supplied. The British offices have, of course, taken these cases to the superior court where it is confidently anticipated local jury bias will be absent. In the litigation with respect to like claims in Valparaiso, the verdicts of the courts have proved up to the hilt that the position taken up by the fire companies was in every way justifiable.

AN EXPERT.

THE EDINBURGH REVIEW

No. 423. JANUARY, 1908. 8vo, price 6s.

- I. THE GOVERNMENT OF SUBJECT RACES
- II. LADY MARY WORTLEY MONTAGU
- III. THE ORIGIN AND PROSPECTS OF GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE
- IV. BISHOP GORE AND THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND
- V. THE FALLACIES OF SOCIALISM
- VI. VERSAILLES
- VII. HEINRICH HEINE: EMOTION AND IRONY
- VIII. RELIGION IN LITERATURE
- IX. THE AGRICULTURAL POSITION OF THE UNITED KINGDOM
- X. THE SECOND HAGUE CONFERENCE
- XI. QUEEN VICTORIA'S LETTERS

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co, 39, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY

Twopence. Each Friday.

Established 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics, Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals, and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy men and women it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen post free on application.

Offices: 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

NOW READY THE JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. NET. GIVING PARTICULARS OF THE LAST BOOKS OF THE YEAR.

APART FROM THE USUAL FEATURES THIS NUMBER INCLUDES A LONG AND SEASONABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE BY FOURTEEN OF THE MOST POPULAR WRITERS FOR THE YOUNG.

Begin the New Year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly," a Specimen Copy of which you can get on application to the Publishers, Simpkin Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.

JANUARY. 6s.

- 1. NINETEENTH CENTURY SPAIN.
- 2. WILLIAM BLAKE. By T. STURGE MOORE.
- 3. THE ENGLISH BOROUGH. By H. W. C. DAVIS.
- 4. JOHNSON'S LIVES. By PROFESSOR J. CHURTON COLLINS.
- 5. THE RELIGION OF JAPAN. By Sir CHARLES ELIOT, K.C.M.G.
- 6. ARIOSTO. By R. WARWICK BOND.
- 7. THE EIGHT HOURS' DAY IN COAL MINES.
- 8. THE POETRY OF MR. ALFRED AUSTIN.
- 9. THE RIGHT TO WORK.
- 10. THE HAGUE CONFERENCE. By PROFESSOR WESTLAKE.
- 11. GREEK TEMPLES AND EARLY RELIGION. By PROFESSOR R. CARR BOSANQUET.
- 12. THE JUBILEE OF THE ALPINE CLUB. By SIR MARTIN CONWAY.
- 13. MR. BIRRELL'S RECORD IN IRELAND.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W,

JUST PUBLISHED.

Demy 8vo 536 by xxiv pp. 10s. 6d. net.

Studies in Christian Doctrine.

By JAMES DRUMMOND, M.A., LL.D, D.Litt.
(Late Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.)

The Contents include the following:—The Rights and Limitations of the Intellect; the Moral Nature and Revelation; the Religious Element in Man; the Bible; the Church; Primary Conceptions of God; the Doctrine of the Trinity; Agency and Attributes of God; Doctrine of Man; Reconciliation; the Person of Christ; the Work of Christ; Means of Grace; Rise and Progress of Religion in the Individual.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

John Hamilton Thom Centenary.

JANUARY 10, 1908.
TO BE PUBLISHED IMMEDIATELY
Second (Abridged) Edition of

A SPIRITUAL FAITH.

SERMONS BY
JOHN HAMILTON THOM.

Crown 8vo. Pp. 216. Price 2s. net. By post, 2s. 3d.

By the Same Author,
LAWS OF LIFE AFTER THE MIND OF CHRIST. First and Second Series. 2s. 6d. net. each.
CHRIST THE REVEALER. 2s. net.
A MINISTER OF GOD. Selections from Occasional Sermons and Addresses. With a Memoir. 2s. net.

London: PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex St., Strand, W.C.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10. Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions. 53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.
HEAVEN AND HELL:
Things Heard and Seen.
By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

The Week in the City.

THE continued improvement in the monetary position is due to the stoppage of the will or power of the United States to take gold, and it is believed in the City that gold is already filtering away from New York to Buenos Ayres. There has been quite a general reduction of bank rates in Europe. That of the Reichs bank came as a surprise, and is attributed to political nervousness of the Government in view of the motion of Count Kanitz reciting the sufferings of German trade and agriculture through dear money. Others say that it was intended to make things easy for the Prussian loan. The Prussian Government wanted thirty millions, and got only nine. A sorry fiasco, but hardly surprising in view of the fact that the German imperial loan was to follow. On the whole, it would be foolish to prophesy smooth things. We have yet to see how banks and highly financed houses in America and Germany will get out of their embarrassments; and then it must not be forgotten that in many trades materials and manufactured articles have fallen so rapidly that a number of failures among speculative holders are bound to come. One might mention such notoriously weak spots as the wool trade, the building trade, and the motor trade. On the Stock Exchange this week there have been ups and downs, the appearance of new issues and the promise of more counterbalancing the welcome reduction of our bank rate to five per cent. It is likely to remain there for some time, unless the best judges are mistaken.

A PROBLEM FOR INVESTORS.

The great problem now for investors is whether the recovery of American securities from the lowest points touched a few weeks ago is likely to be permanent, or whether (as some wit has suggested) the ring of bank-supported financiers in New York has only manipulated prices up on to a landing in order to fling them down on to the basement. It may be worth while to recount what are, in the opinion of a New York expert, the favourable and the unfavourable features of the situation.

The chief milestones already passed on the road to normal monetary conditions have been, we are told, first, a reduction in the Bank of England's discount rate from 7 to 6 and now to 5 per cent.; second, the cessation of New York bidding for new gold; third, the elimination of the cramping premium on currency; fourth, the disappearance of 20 and 25 per cent. call money charges and the partial resumption of lending on time; fifth, the movement of gold from the interior toward the East; and sixth, rising bank reserves. Stringency should finally pass before the end of this month, although there may not accrue that redundancy which is frequently predicted—at all events, not a redundancy of money for investment either in the many new securities to be offered or in the stocks of corporations whose earnings are dwindling to a point suggestive of lean dividends.

AMERICAN RAILROAD EARNINGS.

This question of railroad earnings is a most serious one for those who wish to put their savings into American lines. It is obvious, as a competent writer in the "New York Journal of Commerce" points out, to everyone who has closely studied railroad and industrial returns that drastic economies must be effected if net profits are not to be gravely impaired. Almost every large railroad reports that during November its traffic fell off, but that expenses were materially higher. Tonnage is bound to decrease in the universal reaction from the intoxicating prosperity of the last two years, yet fixed charges were never so high as they are to-day. What must be done? Here and there freight rates may be increased and even passenger rates may be raised, despite public opinion on this point. But it is from retrenchments of expenditure rather than from income that American railways may hope for salvation. Necessity is a stern taskmaster, and the amount of money that can be saved when there is none to spend may surprise both the management and stockholders. In thousands of ways little charges can be eliminated. Says the New York writer:—

"The removal of the tremendous pressure under which men and equipment were working should make possible not only a reduction in trainmen, but should mean a vast saving of wear and tear on roadbeds, engines, and cars, and, consequently, curtailment of coal bills and upkeep charges, including the wage bill for repairs. Innumerable contemplated improvements and decorations may be postponed or abandoned. Extensions may have to wait. Materials of all kinds will cost less—many, including coal, have already declined in price. A thorough overhauling of working forces by the proper stamp of man will no doubt result in economies at various points, including headquarters, such economies sometimes being rendered possible through the smaller volume of business and statistics to be handled. Manufacturers of railroad supplies will be ready to suggest other expenditures that could be stopped with advantage to some roads. The spirit of extravagance that took possession of the whole country did not pass by the railroads, and now that retrenchment is the watchword, there will be found ample scope for action."

The process will be painful. Yet in the end it will prove of inestimable value to the roads and their stockholders, for efficiency stands to be improved rather than impaired by the exercise of rigorous supervision, while the sum total of the amount saved ought to go far toward counteracting lower receipts. With the exception of those companies that are irrevocably committed to enormous expenditures of a more or less unproductive nature, the railroads, it is believed, will be able to adjust themselves to changed conditions. "In the meantime dividends will have to suffer, and whether or not the effect of this upon stocks will more than offset the decline in money rates is an open question."

THE UNEMPLOYED UNDER PROTECTION.

Tariff Reformers tell the English working man that when his food and clothing cost him more he will have better wages and employment, and up till a few weeks or months ago they used to point their speeches with fairy tales about America and Germany as the workmen's Paradise. The "Daily Telegraph" now tells us that in spite of the fact that food and clothing are far higher in Berlin than in London, there are now 25,000 unemployed workmen in the Prussian capital. Every mail from the United States tells us of thousands more workmen being "laid off." The last paper I have read (of January 6th) states that steel works are only at 20 to 25 per cent. of their capacity. The majority of the copper mines are closed. Thousands upon thousands of textile operatives are out of employment. Why do not the Tariff Reformers send out a part of Protectionist workmen to report on New York and Berlin?

LUCELLUM.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Three-and-a-Half per cent. per annum until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 16th January, 1908.

Investors who wish to be equipped with indispensable information and to possess the most accurate and varied price list of securities in existence, should purchase the DOUBLE NUMBER of the Investor's Monthly Manual.

Just Published. Price 1/6. Post Free, 1/9.

Apply to the publisher—

3, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSGROFT, Secretary.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

Start the day right with

Rowntree's
ELECT Cocoa

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curpale. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

ONE & ALL BULBS

The Brand Guarantees
One & All Quality.

ONE & ALL COLLECTIONS OF FLOWERING
BULBS AND ROOTS.

Producing a most effective Display.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL COLLECTION OF BULBS.

No. 1. For the Open Ground. Price 15/- 25 Anemones, finest mixed;
200 Crocus, in four colours; 13 Daffodils, double; 25 Daffodils, single; 24
Tulips, double, finest mixed; 24 Tulips, single; 24 Hyacinths, in three colours; 25 Iris, finest mixed; 25 Jonquils, Major; 25 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, Polyanthus, mixed; 12 Narcissus, double white; 24 Ranunculus, finest mixed; 100 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 50
Scillas; 12 Allium Neapolitanum.

No. 2. For the Open Ground. Price 7/6. 12 Anemones, finest mixed;
150 Crocus, in four colours; 25 Tulips, double finest, mixed; 25 Tulips, single; 12 Hyacinths, in three colours; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 12 Daffodils, single; 12 Narcissus, Pheasant's Eye; 12 Narcissus, double white; 60 Snowdrops, selected; 25 Winter Aconites; 12 Jonquils, single Major; 25 Scillas.

No. 3. For the Open Ground. Price 4/- 25 Snowdrops, selected; 100
Crocus, choice mixed; 25 Tulips, finest mixed; 12 Daffodils, double; 12 Narcissus, finest mixed; 12 Scillas; 12 Iris, finest mixed; 6 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 4. For the Open Ground. Price 2/6. 12 Snowdrops, selected; 50
Crocus, choice mixed; 12 Tulips, finest mixed; 6 Daffodils, double; 6 Narci-sus, finest mixed; 6 Scillas; 6 Iris, finest mixed; 3 Hyacinths, choice mixed.

No. 5. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 16/- 24
Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyan-thus, Narcissus; 24 Tulips, named varieties; 100 Crocus, choice named varieties; 6 Early White Roman Hyacinths; 3 Lilium Harrisii; 12 Freesias; 24 Scilla Siberica; 50 Double Snowdrops.

No. 6. For Conservatory and Room Decoration. Price 8/- 12
Hyacinths, choice named; 12 Jonquils, double, sweet scented; 6 Polyan-thus, Narcissus; 2 Lilium Harrisii; 18 Tulips, named varieties; 50 Crocus, choice named varieties; 12 Scilla Siberica; 6 Freesias; 25 Snowdrops;
3 Early White Roman Hyacinths.

No. 7. Popular Collection for the Open Ground. Price 1/- Containing 30 or more Bulbs of the following popular kinds—Snowdrops, selected; Crocus, choice mixed; Tulips, finest mixed; Daffodils, double;
Narcissus, finest mixed; Scillas; Iris, finest mixed; Hyacinth, choice.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, Ltd. Name and address of nearest local agent, Catalogues and other details post free on application to Edward Owen Greening, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL BULBS

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. N. Golf Links. (18 holes)

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.
(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.
A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.
The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.
For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.
Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.
Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.
ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.
Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.
THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,
R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.
BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.
Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.
LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.
Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor
PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF
"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"
PUBLISHED BY
Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,
Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.
Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.
Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.
Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER, B.A., Camb.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.
Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.; NEXT TERM, JANUARY 15th.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.
YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.
Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).
Two Entrance Scholarships are offered for competition on April 6th, 7th and 8th, one of £70 a year for Friends under 16, and one of £50 a year for Friends under 14.
These Scholarships are tenable during the whole of a boy's stay at the school.
Further particulars may be obtained from the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School up to March 29th.

EDUCATIONAL.

SHREWSBURY SCHOOL.—The Examination for House Scholarships, including the Old Salopian Scholarship of £70 a year, tenable for 5 years, will be held on Tuesday, March 10th, and Wednesday, March 11th. Apply to the Headmaster.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains
Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To secure FRIENDS AND FRIENDSHIPS, join the CORRESPONDENCE CLUB, 10/6, and the ENGLISH-SPEAKERS' LINK, 2/6, of 350, Mansion House Chambers, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.
Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:
HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.
Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."
Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.
Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.
THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.
Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.
Nice—Galignani's Library.
Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.
Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.
Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.
Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.
Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52 ..	6d. ..

CHATTO & WINDUS.

THE RHINE. By H. J. MACKINDER, sometime Reader in Geography in the University of Oxford; Director of the London School of Economics, &c. [February 23.]

Fully illustrated after Water Colours by Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, with two Folding Maps in colour, and Index. Large fcap. 4to (9 by 6½ inches), Gilt Top. 20s. net.

Mr. Mackinder has made a life-long study of the Rhine Valley and its history. No such authoritative or readable work has hitherto appeared upon the great River; the course of which—whether as "Priest Street," the great European trans-continental trade route, or as the determining factor in many an international struggle—has more deeply and more consistently influenced European history than any other force, natural or human.

THE BOOK OF ELIZABETHAN VERSE.

Chosen and Edited, with Notes, Index of Authors, Biographical Index of Authors, and Index of first lines, by WILLIAM STANLEY BRAITHWAITE. The Title with Vignette Woodcut Reproduction of a View of Whitehall Palace in 1590; the Frontispiece a photograph reproduction after the charming plate "Cupid Seated on Clouds," engraved by W. S. REYNOLDS after W. OWEN. Pp. 850, small crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net.

Also in whole polished green calf, with Indian proof of frontispiece 12s. 6d. net.

The binding design has been specially reproduced from one of the finest examples of the period, sometime ex the Old Royal Collection, now preserved in the British Museum.

Among the many anthologies now before the public, few, if any, have been prepared with more competence or scholarly care. Exclusive of the seventy-five anonymous items, the work of 106 Elizabethan authors is here collected in their finest pieces, many of which appear in no other anthology. With scarcely an exception, the 675 items have been gathered direct from the pages of the authors quoted. The few exceptions to this are fully acknowledged in the introduction.

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

WITHYFORD: A Sporting Romance of Exmoor. By ARTHUR O. FISHER.

[January 23]

With Coloured Frontispiece by G. D. ARMOUR, four illustrations in Sepia, and one in Black and White by R. H. BUXTON.

THE MARQUIS AND PAMELA. By E. H. COOPER, Author of "Mr. Blake of Newmarket."

[February 6]

"The Marquis," whose principal character is an easily recognisable portrait of a famous sportsman, deals to a considerable extent with racing matters; and the familiar scenes of Ascot, Goodwood, and Newmarket are described by the author of "Mr. Blake of Newmarket" with a pen which knows intimately all the humorous, picturesque, and tragic sides of its subject. "The Marquis" has, however, a more dramatic love story than is usual in Mr. Cooper's books.

ARTISTS OF THE ITALIAN RENAISSANCE.

By E. L. SEELEY. With 8 Four-Colour Plates, the Half-Tones printed in two tints, 7s. 6d. net. Uniform with "Stories of the Italian Artists from Vasari."

Also a SPECIAL EDITION, with 4 extra Four-Colour Plates and 24 in Half-Tone, and a Coloured Woodcut Frontispiece, after Raphael. Small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; vellum, 20s. net; red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

Oxford Magazine.—"It is just the kind of book that one is looking for as a present for some lover of Italian art."

Evening Standard.—"A good idea well carried out, and the illustrations, reproductions of famous pictures, are most welcome. Those in colour are particularly well done."

STORIES OF THE ITALIAN ARTISTS

FROM VASARI. Collected and Arranged by E. L. SEELEY. Red buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net. SPECIAL EDITION, small 4to, parchment, gilt top, 15s. net; whole vellum, 20s. net; whole red polished morocco (to order), 30s. net.

WOMEN OF FLORENCE: A Study of their

Influence on Florentine History during and prior to the Cinquecento. By Professor ISIDORO DEL LUNGO. With an Introduction by Dr. GUIDO BIAGI. With 2 Plates in Four-Colour, and 24 in Half-Tone. Buckram, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net; parchment, 10s. 6d. net.

Burlington Magazine.—"An extremely human, agreeable, and interesting book, which the care of the publishers in the illustration and decoration has rendered doubly attractive."

VENICE.

By BERYL DE SELINCOURT AND MAY STURGE-HENDERSON. Fcap. 4to, gilt top. With 30 illustrations in Colour by REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S. 10s. 6d. net.

Scotsman.—"One of those composite books with coloured pictures in which the illustrations count for no less than the literature... they [the illustrations] grace a book which must both please and instruct anyone who either knows or wishes to know the lovely city it describes."

ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY. New Volumes.

Post 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Top, 2s. net; Leather, Gilt Edges, 3s. net per volume.

JERUSALEM. By SIR WALTER BESANT and E. H. PALMER.

THE SHADOW OF THE SWORD. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

THE KING'S CLASSICS. New Volumes.

16mo Gilt Top, Quarter bound, Antique Grey Boards or Red Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Quarter Vellum, Grey Cloth Sides, 2s. 6d. net.

THE POETS ROYAL OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND. Edited by W. BAILEY-KEMPLING.

CHAUCER'S PARLIAMENT OF BIRDS, AND HOUSE OF FAME. In Modern English. By Prof. SKEAT.

CHAUCER'S PROLOGUE AND MINOR POEMS. In Modern English. By Prof. SKEAT.

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS:

Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans. By D. S. MARGOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. TYRWHITT, R.B.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S. 20s. net.

Glasgow Herald.—"One of those comparatively few works that are both learned and readable. . . . The colour treatment is particularly masterly. . . . This reproduction of the very atmosphere of the East is a very distinct artistic triumph."

THE COLOUR OF LONDON.

By W. J. LOFTIE, F.S.A. With 60 illustrations in Colour, and an Essay by the Japanese Artist, YOSHIO MARKINO. 20s. net.

Athenaeum.—"Has given us a London which is new. . . . the picture of a beautiful capital, which he reveals to its astounded inhabitants. In many of his pictures he seems, as it were, to reveal London to Londoners themselves."

SWITZERLAND AND ITS PEOPLE.

By CLARENCE ROOK. Fcap. 4to, gilt top, with 56 illustrations in Colour by Mrs. JARDINE, and 24 in Half-Tone on Tint, 20s. net.

Spectator.—"This is a good book to look at and to read. . . . a volume which is bound both to please and to profit."

LISBON AND CINTRA.

With some Account of Other Cities and Historic Sites in Portugal. By A. C. INCHBOLD. With 30 illustrations in Colour by STANLEY INCHBOLD. 10s. 6d. net.

Times.—"The writer is an intelligent and careful guide who does not waste space with rhetoric or with personalia."

Outlook.—"Mr. Stanley Inchbold has caught the light of the Southern sun."

TUSCAN FEASTS AND TUSCAN

FRIENDS. By DOROTHY NEVILLE LEES. With 12 Reproductions, after Photographs by typical Tuscan Scenes, 5s. net.

Standard.—"In her company we are taken to fairs and festivals which throw into relief all that is most typical in the life of the peasantry."

THE MEDICI SERIES OF COLOURED REPRODUCTIONS AFTER THE OLD MASTERS.

Daily Telegraph.—"The Medici Reproductions are of surpassing excellence. . . . Give absolutely the impression of the pictures themselves, even as regards irregularities of surface."

I. LUINI. Head of the Virgin Mary (Fresco). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in., 12s. 6d. net.

II. LEONARDO DA VINCI. Head of the Christ (Cartoon). Colour surface, 13½ by 10½ in., 12s. 6d. net.

III. BOTTICELLI. The Virgin and Child (Tempera). Colour surface, 13½ by 9½ in., 12s. 6d. net.

IV. LEONARDO DA VINCI. The Last Supper (Fresco). Colour surface, 31½ by 16 in., 25s. net.

V. PIERO DELLA FRANCESCA. Portrait of an Unknown Lady. Colour surface, 15½ by 11½ in., 10s. 6d. net.

VI. LORENZO DI CREDI. The Annunciation (Tempera). Colour surface, 17½ by 12 in., 15s. net.

VII. FILIPPINO LIPPI. (?) The Virgin in Adoration (Tempera). Colour surface, 19½ by 15 in. Size of Original Picture, 39 by 30 in., 15s. net.

VIII. BOTTICELLI. The Birth of Venus (Tempera). Colour surface, 36 by 21½ in., 25s. net.

OCCASIONAL PLATE, 1.

LIPPI-FILIPPO. The Virgin, after the Painting in Tempera on Wooden Panel, Uffizi Gallery, Florence, of the Virgin, Child, St. John, and an Angel. Coloured surface, 13½ by 10 in. Size of Original, 36 by 24 in., 10s. 6d. net.

Inland Postage (Great Britain) 6d. per plate, except Nos. IV. and VIII., which are 9d. Foreign postage double these amounts.

Full particulars of Plates and Frames, with method of publication and terms of subscription, will be found in an Illustrated Prospectus, which may be had post free on application.

FOUR-COLOUR REPRODUCTIONS.

GIORGIONE. The Virgin Enthroned Between Saints, after the Altar-piece at Castelfranco. Complete in gold frame, 9½ by 7½ in., dark mount, 3s. 6d.; oak frame, oak mount, 2s. 6d.; mounted only, 9d.; unmounted, 6d. Postage extra.

PERUGINO. The Crucifixion, after the Triptych in the Convent of Sta. Maria del Pazzi, Florence. Complete in Florentine carved frame, 21s.; gold frame, 17 by 11 in., dark mount, 5s.; oak frame, oak mount, 3s. 6d.; mounted only, 1s. 6d.; unmounted, 1s. Postage extra.

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 17.]

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 2d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	589	What the Tariff Reformers are Doing. By "Free Trader" ...	605
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		A Woman's Charter. By Mrs. Frederic Harrison ...	605
The Socialism of the Labour Party	592	"Village Libraries." By O. M.	606
The Moral of Mid Devon	593	The New Education Bill. By J. Allanson Picton ...	606
What the Housing Bills Should Do	594	"The Housing Question in German Towns." By T. C. Horsfall ...	606
The Rise of Mohammedan Democracy	595	Premature Burial. By William Tebb ...	606
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		The Real Irish Question. By E. R. W. ...	607
The Sex War	597	POETRY:—
David Friedrich Strauss	598	Baby Love. By James Flecker	607
A City of the Middle Age	599	REVIEWS:—
The Roar	600	The Soot of the Eighteenth Century ...	608
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—		The Old Wild West ...	609
The Anglo-German War of Armaments. By the Rt. Hon. Lord Eversley ...	601	The Diary of a Tory ...	609
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	603	In the Age of the Despots ...	610
Books to be Read	603	NOVEL OF THE WEEK	611
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—		BOOKS IN BRIEF	612
The Defeat in Mid Devon. By Charles Roden Buxton, Montague Fordham, and the Rev. D. K. Auchterlonie	604	THE WEEK IN THE CITY	616

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Prime Minister has returned to England greatly and, we believe, permanently, benefited by his rest at Biarritz. Those who have seen him describe him as stronger than before the attack which brought about his holiday, and well able to bear the fatigues of Cabinet and executive work, combined with a reasonable share of Parliamentary duties. The rumours as to his retirement from the headship of the Government, or from his place in the House of Commons, may at once be dismissed.

* * *

WE have reason to believe that there will be no large additions to the Naval Estimates this year, in the shape of a new start in construction. But the automatic increases, due to such factors as the increase in the cost of coal, may be heavy. The magnitude of the matériel of the Navy is responsible for these and other increments. We can but hope that the friends of economy and peace will make a firm stand in the House, and call for a clear declaration of policy from the Government. They could not have better material than is furnished them by the moderate and authoritative article we publish elsewhere from the pen of Lord Eversley.

* * *

PROTECTION won its first success at the Mid Devon bye-election, where Captain Morrison Bell has defeated Mr. Buxton, a specially able and acceptable candidate, by 559 votes. The Liberal majority at the General Election was 1,283, and the Liberal poll has fallen off by 447 votes, while the Tory vote has grown by 1,385. The constituency has been Liberal since its creation. No Government exists for two years without losing support, and few lose so little as the present administration. But the defeat will stimulate the Protectionist Opposition, and set going a reverse movement of the electoral pendulum. The causes are probably mixed. Great stores of wealth and activity have been placed at the disposal of the Tariff Reformers. Captain Bell besieged the constituency and held two hundred meetings. The rise in the price of bread and coal was put down to the Government, and the moral of the big and little loaf rather unscrupulously reversed. The county families worked hard to recover their influence, the brewery and publican interest to destroy the Licensing Bill, the Tariff Reformers, disposing of half-a-dozen new organisations, to force Protection on the Tory leaders.

* * *

THE Labour Conference, sitting in Hull during the week, has reaffirmed, by a large majority, its former decision in favour of the full adult vote in place of a limited measure of woman suffrage. On Socialism, however, it has taken new ground. On Tuesday it refused, with the assent of some Socialists, a motion, put forward on behalf of the Paper Stainers' Union, to amend the constitution of the party by declaring that its "ultimate object shall be the obtaining for the workers the full results of their labour by the overthrow of the present system of capitalism and the institution of a system of public ownership and control of all the means of life." This formula of State Socialism was rejected by ten to one on the ground that it broke the party's alliance with non-Socialist members and trade unions, and enforced a Socialist test. On Wednesday, however, these tactical grounds were abandoned, or qualified, and another Socialist formula was moved by the Amalgamated Society of Engineers and carried by a majority of 45,000 votes. The new phrasing, which declared for the "socialisation of the means of production, distribution, and exchange," is not, however, to be a form of exclusion for non-Socialists. The voting is not of great value, for it does not represent the decision of societies, but only the views of delegates. Mr. Shackleton, perhaps the most typical and representative Labour member in Parliament, vehemently denounced it, said that the constitution and objects of the party could not be separated, and that its success in the country had been imperilled.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR has spoken twice during the week, once on Friday week at Glasgow, where he described with something like enthusiasm the policy into which he has been propelled almost by physical force, and on Thursday in the City of London, after the first victory of Tariff Reform at Mid Devon. Thus "blooded" by his "kill," Mr. Balfour followed up the scent with some animation. His language was that of a Scottish landlord, and was purely reactionary. He insisted that the mere production of the Scottish Bill providing for the separate assessment of site values had "shattered credit," in land investment, and robbed the widow and orphan. It was an approach to the Socialists, who had just run up their red flag, and meant to fight under the "piratical colours of general spoliation." The new development of Socialism in the Labour Party would revolutionise the party system. There would now be little room for the old-fashioned Liberal. The new confrontation would be between Unionism and militant Socialism, i.e., between reaction and revolution. Mr. Balfour did not add that Unionism now implied Protection, and that the workmen would no longer have the safeguard of cheap food and a certain security from trusts. He declared nominally against laissez-faire, but insisted that the vital object of a statesman was to keep his gaze fixed on the "production of wealth;" its distribution might more or less take care of itself. This strikes us as a menacing proposition for the workmen.

MR. CHURCHILL has returned from his African tour, and made a series of brilliant speeches at the National Liberal Club and at Manchester. At the Club he contributed a glowing picture of the fertility and beauty of the East African Protectorates, and the success of the experiment of building up a peaceful and prosperous negro State, with a sprinkling of white directors, in Uganda. On the British Indian question in Natal he sided on the whole with the Transvaal Government, but supported a suggestion of Sir Charles Dilke's that room might be found for the Indian traders on the high and healthy plains of Equatorial Africa. At Manchester Mr. Churchill attended a powerful and important rally of Free Trade opinion, at which he spoke on the same platform with Mr. Arthur Elliot, and many leading Manchester Conservatives, including Mr. Garnett and Mr. Tootal-Broadhurst. Mr. Elliot declared stoutly for reprisals on the "Confederacy" Club, and said that if Mr. Balfour had gone for Protection at Birmingham he had ruined his party. Mr. Churchill argued the whole Free Trade case, showing the enormous growth of the cotton industry, and the much faster progress of our export trade during the last three years—the period of the Tariff Reform movement—than that of Protectionist countries. The increase works out in tabular fashion thus:—

Increase in British Export Trade (1904-1907),	13.9	per cent.
" United States "	10.7	"
" German "	6.9	"
" French "	3.5	"
* * *

ON Wednesday Mr. Churchill rallied his party supporters and powerfully criticised the proposal to set up the right of the parent to determine the religious education of his child. This right of the parent, as interpreted by the Bishop of Manchester, was to prevail against the rights of the State, against the interests of education and school management, and against the will of the House of Commons, but not against one of six thousand "ancient and mouldering" trust deeds which bound the schools to a single denomination. He declared Liberalism to be a middle party between re-action and revolution, and that its task was to "build up a minimum standard of life." But he denounced revolutionary Socialism as reversing the idea of the first Christian Socialism. The early Christian Communists said, "All mine is yours," but now extreme Socialism preached "All yours is mine," and its spirit was essentially selfish and fierce.—Sir Henry Fowler, speaking at Wolverhampton on Monday, quoted Mr. Gladstone, who was strongly anti-Socialist, as saying "in his quiet and stern way" of the nationalisation of the land, "Do you mean to pay for it, or do you not? If you mean to pay for it, it is folly; if you do not mean to pay for it, it is robbery."

* * *

LORD CURZON still stands at the door of the House of Lords, uncertain whether it will be opened to him. He has obtained a majority of votes as an Irish representative peer, but his position is announced by the Crown and Hanaper office in terms which show that his election is doubtful. The office states that he has obtained a majority of votes, but that Lord Ashtown has secured the next highest number. The matter is referred to the House of Lords itself, who will, we imagine, be largely guided by the Lord Chancellor. We have every desire to see Lord Curzon speaking in the House of Lords or most other assemblies, but it is a bad precedent for Unionists themselves to falsify the basis of Unionist representation in the British Parliament in order to serve a personal or a party need.

* * *

THE slight street disturbances which marked the Berlin franchise demonstration of Sunday week have been followed by conflicts in Berlin and Hanover between the unemployed and the police. The Berlin police used their sabres against a body of three hundred unemployed in the neighbourhood of the Reichstag building with considerable vigour and heartiness, and, according to the correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph," without provocation. The Prussian authorities would seem to be seriously disturbed by the prospect of an agitation carried on in the street. The Kaiser has personally thanked the Berlin police for their "energetic conduct" on "Red Sunday," and Prince Bülow in the Reichstag threatened the Socialists that their new path led downward and to danger. His history and his political psychology, however, were distinctly at fault when he protested that street politics were not in accordance with German feeling and practice, and that no demonstrations could extort anything from a Government "mindful of its duty." Whatever political liberties Germany, and in particular Prussia, enjoys were won in the streets and even by armed rising. The Prussian Socialists are really in very much the same condition as the middle-class revolutionists of 1848, for the franchise system prevents them electing a single representative to the Diet.

* * *

THE resort to street demonstrations does look like a change in the tactics of the German Social democracy. The German Socialists have lost considerably in prestige of late. The tame submission to the jerry-mandering of the franchise in the Hanse towns has contrasted very unfavourably with the vigorous action of Socialists in Austria and Hungary, and something like a reaction is in progress against excessive docility. During Wednesday's debate in the Reichstag the Centre supported the claim for universal and secret suffrage. The National Liberals, true to their record, backed the police and Prince Bülow. The Radicals evidently find it very difficult to make up their minds to enforce their theoretical approval of universal suffrage by throwing over the bloc. A few individual members and a fair number of associations are anxious to break with Prince Bülow, but the majority want before everything else to get the Bills they are interested in—a Bourse Bill and an Associations Bill—passed. The moral consequences which such good Radicals as Dr. Barth predicted from an alliance with high Tories have not been slow in coming.

* * *

THE Attorney-General, Sir J. Lawson Walton, died on Saturday in London, from a sudden attack of double pneumonia, following on a long enfeeblement of health. He was only in his 56th year, and his death, the penalty of the swift and crowded career of a successful lawyer, may be called premature. He had many qualities that interest and charm, for without being either a great lawyer or a great statesman, he stood in the first rank of lawyers and politicians, and deserved his eminence. He had tact, an excellent head, a remarkable clearness and fineness of style and expression, a sincere amiability, and singular patience of temper and bearing. He was asked to defend the wrong method of solving the problem of the Trades Disputes Bill, and did so with great skill, though with unfortunate effect. He belonged to the Imperialist group of Liberals, but not prominently. At the bar his advocacy, less powerful than that of Russell, was astute, pointed, and prudent. His successor as Attorney-General will be Sir William Robson, and the Solicitor-General's place should go of Parliamentary right to Mr. S. T. Evans, with Mr. Rufus Isaacs as a brilliant proxime accessit, having his chance to come.

* * *

THE Japanese Budget for 1908-9 is not cheerful reading. The estimated revenue and expenditure are made to balance at £61,600,000, a very heavy demand upon a poor Asiatic people, still only partially developed industrially. The additional revenue required is to be raised by means of new taxes upon the necessities of life, instead of, as at first intended, by a heavier income tax, and by means of a loan of £4,000,000; further, according to the "Japan Herald," though the official communiqué omits to mention it, £10,000,000 of Treasury Bonds are not to be redeemed. It looks, therefore, as though there was a deficit of £14,000,000, and this deficit will be increased by the promised supplementary budget on railway expenditure. The delay in settling the railway budget is due to differences of opinion, which have already caused a Ministerial crisis. The Japanese Government takes credit for increasing the contribution to the debt account by £1,000,000, and for opening out new permanent sources of revenue; but the debt is growing, and the proportion of irregular to permanent revenue sources is apparently still greater than it was two years ago. The only really satisfactory feature of the Budget is the resolution to knock off £12,000,000 authorised to be spent on armaments and communications during the next six years; the economy this year is chiefly at the expense of the army, not of the navy; but it is welcome not only to the Japanese people, but to Western peoples, who are being sacrificed in the race for the largest armaments budget.

* * *

Mr. LEMIEUX's mission to Tokio has resulted in a formal undertaking by the Japanese Government voluntarily to regulate emigration to Canada and to govern its policy by a careful consideration of the local conditions prevailing in the Dominion. Mr. Lemieux in the Canadian House of Commons gave definiteness to this promise by stating that Japanese immigration from the Hawaiian islands, from which quarter most of the emigrants have hitherto come, will be stopped, and that contract labourers even direct from Japan will be excluded unless the Canadian Government desires them. Students, merchants, and tourists are to retain full freedom of entry, and apparently, though this point is not quite clear, the emigration companies, upon which the blame for the great influx of recent years has been placed, are to be suppressed. The negotiations between Japan and the United States have not yet been concluded, but Count Hayashi's statement to an interviewer points to an agreement along the same lines as that with Canada.

* * *

THE Russian Foreign Office announces that the object of the negotiations now proceeding is the conclusion of special declarations by Russia and Germany, Sweden's neighbours, for the maintenance of the territorial status quo in the Baltic and the securing of Sweden in the new situation which has been created by the lapse of the Anglo-French guarantee treaty of 1855 owing to the separation of Norway. The proposed agreement, like the Mediterranean agreement of last May, and unlike the Norway guarantee treaty of last November, is to be confined to those Powers directly interested, though France and England have been kept informed of the negotiations. Denmark, though one of the Baltic Powers, has not yet taken part in the exchange of views, which suggests that a general Baltic guarantee is improbable. Certainly an agreement embracing Holland and Belgium, the countries on the outside of the Baltic gate, in the same way as the Mediterranean agreement covers "that part of the Atlantic Ocean which washes the shores of Europe and Africa," appears not to be contemplated. A larger arrangement would be more welcome, but even a limited guarantee makes for peace. There is, of course, no notion of converting the Baltic into a mare clausum.

* * *

THE deputation of Churchmen, clerical and lay, who waited on the Prime Minister and Mr. McKenna on Thursday, to support the teaching in schools of "the elements of the Christian faith," proved to be powerful and representative. Dr. Morrison, who introduced it, said that it included or was supported by three Anglican bishops, five deans, five canons, and five professors in the Universities, and the response to the invitations sent out was said to be "overwhelming." Its delegates certainly exhibited a high standard of scholarship and attainment. The Bishop of Hereford claimed that it also represented the "common sense of the great mass of English Churchmen, and of Englishmen, whether Churchmen or no," and that the opposition to "simple Bible teaching" was hardly sincere, for the High Churchmen had allowed thousands on thousands of children to attend the Board Schools. The Prime Minister, agreeing fully with the deputation, and declaring that it "held up the Government's hands," protested that it "went to one's heart" to hear the teaching of the Bible in schools described, as Lord Hugh Cecil had described it, as "corrosive" and "poisonous." Mr. McKenna added that he "rested his anchor on the Bible" and that Bible teaching was accepted throughout the land, east, west, north, and south. It was the sole alternative to secular instruction, for neither denominationalism nor the intervention of the individual parent was practicable. Both he and the Prime Minister insisted that if secular instruction was forced on, the responsibility would lie with the High Church denominationalists.

* * *

THE verdict of £1,000 damages awarded to Mr. A. Q. Tucker against the "Lancet" newspaper raises the interesting question—what is a quack? The tendency of men in all professions is to fix that epithet on all who attempt to practise without having gone through the orthodox training and received the orthodox certificates. In the "Lancet" case the plaintiff proved to the satisfaction of the jury that his remedies had done good to a number of persons suffering from asthma—a disease difficult to cure or even to relieve. Mr. Justice Ridley in his charge observed that the plaintiff's principle of "no cure, no pay" was more than one could get out of most doctors. While it is of importance that the public should be protected from unscrupulous or ignorant salesmen of useless or dangerous drugs, doctors, like other people, must submit to be judged by results.

* * *

THE Rugby International played at Bristol on Saturday last resulted in a win for Wales by 5 goals (1 dropped and 1 penalty) and 2 tries to 3 goals and 1 try scored by England. The heavy scoring was in some degree due to a thick fog, which made it quite impossible to see across the field of play, and, towards the end of the game, frequently obscured both the teams from the view of the spectators. As far as could be judged from football played under such conditions, Wales deserved to win. The Welsh forwards were quicker in getting possession of the ball in the scrummages, and provided their backs with plenty of chances. On the other hand, the English forwards showed to advantage in the open, and some of their dribbling rushes were excellent. Of the backs, Bush, the Cardiff half, played a brilliant game. He is a quick, resourceful player, and he gave his three-quarters scope for the passing game for which Welsh players are justly famous. The English team showed pluck and endurance. They managed to cross the Welsh line four times—a feat that has not been accomplished during the past ten years. English Rugby footballers may congratulate themselves on the fact that the game is undoubtedly reaching a higher standard in this country.

* * *

AT the Doré Galleries are nine of the religious pictures by the late Sir Noel Paton. The artist, who might rightly have been described as the pre-Raphaelite member for Scotland, was one of the most conscientious workers of his kind, and in this series of canvases, which extends over nearly forty years, one is principally impressed by the consistency of his technique. There is practically no difference in execution between the "Pursuit of Pleasure" of 1855 and the "De Profundis" of 1892. The emotional qualities and the symbolism of these pictures do not strike us as being more profound than those in most respectable religious works of the Victorian age.

Politics and Affairs.

THE SOCIALISM OF THE LABOUR PARTY.

THE Conference of the Labour Party at Hull has puzzled most of its critics, friendly and unfriendly, by its sudden change of front on the subject of Socialism. On Tuesday the delegates, whose votes count in proportion to the membership of the societies they represent, rejected by 951,000 votes to 91,000 a resolution moved by one trade society that the Labour Party should declare as its "ultimate object" the "overthrow of the present system of capitalism." On the following day it carried, by 514,000 votes to 469,000, a motion, presented by another and more powerful society, in favour of the "socialisation of the means of production, distribution, and exchange." Much the same massive, polysyllabic formula has been presented to millions of enthusiasts on thousands of platforms all over the Western world since the genius of a German Jew gave it currency. In the case of the Hull Conference it is, indeed, stripped of its practical force by the insistence even of its friends that it represents not a test of membership but a pious opinion. Non-Socialists are still to be eligible for election to a party which draws the bulk of its funds from non-Socialist sources. The trade union element is to remain undisturbed. In fact, the attitude of the Socialist wing at the Conference is a confession that its resolution goes ahead of the general labour constituency. We suspect that Mr. Shackleton, the ablest Parliamentarian in the Labour Party, is right when he declares that Wednesday's vote will check the movement of unity which is gradually transferring the central force of organised labour from trade unionism to labour representation. The miners, the greatest force of all, may now draw back; the Lancashire workers, Free Traders but largely infused with conservative notions about the State, may also be repelled. Indeed, the chief result of the academic motion of Wednesday may be the use to which it is being put in every Conservative newspaper which we have read, namely, the frightening away of the middle classes, not merely from labour politics, but from social reform and the Liberal Party. To the average manipulator of the Protectionist Party, the Red Flag is no more a serious emblem than is the "Jolly Roger" in "Peter Pan." It is a mere asset in the business of discrediting Free Trade.

It is here that the Labour Party is in danger of making its great miscalculation. It may think that it can replace the Liberal Party by disillusioning the mass of its working-class supporters about it. To an extent it may succeed. The serious workers may be increasingly attracted by a propaganda with a religious appeal, the outcome of volunteer enthusiasm, coming from their own class, enunciated in their own language, and breathing the hope of social regeneration. These influences may well tend to draw workmen from the more artificial Liberal organisations, with their machinery of paid workers and their mixed middle-class and working-class origin. Socialism is the gospel of the street corner, where most gospels begin. Ministers are beginning to preach it; a great mass of serious, intelligent thinking is steadily turned on it; it is especially welcome to the young and ardent; nearly all the interesting democratic movements in other lands are conducted by it. But these advantages do not create a party fitted for government, and for immediate purposes the workmen have to choose between a body of politicians who will guarantee them cheap food and keep social reform to the front, and a party pledged to tax their food and held in being by rich men for rich men's purposes. Already Mr. Balfour is prepared to take cynical advantage of the situation, and to menace the workers with a high Protectionist Party, in which care will be concentrated on the "production of wealth," and its distribution, i.e., the share of the workers in its fruits, is to be left to look after itself.

We need not, however, exaggerate the import of Wednesday's formal incursion into Socialist doctrine. We may read into the Labour Party's declaration of a Socialist basis as much and as little as our knowledge of the character of our workmen and of the general tendencies of our politics suggests. A society which for nineteen hundred years has professed the Christian ideal without moving with undue haste to its realisation need not concern itself overmuch with crude attempts to rebuild the modern State more or less in harmony with that ideal. Men will go on for generations making laws in the Socialist fashion, and breaking or despising them after the anarchist model, without abolishing law or capitalism or destroying private enterprise. Socialist workmen will protest, to the shedding of innocent blood, against the usurpations of bureaucracy, as their fellows are protesting in the streets and Parliament of Berlin to-day; and ardent individualists will call aloud for State aid against vivisectionists or child-torturers. The human struggle for liberty and against injustice will go on amid these apparent contradictions, only now and then conscious of its victories, and always looking forward to a perfection that only a thoroughly cleansed and exalted humanity will realise. And politicians, whose business it is to deal with immediate difficulties, will be unwise to grudge to workmen the elements of hope and imagination that Socialism supplies, often as their main intellectual and moral resource in a brief and obscure pilgrimage. At least, Socialism does not spoil the lives of workmen; like religion, it raises and softens them, and is a substitute for their grosser temptations. And we must remember, too, that it gives them a rather larger outlook than pure trade unionism affords. It forces them to regard the complications of society from another point of view than that of the manual labourers only. The workmen have as yet hardly begun to think of the intricate problems of foreign politics, diplomatic relations, colonial administration, constitutional Government. So long as everything is regarded purely from a wage-earner's point of view, the larger conceptions cannot enter into working-class policy. A pure workman's party, for example, will measure the question of armaments by the employment or dismissal of workmen at Woolwich, and Chatham, and Portsmouth; a Socialist Party, with its wider outlook, comes more closely into touch with enlightened middle-class opinion on the general problem of military and naval expenditure. What we hope to see the advanced labour leaders realise is first that they do not command the whole field of working-class interests, and that a sudden wave of depression and unemployment might sweep great masses of wage-earners into the Protectionist camp; and secondly, that when a serious movement is afoot, like that for social reform, they must seize and make the most of it before the reaction comes. The triumph of the "new Unionism" in the late 'eighties was followed by the long reign of Imperialism, during which neither the political nor the economic opinions of the workmen had any appreciable weight in the councils of the State. If Imperialism returns to-morrow it brings Protection with it, and only a weakened Liberal and Labour Party to confront that double menace.

THE MORAL OF MID DEVON.

THE Mid Devon election marks a new phase in politics because it has at last proved it possible for a seat to be won on Tariff Reform. Hitherto the record of the Tariff Reformers had been an unbroken series of disasters. They had successively lost all doubtful and many "safe" seats. They had gained none except through personal causes or "split" votes. In Mid Devon no such secondary causes were at work. The Liberal candidate was all that could be desired, and let us say in passing that none who know Mr. Buxton doubt that in spite of this rebuff he has an assured Parliamentary career before him. The victory in Mid Devon was political, and the political principles involved were those of Free Trade versus Tariff Reform. Tariff Reform can win an English agricultural constituency. That is the "new fact" proclaimed on Saturday at Newton Abbot.

It is true that if we look closely into the matter the circumstances of the victory are seen to be not altogether such as to encourage the modern variety of Protectionism. From the varied causes assigned for the Liberal defeat one emerges as agreed on by all sides. The rise in the price of bread and other articles of food is admitted to have been a prominent feature in the campaign. Now, there is something a little paradoxical in the spectacle of a Tariff Reformer who proposes to tax food winning on the ground that food has already become dearer. If the full meaning of the victory be considered, it will be seen that it does not augur well for the permanent acquiescence of the people in any form of taxation which would increase the cost of the necessities of life. Yet it is easy to see in the vote the kind of confused logic which expresses the movements of the mass-mind. There lies behind it the expectation, fostered perhaps by incautious speeches at the General Election, that it is the business of Liberal Governments to see that food is cheap; that this Government failed in its duty; that Free Trade had not prevented the price of the loaf from rising; and that in the general disgust at the course of things it might be as well to try the remedies of Tariff Reform. It may be said that against logic of this kind the gods themselves fight in vain. But there is another side to the question. How was it, we might ask, that this election came to be fought on the fiscal controversy at all? The Liberal Government has been in office two years with a great majority at its back armed with powers to devise and carry out the real remedies for those evils for which Tariff Reform offers quack medicines. How is it that those real remedies are not filling the public mind and occupying the arena of controversy at contested elections? The answer is, in part, that these remedies are still to seek. The Government stand on the negative issue of the Tariff question, because they have no sufficient record of a positive social policy to show. For Scotland, indeed, they have a Radical land policy which, by all accounts, is raising the democracy in the constituencies to a vivid and even impassioned interest in politics. In England the fate of their land policy still hangs in the balance, and may be decided not by them but, failing a powerful intervention from the centre, by favour of the County Councils. Apart from the Land Act there is still little to attract and hold popular support. Old Age Pensions, indeed, are in the air. But they are sometimes talked of by Liberal speakers and newspapers in such a way as only to chill the feeling for them. What might be the most popular measure ever brought forward by a Government is ushered in by speeches which treat it as a concession made grudgingly and of necessity, to be minimised to the utmost degree, to be apologised for on the ground that it will do little and not cost much. The question of the unemployed, growing now month by month in urgency, for which Tariff Reform offers a spurious but plausible solution, is left to the brusque negations of Mr. Burns. Education has been so handled as to excite the animosity of the Church while leaving the Nonconformists cold and doubtful whether anything can be done by a Government which declines the combat with the Upper House. There is no sufficient ground of appeal to the masses, and much talk to alarm the vested interests.

Let us look at the Parliamentary situation with a little candour. More and more, we think, it will be seen, as time goes on, that the root of the difficulty lies in the neglect of the Government to deal with the House of Lords last year. They failed to use the full tide of Liberal enthusiasm to carry them over the obstacle with a rush, and now they may have to deal with it on the ebb. What is the immediate prospect? Two measures of real social importance, but beset with political dangers, are promised. There is to be a Licensing Bill, the fear of which has already brought the full force of the publicans into the field. Will the Lords pass it, or will they, adroitly advised by Mr. Balfour, leave it to fill up the cup, not of their unpopularity but of ours? There is to be an Education Bill which, just though it may be, may enrage the Church and alienate the Catholics. All the interests opposed to it will thank God that we have a House of Lords. It will, we are sure, be backed by the Nonconformists. But at the same time there is to be an Irish University Bill, and the Nonconformists will secretly rejoice if the House of Lords throws it out. The danger is that at the end of the year there may be an assortment of Liberal measures hanging suspended between the two Houses. Each of them will exasperate a section of the electorate. Few of them will entirely satisfy any portion of the electorate.

We are not suggesting that any of these measures should be dropped. But we see that their fate has been prejudiced by the mistake of dropping the Constitutional issue. The remedy, we believe, is to be found in setting in front of our activities measures of legislation and administration which shall prove that Liberalism and Free Trade can afford a basis for a constructive policy of Social Reform. The principal efforts of this policy must lie in dealing with the problems of poverty, of unemployment, and of the land. Let our Old Age Pension scheme be not a half measure, which will alarm the middle class without succouring the poor, but a generous plan that will form the basis of a new and more humane system of dealing with poverty. Let it be recommended, not with bated breath and whispering humbleness, but with a confident appeal to the awakened social consciousness. Let us cease to treat the unemployed as though the chief thing to do was to let them die out, and let us proceed with the Valuation Bills, which are the necessary preliminary of land and housing reform. Let us frankly understand that if our appeal is to the democracy we must place before it the things that the democracy cares about, and that we shall not win it to the great effort necessary for a constitutional struggle by only setting before it issues which distract and divide, and proposing measures which at best it reluctantly accepts as an unpleasant duty. The Mid-Devon election will not be without its uses if it teaches that the stream of Free Trade will not flow on of itself with a force sufficient to bear down all obstacles, but that it is on their own efforts that Free Traders must rely to prove that theirs is the true line of social progress. Instead of ignoring the evils with which the Tariff Reformer proposes to deal, they must counter his delusive promises with genuine reforms, based on a fearless application of democratic principles of finance.

WHAT THE HOUSING BILLS SHOULD DO.

Nor the least important of the measures of the Session will be the amalgamated Bills on Housing and Town Planning, which are due from the President of the Local Government Board. Both schemes were promised and drafted last year, and when they were postponed, their early revival was inevitable. The occasion will be interesting, for it will witness Mr. Burns's first essay in the path of large and serious legislation. The country will be able to judge what powers this virile personality possesses of handling a subject of great complexity and of vital importance to the physical and moral strength of our people. He must look for keen and thoroughly informed critics. In replying to the deputation of housing reformers which interviewed him in 1906, Mr. Burns naturally praised the work of his own Department. But the Local Government Board is far from being one of our more progressive centres of administration. Few public offices have illustrated more strongly the conservatism of the official mind, or its tendency to develop as a repressive, rather than a stimulating, force. The great municipalities might have given a far better account of their stewardship had a more generous and imaginative spirit presided over the authority whose frequent narrowness and weakness have set their stamp on our housing legislation. If it be true, as the reformers contend, that the evil of bad housing extends in mass, if not in acuteness, and that bad houses were never more prevalent, the blame must be divided between the central and the local authorities. Some kind of progress there has been, but when we remember that there are still districts in London with a death rate of fifty per thousand, that Scotland can only show an average of three rooms to each family she rears, with a huge mass of one-room dwellings, and that the whole process of town extension threatens a perpetuation, even an aggravation, of slum life, we find little ground for self-congratulation. A Bill which deals adequately with such evils can be no mere ingenious re-coiling of old threads of red tape. It must be large and bold, planned with full cognisance of the fact that bad housing is still slaying and crippling our town and country population, just as surely as drink, the attendant devil of the slums, is slaying and crippling it.

The evils of our housing system are in the main three. First, the want of houses, which amounts in parts almost to a famine; secondly, the existence in other districts of bad and insanitary houses; thirdly, the absence of plan and system in the organisation of working-class and small middle-class housing, and of provision for a share of human pleasures and amenities. Here and there a great employer, like Mr. Cadbury or Mr. Lever, has attacked all these evils and abolished them, for their own employees and for selected groups of workers, at a stroke. Here and there a great foreign municipality, like that of Boston or Frankfort, makes large and serious efforts to destroy them. But for the most part our own public administration has been almost a nullity, so far as the creation of well-housed communities is concerned. To a large extent, this deficiency is due to the absence of fitting machinery. The central power has been feeble, obscure, and often reactionary; the local powers are unable to act in concert and over wide areas, nor have we witnessed anything like the same growth and organisation of benevolent private opinion such as exists in France and Belgium in the shape of the Comités de Patronage. The result is that we can provide neither for the growth nor the movement of our working people. Villages dwindle, the land cries out for labour, and yet of those who linger on the country side, perhaps half dwell in ill-ventilated hovels, which should be pulled down to-morrow. Our town suburb straggles out in mean streets of little houses devoid of all plan, of all unity of life, of all provision for the pleasant and healthy nurture of its child population.

Nor do the development and the opening up of great tram-lines solve the problem, as Mr. Burns seems to think that they do. Tram extension does not go far enough. It is able to shoot down masses of people at the termini, but through the absence of connection between municipal and private systems of carriage, it leaves them far too near the centre of the city's life, and the new demand for houses is met so slowly that overcrowding recurs. Certain difficulties are undoubtedly associated with the German system of town extension. But no one can doubt the conclusion of experts like Mr. Horsfall and Mr. Cadbury that in the main the German, and also the American, systems of arranging model suburbs on large and harmonious plans, which take account of the necessities and also of some of the charms of a rational human life, are essentially superior to our own method or want of method. Happily, our recent legislation is pregnant with examples of what a strong and resolute Government can do when it has thoroughly made up its mind to come to terms with great social and economic evils. Large and powerful central machinery has been set up in the last few years for the acquiring of land and cottages for the Irish people and for the provision of small holdings for English peasants. It is not unreasonable to ask the Government to declare that what is good enough for Ireland is good enough for England, and what is good enough for land-holding is good enough for housing. Under the Small Holdings Act, the Central Commissioners can explore and disclose the extent of the demand for land and can step in with authority when the local body is recalcitrant. They or others can lend money to local bodies, can extend their loans up to eighty years, and can arrange cheap terms of repayment. In other words, the Government have formed a new department for the development of the use of land by the mass of the people. Why should not the same supervising and energising force be applied to the provision of housing?

It is clear then that two great processes need to be set in operation together. By degrees we have to get rid of a great mass of houses which, to use a phrase embedded in our present housing laws, are not "reasonably fit" for human habitation, and therefore we have to condemn and demolish. But in the act we have to remember that we are aggravating one phase of the existing difficulty, namely, the shortage of accommodation, with its dire consequences of over-crowding and excessive renting. It is useless to dis-house, to insist on raising the standard of living and on forcing the hovel out of existence, if we do not at the same time provide for re-housing, and avoid a further depression, the creating of new clots of congested and over-rented districts. The first necessity is that of local and intimate knowledge, the intervention of a small knot of public-spirited people. Eyes must be found for the public authority—an Intelligence Department, to find out where the enemy lies and what are his forces. Science has acquainted us with the close connection between bad housing and disease. Many of the worst physical plagues of mankind are directly stimulated by over-crowded and insanitary homes. We ought to have ample means of ascertaining the precise death-dealing properties of the individual slum dwelling—where consumption is bred, or enteric, or diphtheria. Thus the conscience of the community can be stimulated, and its knowledge greatly enhanced, so that the local authority, with its register of houses at hand—containing the name of the owner of site and buildings and the kind of accommodation he provides—can act with force and precision. The demolition of bad dwellings and the clearance of slum areas should be vigorously set in hand, and here at least compensation may be closely restricted.

The destructive provisions of a thorough Housing Act can be readily compassed, and we have no doubt that Mr. Burns will ensure them. What of re-housing? It is in this direction that we hope much from the combined action of the Housing and Town Planning Bills. The business of a strong central authority will be not only to enforce compliance with the Public Health Acts, but to set a term to the anarchy of town extension, and to map out areas suitable for large, combined treatment. Then the local authorities can come in. Clearly they should have powers of acting together. The isolation of the London County Council from the surrounding bodies has gone far to create the congestion of London main roads, the huddled streets of suburban slums, the high rentals that accompany housing schemes on the near fringe of the great London estate, or at its heart. Powers of compulsory land purchase on a considerable scale, and by combined county authorities, are essential. Under those conditions alone can adequate schemes of "town planning" be achieved, enclosing wide areas secured for garden cities. These in turn should be provided with open spaces, recreation grounds, tree-planted roads, and means of quick and cheap transit to the working centre. To avoid the error of German municipal schemes, a strict limit should be fixed to the population settled on each acre of land. For a work of regeneration so large it is useless to look merely to private enterprise. The energies of the great corporations must be enlisted. They alone can fitly exercise the powers of land purchase and taxation which must accompany an adequate attempt to restore to the people of our cities the elements of associated life, not divorced from the animating and health-giving forces of nature. But we quite agree that the State might act, as it acts to-day, by way of loans on easy terms to genuine building societies or even to private owners, and that the work of construction should in the main be left in private hands. The essential point is to discover a means of generating local energy, to give that energy its fullest possible extension, to combine public and private effort in an endeavour to cut out the two cancers of slum life from the English town and of hovel life from the English village.

THE RISE OF MOHAMEDAN DEMOCRACY.

A LETTER in the "Times," over the now familiar pseudonym of "Galata," makes an able and convincing apology for the vague tendency known as "Pan-Islamism." It would, indeed, be difficult to produce a competent student of Eastern affairs who would now endorse the alarmist view of this movement, which was at one time current in many English and French newspapers. Experts, whose whole lives have been devoted to the cause of the oppressed Christian races of Turkey, Mr. Edwin Pears for example, have come forward to second the plea for toleration put forward by writers like Professor Browne and Mr. Blunt, whose sympathies are more definitely with Islam. What remains of prejudice and panic is now manifestly due either to ignorance or to local political interests.

Pan-Islamism might easily have become, like the Pan-Slavism of the 'seventies, a definitely reactionary tendency. Pan-Slavism owed its special colour to a little group of romantic thinkers who captured the Russian court and Russian society. Pan-Islamism, in its turn, threatened to be for a time an intrigue directed from Yildiz Palace. The two movements were indeed closely akin, though one based itself primarily on race and the other on religion. Both involved a reverence for a personal head, the orthodox Tsar and the Caliph Sultan; both implied a hostility towards the "godless" or "infidel" West and its innovating civilisation; both tended to the persecution of intelligent alien minorities, notably the Armenians; both borrowed from the West its worst and most reactionary invention, a centralised bureaucracy. But, as an international link, this official and Hamidian form of Pan-Islamism has found little favour among the awakening Mohamedan masses. Persia lay outside its scope, for Persia is heretical and Shiah. Morocco, reactionary to the verge of insanity, was isolated, since its Sultan does not acknowledge Abdul Hamid's claim to be Caliph. The Arabs also contest that claim, and hope to restore the headship of Islam to the Holy Cities. The really aggressive and fanatical element in Islam, the primitive races of the Soudan and the Sahara, are more disposed to look for a Messiah-Mahdi, who will overthrow the existing order of the world, than to range themselves under a Conservative Caliph, who incarnates the idea of things as they are. Only among the Sunni Mohamedans of India and the Straits did this propaganda from Constantinople meet with a partial success—enough, at least, to make them restive when the European concert coerces the Sultan. But even this success was balanced by the local politics of India. The Mohamedans of India cannot become anti-European, because of their jealousy of the Hindu majority. Abdul Hamid, in short, has nothing to show as the fruit of the policy of a reign, save the corpses of the Armenians, a few resolutions from India, a letter from the Ameer, and a courtly embassy to China.

The events of recent years, however, have shown that the essential idea of Pan-Islamism is capable of a very different reading. That Islam is in danger of succumbing to the political and economic superiority of Europe is common ground to Liberals and reactionaries alike. But where reaction seeks a remedy in the cultivation of a fanatical resistance to the West and all its works, the Liberals look nearer home for the causes of the decline of Mohamedan peoples. Sunnis and Shiahhs, Arabs and Tartars and Persians, are now reaching a diagnosis which is remarkably unanimous. They all declare against the despotic tradition as something quite alien from Islam, and even contrary to it. In Russia, for example, the Mohamedans are all ranged with the "Cadets," or in a few cases with the Socialists. In Persia they have made, in Egypt they demand, a Parliament. They are looking for new interpretations of the Koran, which will allow them to take their place as competitors with the West in the economic struggle. Thus the doctors of Cairo have declared that joint-stock companies do not come within the prohibited forms of usury. They are everywhere breaking down the prejudice against Western education, and seeking inspiration in the scientific successes of the Saracens. Their chief method of propaganda is the daily or weekly Press. In Persia they are turning from the old theocratic tradition to the idea of a secular and civil law. There, too, the Left Wing has come near already to securing the admission of non-Mohamedans to political equality. In this connection perhaps the most significant event of all has been the decision of the two "Young Turkish" leagues to join their forces to those of the Armenians in a revolutionary movement against the whole Hamidian system. These popular parties do not find the differences between the orthodox and the heretics an obstacle to unity and sympathy. The "Young Turks" in Paris exchange public greetings with the heretical Persian Parliament, and the Egyptians are equally broad-minded. The Pan-Islamic Congress, which Ismail Bey Gasprinsky, a distinguished Russian author, has summoned to meet in Cairo next autumn, will include Persian Shiahhs, as well as Russian and Turkish Sunnis. The mere fact that it could not meet in Constantinople is proof enough that the real movement towards Mohamedan unity is essentially Liberal, and as far as possible from acknowledging the leadership of Abdul Hamid, or obeying the wire-pullers of Yildiz Palace. Exactly the same thing has happened to Pan-Slavism. The Russian Court recently attempted to organise a Pan-Slavist Congress on Russian soil, only to meet with a rebuff from the Liberal Slavs of Austria.

In extending a welcome to what is essentially a movement of progress, we encounter two obstacles. In the first place it is still a tradition with the humaner parties of Europe to support the Christians of Turkey against the Mohamedans. Pan-Slavists and Gladstonians alike assumed that Turkey was incapable of reform from within, that Islam was a religion of intolerance and persecution, and that the Eastern question could be solved only by the dismemberment of the Ottoman Empire. So far as these charges of persecution and this diagnosis of despair were directed against the official classes, they are as true to-day as they were in the 'seventies. Vigorous intervention on the lines contemplated by Russian Pan-Slavists and English Liberals would have settled the Turkish question, in Europe at least, a generation ago. But, in point of fact, the intervention has been slow and ineffectual. The Turks, seeing in the Christians only the protégés of a hostile Europe, have attacked them as the vanguard of a foreign foe. The Christians, hoping for salvation on nationalist lines, have omitted to do what the oppressed Jews have done in Russia—to permeate and lead the general movement of reform. The result has been the perpetuation of racial feuds, and the weakening of every progressive force by mutual friction and foreign intrigue. At length, with the news of the federation of the Armenian and Young Turkish leagues, a brighter future is within sight. A Turkish renaissance is at length possible, and the reform of the whole Empire may prove to be the solution of all its local and racial problems. The Constitutionalists will doubtless fail to depose Abdul Hamid, but they may be strong enough to influence the choice and dictate the policy of his successor. Our part is to consider how far we can adapt our traditional policy to these new conditions, and work rather for the strengthening and liberalising of a reformed Turkey than for its partition.

The second obstacle is created by the unhappy relations which Lord Cromer established between the occupation and the Egyptian Nationalists. The "Times," always the friend of liberal movements in past centuries and other Empires, naïvely distinguishes between this Egyptian revival and kindred Mohamedan awakenings. It patronises the Persian Parliament. It is stirred to fury when Egyptians demand a Parliament on the Nile. It sees in the Egyptian demand for self-government only a proof of "fanaticism," and professes to trace in all the doings of its leaders the hand of Abdul Hamid and the inspiration of Yildiz Palace. Now, it is true that in their intense hostility to the later developments of Lord Cromer's policy, the Nationalists did welcome the Tabah complication as a convenient means of displaying their dislike of their conquerors; they may even have hoped to see us seriously embarrassed. There they behaved exactly as the Irish have behaved during all our recent wars, when they applauded the Mahdi, and idealised Mr. Kruger. But they no more desire to submit to the direct rule of Turkey than the Irish desired to be governed by the Boers. It was a symptom of acute discontent, which we are entitled to resent, if we please, but not to misconstrue. The Egyptians ask for self-government and not for Turkish rule. For the rest the whole series of their demands proves how essentially their movement is one of enlightenment and Liberalism. More education, the recognition of the Arabic language, a secular University, a municipality for Cairo, a Parliament for Egypt—these are their chief demands. Is it conceivable that such a programme as this could have been sketched in Yildiz Palace? The French, who watch this gratuitous quarrel objectively, are amazed at our blindness, and the "Temps" has even gone so far as to congratulate itself that the newspaper of Mustapha Kamel Pasha, the most intractable of the Egyptian leaders, circulates among the Mohamedans of Morocco. The "Temps" has seen what the "Times" cannot see, that this national awakening, however distasteful it may be to official Englishmen, is making for tolerance and enlightenment. A wise Imperialism would remember that the native influences concentrated in Cairo radiate all over the Mohamedan world. Arabic is the Latin of Islam, and even its ephemeral literature goes to India and Russia, to Persia and Morocco. After the influence of Arabic journalism comes that of the great theological University of El Azhar. It sends its doctors and teachers west to Nigeria, south to Uganda, north to Bokhara. Do we realise that, while our feud with Egyptian nationalism lasts, these men will carry away from their student days in Cairo an intense impression of hostility and distrust towards the British official classes? Lord Cromer has been telling us that the Empire is built on Free Trade. There is a commerce in ideas which no tariffs can exclude. It would be a misfortune if the idea were to go forth from Egypt to-day all over Islam, that no Mohamedan people can hope to develop its nationality, or to attain self-government under the protection of British Imperialism.

Life and Letters.

THE SEX WAR.

"WHEN forty years ago," said an elderly Radical in our hearing, "some of us greeted with enthusiasm the ideal of cultured womanhood in Tennyson's 'Princess,' we did not think that the higher education of women would end in street fights with the police, and brawlings at public meetings." Certainly these sensational events are the fruits of female education. The franchise agitation on its pacific side has found almost all its keenest and most energetic workers among women of intellectual culture, and the physical force of propagandism is itself the extreme expression of the "logic" of the situation. "As outlaws, we must behave as outlaws and suffer as outlaws, winning by force and suffering the gains which history shows have always demanded this price." When the Southern planters in the United States forbade by rigorous penalties the teaching of reading and writing among the negro slaves, they were prompted by a true self-regarding instinct. "Invent printing and you invent democracy," said Carlyle. Put the Bible into the hands of Zulus, or the Declaration of Independence into the hands of Filipinos, Macaulay's "History" and Mill's "Liberty" into the hands of Hindoos, and they become revolutionary documents, inciting to illegal violence precisely those minds that are most susceptible to the reality of ideas. We may go further back, and find the true origin of the Woman's Suffrage Movement in the slow admission of the view that women have souls. Indeed, the Mussulman is the only logical anti-suffragist, for the rational transition from souls to votes is irresistible. But that the impregnable reasonableness of the demand will stamp itself upon the Statute-Book either now or within our present range of vision is by no means certain. For though logic and the desire to achieve intellectual harmony in political arrangements are sometimes unduly disparaged by students of history, sound dialectics can seldom carry the day against the primitive motives. Now the problem which is being disclosed by the clash of this new dramatic movement is far subtler and deeper-rooted than appears upon the surface.

It belongs to what is sometimes called "the war of the sexes," a fact which is as real as the harmony essential to the maintenance of the species. But this antagonism is not the simple one which would be presented by the free play of men's and women's lives springing from the physical differences of sex function. In a civilised society thus springing up one would expect a chasm between the æsthetics and the morals of the two sexes, which, if they were brought together on the plane of politics, would war with one another. And this in essence is a struggle of the future. But it is both vitiated and exasperated by what may provisionally be termed the "artificial" interference of men with the evolution of woman. By this we mean not merely the arrogation to himself by man, in all save a few instances of savage societies, of the sole determination of the larger outer events in the history of the family, the tribe, the nation, but the moulding of the character and conduct of woman. Man has not merely formed for himself his conceptions of what women ought to be and to do, but he has brought about a conventional and emotional acceptance of these conceptions by woman herself. Now this we take to be the most real grievance of woman, and the claim for political rights we regard as one of the modes of protest and of remedy against the ancient claim of man to mould the destiny and character of woman to suit his needs and his notions of what woman and the family should be. Take, for example, the common use of such terms as "virtue" and "honour," in their relation to the sexes. No one can question that the wide divergence in their use for the two sexes, and their special application to women, are essentially masculine inventions, and embody masculine ideals. There may be, nay must be, wide divergences between the ideals of male and female goodness and propriety, which would spring up among men and women. But assuredly they would not be identical with those divergences which are distinctly man-made.

The actual physical and economic domination exercised by man has made woman after his own image, and by imposing his ideal has thwarted hers. The very shock which the Suffragette methods has caused among emotional men (and imitative women) is due in no small measure to the fact that man has bred and trained a sort of woman apt to seek and gain her ends by subtlety and sexual cajolery, rather than by plain demands of right, sustained by that physical force which man recognises as serviceable in the assertion of his rights. The distorted and exasperated sex antagonism thus exhibited by the Woman's Franchise Movement is not confined to the physical force propaganda, or even to the opponents of the demand for the franchise. The most striking illustration of its character is seen among male Radicals, many of them out and out democrats, and sufficiently intelligent to admit the clear logic of democracy in its bearing on the issue. "I agree that representative government involves the direct and equal representation in Parliament of the needs, desires, and experience of all the people, and that this involves Woman's Suffrage. As a rational man, accepting this clear implication of democracy, I should vote for Woman's Suffrage. But I don't like it, and I feel a secret sympathy with any action, not my own, which retards its consummation."

This candid avowal implies two facts. First, that the long tradition of woman as an ornament, a comforter, has left, as it inevitably must, even upon enlightened men, some survival of its impress; in Meredithian language, that they have not yet rounded "Cape Turk." Secondly, there is the instinctive defence of the "old man," against the anticipated encroachments of the "new woman." What the ordinary man condenses into the fear lest woman voters might close the public house, the notion that life generally may be over-feminised, plays a very important part in the opposition not only to woman's franchise but to woman's entrance upon any of the industrial and professional fields which man has held as male preserves. It is not wholly the greed of the monopolist, but a fear, well grounded or not, of feminism.

This feeling and, above all, the knowledge held by many Liberal politicians that it is shared by most of their fellow-Liberals has, of course, found expression in the disingenuous policy of procrastination and prevarication which Suffragists naturally denounce. It has there united with other easily intelligible motives of short-range party opportunism, the fear of the Church, of the country house, and of "forty years in the wilderness." But Suffragists, inflamed with indignation at the contradiction between Liberal theory and Liberal practice, may do well to reflect that though the opportunism of Conservative Party managers may appear encouraging to their cause, the deeper sex-antagonism we dwell upon will be even stronger among the rank and file of the Conservative Party.

The problem as we see it finds its closest analogy in those race-issues which come to the front in all mixed communities where democracy is seeking to assert itself. Where one race has long held another in slavery or in subjection, the character and will both of master and of subject-race are so injured by the experience that the growth of a new relationship on a basis of equality is a very slow process. It may take many generations more to breed out of the Southern States the love of masterhood which mocks their pretensions to "democracy," while the physical repulsion which, in spite of the illicit intermixture, remains a genuine barrier, may always be a weakness in their political and social system. Though the same obstacles to harmony do not exist in the sex struggle, it is right for thoughtful people to try and recognise that this Suffrage movement is not merely for a vote—a thing bought and sold for half-a-crown among some grades of male citizens—but that it belongs to one of the great tidal movements of civilisation, the assertion of the right and duty of women to form womanly standards of judgment and conduct for themselves instead of receiving them from men, as the necessary condition of a more enlightened society in which these standards will find equal expression with those of men in the life of the family, the city, and the State.

DAVID FRIEDRICH STRAUSS.

If we look back upon the intellectual life of Germany during the last century we shall find that it has been dominated by two great fundamental beliefs. In the first half of the century the German people were sustained and inspired by a belief in the power of ideas, and the great figure of Goethe stands out like an Olympian god as the visible representative of this attitude of mind. Disillusion followed the failure of the political movements which arose in wild enthusiasm and feebly flickered out in the middle of the century. The men of ideas had been unable to accomplish anything tangible in the world of action. They were hopelessly beaten by agencies which they intellectually despised. The reaction produced by the spectacle of failure took shape in a revolt from all forms of idealism and the steady but irresistible growth of a belief in the efficacy of force. The rugged, massive, imperious personality of Bismarck, the man of blood and iron, is the typical expression and embodiment of German ideas in the second half of the nineteenth century. A belief in ideas was succeeded and supplanted by a belief in force.

One of the most remarkable figures in the idealist movement was David Friedrich Strauss, who was born in the little town of Ludwigsburg in Wuerttemberg on the twenty-seventh of this month just a hundred years ago. Rather delicate in his earlier years, he became more robust as he approached manhood, and at this period one of his school friends said of him that it was difficult to recognise in the thin, erect, and resolute figure of the young man with the dark grey eyes and the beautiful old German hair the timid and bashful boy of a few years before. At the age of seventeen he went to study theology at Tuebingen, and at this time the mystic spirit of his race and of the age in which he lived manifested themselves within him. Schelling and Jakob Boehme became his favourite authors, and of Boehme he said in later years that he went deeper into the mystery of things and was a more immediate revelation of the Divine than the Bible itself. In his student days he nourished himself on romantic poetry and mystic philosophy, combined with a keen interest in classical antiquity. Baur was one of his teachers, and called his attention to Schleiermacher, then in the height of his fame. But Strauss was not satisfied with the conception that the expressions of the religious feeling are the ultimate foundations of faith, and, like most of the youth of his day, he finally cast anchor in the philosophy of Hegel. In fact, Hegel's ideas exercised such an influence over him that in 1831 he threw up all his appointments in order to go and sit at the feet of that philosopher. But a serious disappointment awaited him, for, soon after his arrival in Berlin Hegel died, and Schleiermacher was the first to apprise him of the fact. "It was for his sake that I came here," said Strauss, and, during his stay in the Prussian capital, he sought companionship and refreshment in the circle of Hegel's disciples.

It was in Berlin that the idea of writing the book of his life, a critical "Life of Jesus," first began to assume a definite shape in his thoughts. The first volume appeared in 1835, and was rapidly succeeded by the second in 1836. The book immediately produced an immense sensation and called forth a whole library of replies. It made the name of Strauss famous throughout the religious and intellectual world. When we look at its wealth of learning; its brilliant speculative grasp; the ease with which the author moves through the most difficult and entangling problems, it is a marvel to think that all this luxuriance of thought and knowledge proceeded from a young man of twenty-eight. Looking back upon this great, and, as the Germans would say, "epoch-making" book, in the light of later historical research into the literary origins of Christianity, we can now see that it is not so much a "Life of Jesus" as a piece of applied Hegelian philosophy. It starts with the Hegelian presupposition that the fulness of the idea cannot be individualised; it is to be found in the race, and not in any of its members; it is humanity which is the incarnate God. Humanity is the child of the earthly mother and the invisible father, of the spirit and of nature. Humanity is the wonder worker which manifests itself in its miraculous dominion over nature. It is the sinless one, for sin attaches to the individual but not the race: it dies, rises, and ascends to heaven by the crucifixion of the natural and the exaltation of the spiritual life. In these speculations there was no room left for the orthodox dogma respecting the personality of Christ. Strauss realised this, and the "Leben Jesu" is devoted to a critical examination of the historical documents on which the orthodox dogma is based. In this department of enquiry the ground was already prepared for him. As he tells us in his latest book, he had only to take up the materials already available and piece them together into an articulated whole. Many years before the appearance of Strauss's work a prolonged battle had been raging over the character of the earliest Christian documents. On the one hand, it was held that these documents were absolutely historical, and must be accepted as such; on the other, that they were largely forgeries and had little positive value as records of fact. A seemingly endless controversy raged round the dilemma as to whether the Gospels were the work of true and faithful historians or the imaginary productions of conscious forgers.

Strauss's acquaintance with the new historical methods of Niebuhr and his school led him to see that the student of Christian origins was not shut in between the two alternatives of history or forgery. There was a third possibility, the mythical explanation. According to Niebuhr, the early history of Rome was not history at all. The wonderful tales about Romulus and Remus were myths and legends, creations of the popular imagination. They were not conscious inventions but unconscious products of the national mind and character, and they grew up as they passed from mouth to mouth or were handed down from generation to generation. Strauss applied this principle to the interpretation of the Gospels. These primitive narratives, he said, were neither histories nor forgeries; they were the pious products of the Christian imagination. He did not deny the historical character of Christ, but he said that the miraculous elements which had gathered round His Person were the creations of the primitive Christian mind; the embodiment in a historical form of primitive Christian ideas; the creations of faith and not of history. In the Gospels it is the faith of the Christian community which we have before us and not an actual account of the historical life of its Founder.

At the time when Strauss's book appeared, Baur said of it that it had been written without proper investigation of the primitive documents. A more minute and searching examination of the Gospels has established the accuracy of Baur's contention. The historical element in them is far greater and more pervasive than Strauss supposed. Even the most advanced critics admit this. On the other hand, conservative critics who are also scholars, men like Richard Weiss, for instance, now admit that the Gospels do contain a non-historical colouring. But it is a mistake to assume, as Strauss assumed, that this invalidates their value as sources of religious inspiration. God can reveal himself in poetry as well as prose, in the mythological as well as the historical. We do not esteem the parables the less because they are imaginative and not historical, nor the book of Job the less because it is a profound religious poem and not a narrative of actual events. If we look back upon the past, we shall find that the spiritual education of the human race has been conducted much more through the agency of the imagination than through the discipline of historical facts. We must rid our minds of the belief that there is no Divine purpose in the mythical and the legendary: in certain stages of civilisation it is in these forms, and in them alone, that mankind is able to apprehend spiritual truth. It was the failure of Strauss to separate the form from the substance of religious truth which made all his critical work so extremely negative. We have a final instance of this in his last book, "The Old and the New Faith." Here he identifies the substance of Christianity with the form of it set forth in the Apostles' Creed. He concludes that the Christian faith must be abandoned because the propositions of this creed have been battered by the concentrated fire of his critical artillery. All attempts at expressing the contents of Christianity must of necessity be set forth in the intellectual framework of the age. But the framework is not the picture, and the picture has not lost its value because the framework is moth-eaten.

Outwardly Strauss's life cannot be described as a happy one. The extreme radicalism of his theological opinions lost him his public appointments, and the attempt to install him in a professorship at Zurich ended in failure. A deep bond of sympathy existed between him and his mother, but his relations with his father, a German pietist of the old school, were not intimate and affectionate. His marriage with the celebrated singer, Agnes Schebest, begun under the happiest auspices, ended miserably, after a few years, in a separation. Henceforth he had no settled home, and for the remainder of his life he moved about in the principal towns of Germany, finally returning to die in the little town where he was born. Strauss was not merely a brilliant theological critic; he was a man of remarkable gifts all round. Many of his purely literary productions are masterpieces in the art of expression, and it is safe to say that he and Lessing are the two greatest critics which German literature has so far produced.

A CITY OF THE MIDDLE AGE.

It was a bleak January morning when we drove out westward from Arles through a land now little but grey earth and stones. Provence, green with the young corn in April or rich in the purple vine under an unclouded August sky, offers sharp contrast to the vision of to-day, with the mistral blowing over the forlorn, naked fields. Yet most, perhaps, in this wild winter weather does the very bareness of the empty earth and scattered stones proclaim the evidence of long historic memory. So that here a crumbling wall, and there a broken rampart, and again some huge boulder derelict in the empty ways, all testify to the part they once played in the fashioning of man's habitation: and the very dust which is flung defiantly into our faces is the dust of the lives of men. We passed Montmajour, with its huge cliffs of stone standing high on its rock; watching the great plain as it has watched there for six hundred years. As the miles fell behind us we traversed Provençal hamlets, with their little whitewashed houses and big barns, scenes of happiness and feasting in the good days of summer, now all silent and desolate under the great wind. The hills on the left drew nearer: we turned sharp into them, the road leaping into a great cleft, which appeared as if slashed out of them by some giant sword. High above, grey on grey limestone rocks under a grey sky, with the work of man and nature almost indistinguishable, huddled boulders, ruins, and stones. It was the city of our search. We toiled up that ravine, on a narrow road down which the wind swept fiercely, resentful of our intrusion: so that the patient beast which brought us was often brought to a standstill, and sometimes it seemed inevitable that we should be swept over the edge into the abyss. At length, after long labour, we were able to dismount near the summit, to creep up a narrow path between high rocky walls; under a crumbling medieval gateway which might have served as the entrance to Astolat or Caerleon; and found ourselves—not without emotion—inside the once puissant city of Les Baux. A tiny inn offers the generous welcome of the South and —with the ingenuity of the South—prepares a liberal meal out of scanty resources. A few forlorn children, one or two women, the living inhabitants of a score of tiny cottages imbedded amongst the ruins, gaze impassively on the strangers who have dared their fastnesses in the heart of the winter storm. They live—it appears—on the alms of the more reasonable tourist, and upon digging in the ruins for relics and coins and rings. The whole area of this once famous city scarcely comprises more than a few hundred yards. It was an impregnable eyrie, set high in the hills, watching the great plain below it, with one far-off glimpse of sea. Beaten into its very soil, as the generations and the centuries passed, was the ardour and the passion of men: a quick, crowded, violent life, full of love and full of death. So that all the sons of its famous house were renowned for reckless courage and all the daughters for their beauty. They grew up as children in the crowded streets of this little mountain city, looking far over the level lanes which were to draw them with the fascination of great adventure. One day they rode forth down the pass into the plain below; into the pages of history; to appear in Palestine in the Crusades, to attack the Saracen corsairs at Majorca, to fight against Manfred in Italy, or to perish in battle against the King of Aragon. Their princes became lords of Cephalonia and Neopantis, and Archaia, Emperors of Constantinople; their princesses, Stephanette, Douce, Marguerite, Beatrix, and the rest, wives of the Kings of France and Spain and England. They lived in the confidence of the protection of their star, the star of sixteen rays, which testified their descent from Balthasar, King of the East, who worshipped Christ at Bethlehem. The last of their race was a woman—Alix. When she died—it is affirmed—the star descended to her chamber and vanished with her death. The Epick was complete.

What remains to-day, to testify, here at the heart of it, to all this once rich and vehement life? Grey stones, piles of rubbish and ruins, set on the short scanty grasses and the rock which defies the fretting of time. A narrow lane winds round the hill side, bordered by the piteous remnants of human habitations. Little but the skeletons of houses remain: blackened chimneys yawn upwards, cellars stretch beneath, half choked with dust and ashes. In places there abide the still traceable outline of streets, the crowded streets of the medieval city, once gay with colour and pennons and high overhanging eaves, now in the very crumbling outcry of greyness and desolation. In others, time and change have effaced even these evidences of human handiwork; and over open and empty spaces are scattered, now tiny dishevelled piles of boulder, now a solitary stone.

The chateau is piled high above the city on the projecting summit, which gazes out over all the world: part cut out of the solid rock, part heaved above it; now proclaiming the very heart of encompassing decay, the triumph of dead forces over the work of men. Its walls end in jagged projections, staircases are suddenly broken, and wind upward into nothingness, huge windows gape eyeless into vacancy. The wind blares and bangs through vast deserted chambers, and tears the walls and ceilings into dust. We essayed the little path that winds upward on the bare rock, on hands and knees creeping cautiously forward; but the tempest beat us back, flinging down small stones over the precipice into the depths below. From this castle, now so grey and bleak and desolate, that it seems impossible to imagine that it was ever once alive, was taken, at the end, vast stores of the rich things of the Middle Age. Here was accumulated the spoil of the conqueror; candlesticks of silver, tapestry, fine Eastern rugs, oaken chests full of silk and velvet, and cloth of gold; books of prayer bound in cloth of gold and pearls, rich ecclesiastical garments, and plate in the chapel. Down below, in the vault of the little church of the city, there was found quite lately the body of a girl, with long golden hair still perfect, and the dead hands still clasped over a "Book of the Hours"; which also fell into dust when thus rudely challenged by the light and air. The hair to-day, still tied with blue ribbon, lies in the Museum of Arles; once the adornment of one of those fair women who came to be the brides of these fierce lovers, or perhaps of one of those children who here prepared themselves, all wondering and eager, for life's unequal days.

The place has been termed a "medieval Pompeii." But there is little resemblance except for the fact that both are charged with the memories of a vanished age. In Pompeii the prevailing impression is of the immortality of man's handiwork. Under the serener Italian sky there abides to-day, in a kind of quietness, defiant of the conquered ages, all the life of two thousand years ago. Here, frankly exposed to the gaze of the present, is the daily existence of the past; fruit and corn as if still unwithered, the banquet of yesterday; baths, shops, places of pleasure and debauchery, the intimate life of an age. But at Les Baux the prevailing impression is of the mortality of man's handiwork; the passing, so quickly, of all his energies and arduours before the hurrying beat of time. Life and the evidence of it has been torn and ravaged from these once populous streets and dwellings, till nothing is left but the blackened hearthstone and the way which winds deserted over the hillside. There are many ruins of great cities which kindly Nature has come to conceal and to adorn; surrounding them with the nettle and the ivy, flinging yellow lichens on the walls, planting seeds in the clefts of the chambers. But here she has despised such generosity. Perhaps she knew that these dead warriors would never have asked it of her; who never asked mercy of fate or fortune, content always to accept without complaining the sunshine and the storm. So that to-day these black, gaunt piles of broken stones, all grey and shapeless, and tortured by strong winds under a grey, windy sky, seemed somehow no unfitting tomb for all the hopes and memories of a strong race of men; a forecast of the day when all men's hopes and memories shall become but as a few handfuls of dry dust. "A wind passeth over it and it is gone; the place thereof shall know it no more."

With such recollections of vanishing days we wandered on this grey winter day through the ruin of this astonishing city. We discovered caves on the hillside which had been cunningly fashioned for human bodies. We saw evidence of survival even into the turbulent days of Catholic and Huguenot; with a tiny oratory upon which is carved the motto of the Revolution—"Post tenebras Lux." Here a wrought picta above a door, there a sundial; here the three Marias in their boat as they came to Provence, as seen in so many Provençal carvings. We entered the little church, more than ever wondering at that splendid audacity of mankind, who in the heart of every visible evidence of the triumph of time over man's endeavours can yet declare—sometimes in passionate conviction, sometimes with a desperate hope—that at the last man will be triumphant. We left Les Baux under a darkening sky; alone, strong, defiant, with its inaccessible memories, torn by the restless wind. The wind is the impression which most abides; as if charged with a mission, and tormented by anguish till that mission be fulfilled, not to leave one stone upon another in the place where man once thought himself secure. "Princesses of Les Baux," cries Mistrel in one of the most famous of his poems, "Huguette, Sibylla, Blanche fleur, Bausette, who reigned high on your rocks of gold, you were lovely to look upon, sweet in loving, generous in joy. . . . The wind cries still fierce and tumultuous, between your ruined doors and through your tottering towers. The wind of the Rhone riots down your corridors."

THE ROAR.

From morn to morn it grows and swells and sinks; but never does it wholly pass away.

For, just as the last vibrations seem to die with the jingling clatter of belated cabs, and the growing silence of the city's night settles down upon the streets, a murmur of its rumble begins again, as the market carts come lumbering into town. And gradually the murmur grows and grows, swelled by the separate noises of the morning hours which break out intermittently at first, and become more frequent, as the city wakes; until all merge into a continuity of sound which spreads and swells into the full volume of a sullen thunderous roar—the throbbing diapason of the city's life. And then again at night, with one last rush of traffic going home, it slowly sinks, only to rise again before it dies. So the echoes and the opening murmurs meet.

And through the waking working hours of day, and through the first part of the city's sleep it rolls on full-volumed without a lull in all the gradations of sound and tone.

It drones across the spaces of the parks, like the souging of the swaying tops of firs, and grows into the louder deeper boom of monsoon breakers on an Eastern shore; then, almost suddenly, as you approach, the fierce unmuffled turmoil of the street breaks out, so that you shut your eyes, or bend your head, or frown, as if against the impact of a shock. It surges up, in varying cadences borne on the wind, to the top-most windows of towering flats, like the sullen murmurs of an angry mob, and penetrates the restfulness of homes, as the opening of a window lets it in. And ever in the quiet streets and squares it hums an incessant accompaniment to minor sounds, to meet you with a sudden gust of noise as you leave the shelter of their welcome calm.

But in the confines of the busy streets the sullen roar breaks up into innumerable conflicting shocks of sound, which continually rush past, and still come crowding up to meet you and still bear down upon you from behind, in a deafening frenzied pandemonium of shattering, metallic, detonating din which leaves the senses bruised. And only now and then, in short strange lulls, is heard the surrounding accompaniment of roar; for the blundering rushing crash of traffic, the swish and whirr of motor cars, the grind of wheels, and the countless floppings of innumerable hoofs drown with their separate discordances the deeper note.

And through each modulation of its tone—the din, the roar, the rumble, and the hum—vibrates the spirit of the city's fierce unrest.

For the traffic rushes on from end to end in locked, interminable competing streams, which pack in a moment as the cross streams pass, and then surge on swollen by the stop. And all that makes a city's life goes by. Hereditary indolence and ease, and luxury a generation old, and painted pleasure, and sleek rascality flash past in carriages and motor cars—with only a bodily, assumed repose. Business and busy-ness, and hired love, and luggage-cumbered travel, and disease go by, because they must or will, in cabs. And, varied as the commerce on the vans, is the herded humanity in omnibus and tram, which waits about or scrambles for a seat, because it cannot spare the time to walk, or grudges the energy, or is too tired. The agony of their infinite restlessness goes up in sound.

Besides the fever of unrest on wheels sounds the relentless tramp of hurried feet. The marching crowds move on and on, and come and come from whence the others came, and just as many come from where they go—all hurrying intently from place to place in jostling, dodging, unchanging multitudes, which wind along the contours of the kerb, and rush in frightened droves across the road, forever and forever moving on. The tramp and shuffle of their feet increase the roar.

And, mingling with the tramp of feet, swelling the rush and thunder of the road, throb the pulsations of human lives. Each one hears something of the refrain—brave martial music, angry menaces, or the million repetitions of a sob; and what has once been heard is always there.

The men who seek to rule big destinies, or guide the crowd, or grasp the whip of power, hear both the hoots and plaudits of the mob; and both invigorate them equally. And they who stand a little way aside, big-minded seers of the things that are, and have been, and should be, who strive, and spend their lives to show the way, hear the involuntary cries for help, the sneers of those who do not want to know, and the angry grunts of sleepy blind content. And they who sell the babies of their brain for meagre fees eked out with hopes of fame, hear a strange stirring music in the roar, which drives them, unconsciously, to bigger things, and helps them to fashion, perfect, and create; except in habitual intervals of fear, when they hear the wail of those who tried and failed. The money-men who scheme with busy brain, hear, in between the periods of toil, the voices of millions asking to be fed, or clothed, or carried, or cheated, or amused; and to the rhythm of the note they listen to they work out sums. Thus do they hear who scheme or strive or do.

But they who work to order or by rote hear other sounds. The earners of a weekly meagre wage, who work with their hands, or stand about, or drive, or pull a lever, or sell what others make, hear, when they listen, the impatient cries of those who wait hungrily to fill their place. The clerks who tick or write the hours away, in checking figures or in copying words, hear the same cries intensified by the voices of the children growing up, able and willing to do their work for less. And the women workers who must work to live—solitary women entering the youth of age—hear, in the loneliness of one ill-furnished room, and even while they hurry to their work, the happy shouts of other women's children, and the murmured talk of lovers in the street. Only the little servants of the State who spend short days in filling up and filing printed forms hear, in the faint-heard echoes of the roar, a lullaby. And up from the human welter of the slums drift smothered growls, and blasphemies, which the wealthy sometimes listen to, and quake.

But through the low thunder of the deeper notes float snatches of a lighter, bright refrain—the gay mad melody that pleasure-seekers hear.

And even trouble adds its note of mirth. Besides the careless merriment of those who look upon the city as a fair, and rush from show to show, in idle busyness, to coax a laugh, rises the revelry of reckless men who drink, and love, and gamble, and die. Besides the joyous merriment of youth sounds the fierce hired laugh of painted faces, which does not hide the groan. And with the sober merriment of those who play to gain fresh energy for work, mingles the fevered gaiety of those who fear: the stunted merriment of burdened men, the drunken laughs of those who drug their fear, and the noise of all who nightly pay to laugh, or look, or lust, so that they can obliterate what is or buy oblivion to what they know will be. For, while they listen to the gayer tune, they cease or forget to recollect the other note.

So, as the noise of strife and struggle swells, the sounds of merriment peal out anew; and with discordances of gaiety and stress vibrates the City of The Great Unrest.

With all its voiced ironies of human lives—the laughs, the tears, the menaces and moans—they who have learned to listen crave to hear; so that the quiet of the country hurts with a silent drumming vacuum of sound; and when the hour of returning comes a certain glad impatience of the ear consoles them, and they lean expectantly to hear the first short outbursts from the streets below rise up to greet them as they arrive. And, on arrival, when they feel again the mighty surging uproar of the streets, it stirs their mind, because of and in spite of all it means. For they who love the city love the roar.

Present-Day Problems.

THE ANGLO-GERMAN WAR OF ARMAMENTS.

IN the August number of the "Nineteenth Century Review" of last year, I made a careful examination of the relative strength of the Navies of England, Germany, and France as regards their really powerful vessels. I took as a standard the recent statement of Lord Tweedmouth in the House of Lords, in which he divided the battleships into two classes—"first class" and "obsolescent"—and I added the aggregate and average tonnage, with the following result:—

Battleships:

First Class.	Number.	Tonnage.	Av. Tonnage.
England	39	567,000	14,800
Germany	11	134,000	12,200
France	11	137,000	12,400
Obsolescent.
England	17	223,000	13,000
Germany	9	94,900	10,500
France	8	75,600	9,400

Armoured Cruisers:

England	32	375,000	11,700
Germany	6	55,700	9,100
France	13	128,000	9,200

I drew the conclusion from these figures that when the quality and strength of battleships and armoured cruisers of the first class, as well as their numbers, was taken into account, the British Navy was more than double that of France and Germany combined, and more than four times that of Germany alone. Sir John Fisher, in a conversation I had with him at the Admiralty, admitted this conclusion, and told me that he had reason to know that Admiral Tirpitz, at the head of the German Navy, in a confidential report to the Emperor, had asserted that the margin of strength of the British Navy above that of Germany was four times greater than that of the latter. Lord Brassey also, writing in the "Naval Annual" of 1907, arrived at much the same conclusion. He said that the naval force of England was 100 per cent. greater than that of Germany and France combined. As there is practically no other navy in Europe at the present time of which account need be taken, it follows that the two-power standard has been enormously exceeded and has become a four-power standard. It may confidently be asserted that never at any time in the past has the British Navy been so superior to any combination of other European Powers which could be brought about. As against Germany, the position is even stronger, for the agreements we have arrived at with France and Japan have enabled the concentration of all our powerful vessels in the home seas—with the exception of those in the Mediterranean, which have been reduced by more than one-half.

It was doubtless in view of this, among other things, and also in view of the increased programme of France a few months ago, which had again proposed to place the future condition of its Navy thirteen years hence on a position of equality with that of Germany, that the German Government determined in November last to make a further great increase of its programme of construction for the next thirteen years.

Its naval authorities must have recognised that their much vaunted naval programme of 1900 had proved to be an entire mistake. Their battleships, limited in size by the depth and width of the Kiel Canal, compared with those of England, and also with the later vessels of the French Navy, were of insufficient size, and were armed with guns of too small calibre. It was absolutely necessary from their point of view to make a new departure, and to treat as obsolete and as fit only for the scrap-heap the greater number of their battleships. They determined to rush to the other extreme and in future to build nothing but the largest vessels. While retaining the normal number of battleships at thirty-eight, they shortened the lives of the existing vessels, and provided for their replacement by the end of 1920, a course necessitating the construction of twenty battleships of the largest type by that year; they also provided that by the same time there should be twelve armoured cruisers of the largest type, 18,000 tons—nearly 2½ big ships in each of the thirteen years up to that date. This constructive programme is to be concentrated largely in the first five years, during which four big ships are to be laid down in each year, while in the later years only two big ships are to be yearly commenced. The result of this will be that by the end of 1914 there will be completed fourteen German battleships and four armoured cruisers of the largest type.

England starts in this new race of "Dreadnoughts" with great advantage, for it has the "Dreadnought" already at sea and the three "Invincibles" of 17,300 tons nearly complete. Three other "Dreadnoughts" will be completed before the end of 1909. By that time we shall have seven of these big vessels completed and not a single German vessel of the largest type will be at sea. The question arises what further provision England should make in view of this greater activity of the Germans. Are we to be content with the construction of three big ships in each year, or are we to rush into further competition with Germany, building two for every one which she prepares? If we are to consider that the "Dreadnoughts" will relegate all other existing battleships and armed cruisers into the list of obsolete and useless vessels, it will undoubtedly be necessary to embark on a new great programme of construction. But it seems to me that we are not justified in consigning whole classes of existing battleships, such as the ten "Lord Nelsons" and "King Edwards," and the seventeen "Formidables" and "Majestics" to the scrap-heap. I know that many naval officers of high authority consider the "Lord Nelsons" as little, if at all, inferior to the "Dreadnoughts," and as quite fit to take their position in line of battle with these vessels, and that the "Formidables" and "Majestics" would be most powerful and valuable additions to squadrons. In the same way the armoured cruisers of the "Minotaur" and "Warrior" classes, only now completing, are not to be discarded as obsolete by the construction of vessels of the "Invincible" class.

On this assumption, let us consider how the three navies will stand at the end of 1914 on the basis of the present programme of Germany and France if England continues to lay down three big battleships or improved "Dreadnoughts" in each year.

The position will then be as follows:—

ENGLAND.		GERMANY.		FRANCE.
Tons.		BATTLESHIPS.
18,000	19	14		6
16,300	10	—		—
15,000	17	—		6
14,000	13	—		—
13,000	6	10		1
11 to 12,000	3	5		7
11,000	—	5		—
10,000	2	4		—
—	Tons.	—	Tons.	—	Tons.
70.	1,074,000	38.	534,000	20.	316,000
Tons.		ARMoured CRUISERS.
18,000	3	4		—
14,600	7	1		—
13 to 14,000	12	—		5
12 to 13,000	—	—		4
11 to 12,000	—	2		—
10 to 11,000	6	1		1
9 to 10,000	10	2		7
7 to 9,000	—	3		4
—	Tons.	—	Tons.	—	Tons.
38.	467,000	13.	156,000	21.	229,000
		Totals.
108.	1,590,000	51.	690,000	41.	545,000
92. 1,235,000

In the list of British ships I have included the eight vessels of the "Royal Sovereign" type, which in 1914 will be twenty-two years old. I cannot think they will then be obsolete as compared with some of the younger but less powerful vessels of Germany and France. On the above statement I think that no reasonable man will come to any other conclusion than that the British Navy, in 1914, in respect of battleships and armed cruisers will largely exceed the navies of Germany and France combined, and that it will be more than double the strength of that of Germany alone. On the other hand, it will be seen how largely the German Navy in respect of battleships will exceed that of France. It raises the question whether a further addition to the French programme would be to the detriment of England or the reverse. This question may be discussed when the French propose to add to their programme.

I have already shown that the efforts of Germany will be mainly concentrated in the next five years. After that their efforts will be relaxed and only two big ships in each year are to be laid down. The result in 1920, on the assumption that England continues to lay down three battleships in each year, will be as follows:—

BY THE YEAR 1920.
ENGLAND.		GERMANY.		FRANCE.
Tons.		BATTLESHIPS.
18,000	37	20		15
16,300	10	—		—
15,000	17	—		6
14,000	5	—		1
12 to 13,000	6	10		9
11 to 12,000	3	5		—
11,000	—	3		—
—	Tons.	—	Tons.	—	Tons.
78.	1,315,000	38.	580,000	31.	468,000
Tons.		ARMoured CRUISERS.
18,000	3	12		0
14,600	7	1		—
13 to 14,000	12	—		10
12 to 13,000	—	—		4
10 to 12,000	—	2		—
10 to 11,000	6	1		1
9 to 10,000	10	2		7
2 to 9,000	—	2		—
—	Tons.	—	Tons.	—	Tons.
38.	467,000	20.	292,000	22.	299,000
		Totals.
116.	1,782,000	58.	872,000	53.	767,000

The figures show, I think, that the strength of the British Navy in 1920 will be largely greater than that of Germany and France combined.

If, however, there should be those who think that the position will not be safe, the wise course will be not at present to make any further addition to our programme, but to wait three or four years till the Germans are thoroughly committed to their present programme, and then build vessels somewhat larger and more powerful. We are not to assume that Germany will submit to the financial troubles which their present programme involves—one-half the cost of the new battleships and armed cruisers is to be paid for out of borrowed money. This system cannot be indefinitely prolonged, and the time seems to be approaching when Germany will have to draw in its horns.

In this unfortunate competition, for which we are largely responsible by embarking on the construction of "Dreadnoughts" so largely in excess of the existing battleships of other countries, those who build last build best. Time also is largely on our side, for it is obvious that Germany will not be able to make full use of its new "Dreadnoughts" until the Kiel Canal is reconstructed, a work which will take ten years to effect and will cost £10,000,000.

Meanwhile, can nothing be done to restrain this mad rivalry? France is falling out of it. The competition is being restricted to England and Germany. The position is not dissimilar to that which existed half-a-century ago between England and France. It is worth while to recall Mr. Cobden's advice on the subject in 1861. "Neither country," he wrote, "adds to its relative strength by this waste of national wealth. . . . A remedy for the evil can only be found in a more frank understanding between the two Governments. . . . They may be enabled by the timely exchange of explanations and assurances to prevent what ought to be restricted to mere experimental trials from growing into formidable preparations for war!"

Eversley.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

WE understand that an elaborate history of "The Times" newspaper may be expected during the present publishing season. It traces the history of the journal and its influence upon public affairs from 1788, when the first definite issue of "The Times" appeared, down to recent years. Like Mr. Dasent's "Life of Delane" announced last week, it will contain a large mass of hitherto unpublished correspondence, so that between the two books most of the inner history of Printing House Square will be made public.

NOTWITHSTANDING its many serious omissions, its errors, and its partial views, there is probably no book dealing with art which has ever enjoyed the same popularity as Vasari's "Lives of the most excellent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects." It first appeared in 1550, and since then it has been translated into every European language, while the number of different editions issued has been almost endless. It is satisfactory to learn that Messrs. Dent have made arrangements to publish the work in a form which will be the édition définitive for this country at least. Mr. Thomas Okey is to make a fresh translation from the original Italian, and most of the great pictures mentioned by Vasari will be reproduced as illustrations. There are to be eight volumes under the general editorship of Sir Charles Holroyd, the curator of the National Gallery.

THE next forty volumes of "Everyman's Library," to be issued about the middle of February, will include several books of special interest. In fiction we are to have Blackmore's "Lorna Doone," Thackeray's "Vanity Fair," with an introduction by the Hon. Whitelaw Reid, and five volumes of Dickens, with introductions by Mr. G. K. Chesterton; in biography Lewes's "Life of Goethe," with an introduction by Mr. Havelock Ellis, and a fresh translation by Miss Todhunter of Voltaire's "Life of Charles XII.," for which Mr. John Burns has written an introduction. Theology will be represented by Seeley's "Ecce Homo," with an introduction by Sir Oliver Lodge, and travel by the third and fourth volumes of Hakluyt's "Voyages" and Marco Polo's "Travels," edited by Mr. John Masefield. But the most interesting of the new announcements is Parkman's "Conspiracy of Pontiac," for which Mr. Thomas Seecombe is responsible. It is odd that Parkman is so little known in this country. His fresh and vivid style and his masterly handling of narrative place him among the great historians, while his conception of the splendid drama of two rival civilisations striving for the mastery of the New World makes the reader feel that he is himself a spectator of the events described.

Two books by Canon Hensley Henson are announced as in active preparation. Mr. Fisher Unwin has in the press "Christ and the Nation," a volume of sermons emphasising the larger and unifying aspects of the Christian religion, and pointing out the evils of too great an insistence on "denominational" issues and interests. Among the subjects of the sermons are "The Mission of the National Church," "The Religious Reunion of the Nation," "The Christian in Public Life," "The Claims of Cæsar and of God," "Didactic Reserve," and "Revelation and Development." There is an introduction, in which Canon Henson discusses the conditions of modern preaching. The other book is called "The National Church: Essays on its History and Constitution, and Criticisms of its Present Administration." It will be published by Messrs. Macmillan.

MR. FREDERIC HARRISON has written an introduction for the new edition of Dr. J. H. Bridges' translation of Comte's "General View of Positivism," which is to be published by Messrs. Routledge. The translation was produced under pathetic circumstances. In 1860 Dr. Bridges had just settled as a physician in Melbourne when his wife died from fever. He determined to bring her body home to Suffolk to be buried, and as the sailing vessels of the time took three months to make the voyage, Dr. Bridges found refuge from thought by translating Comte's work, which he finished before reaching England. The translation itself, says Mr. Harrison, is a literary masterpiece. "It renders an extremely abstract and complex French type of philosophical dogmatism into easy, simple English, whilst at the same time preserving and even elucidating the somewhat cryptic allusions and nuances of the original." The new issue will contain a marginal analysis, and the additional notes printed in the French edition of 1907 will also be added.

AMONG Messrs. Constable's announcements for the early spring is "The Latter Years of Catherine de Medici," by Miss Edith Sichel, whose able account of "Catherine de Medici and the French Reformation" appeared a couple of years ago. The new study takes up the story of Catherine's life in 1562, and therefore deals with several of the most crucial events with which she was associated—the Massacre of St. Bartholomew and the warfare between the Ligue and the King which culminated in the barricading of Paris, and brought about the death of Henri, Duc de Guise. The dramatic contest between Catherine and Coligny, the vacillating policy of Charles IX., the misgovernment of Henri III., the last of the Valois, and the decline of Catherine's power, are also described, and the book ends with the murder of the King in 1589.

MR. FIFIELD has, by arrangement with the literary executor of Samuel Butler, the author of "Erewhon," undertaken the publication of a uniform edition of all Butler's works, both literary and scientific. Although there is exaggeration in Mr. Bernard Shaw's estimate of Butler as "in his own department the greatest English writer of the latter half of the nineteenth century," Butler had a great gift of humour and irony, which has not even yet been sufficiently recognised.

THE literary lecture has within the last few years lost much of its popularity in this country. It enjoyed great favour towards the end of the last century, and such men as Carlyle, Froude, Pater, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Frederic Harrison, and Dr. Stopford Brooke always attracted large audiences. In France and America it still fills an important place in literary activity. The biographical note to the volume of selections by the late William Clarke tells with what eagerness Americans listened to lectures on Carlyle, Ruskin, William Morris, and other literary topics. M. Jules Lemaitre, whose course on Jean-Jacques Rousseau was the great literary event in Paris last year, has just announced that he will lecture on Racine, and so great has been the rush for tickets that he has had to promise to give each lecture twice. M. Lemaitre's impressionist treatment of such a classic as Racine can hardly fail to be piquant.

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Procedure of the House of Commons: A Study of its History and Present Form." By Josef Redlich. With an Introduction and a Supplementary Chapter, by Sir Courtenay Ilbert. (Constable. 3 vols. 31s. 6d. net.)

"Rambling Recollections." By Sir Henry Drummond Wolff. (Macmillan. 2 vols. 30s. net.)

"Memoirs of the Comtesse de Boigne." Vol. III. 1820-1830. Edited by M. Charles Nicoullaud. (Heinemann, 10s. net.)

"The Inward Light." By H. Fielding Hall. (Macmillan. 10s. net.)

"A Princess of Intrigue—Madame de Longueville and Her Times." By H. Noel Williams. (Hutchinson. 2 vols. 24s. net.)

"A Family Chronicle, Derived from Notes and Letters selected by Barbarina, Lady Grey." Edited by Gertrude Lyster. (Murray. 12s. net.)

"Modernism and Romance." By R. A. Scott-James. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

"My Alpine Jubilee." By Frederic Harrison. (Smith, Elder. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The History of Aythan Waring." By Violet Jacob. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"La Chute de la République de Venise." Par André Bonnefons. (Paris: Perrin, 5fr.)

"Bismarck et Son Temps." Tome III. Triomphe, Splendeur et Déclin (1870-1893). (Paris: Alcan, 10fr.)

"Les Impérialismes et la Morale des Peuples." Par Paul Adam. (Paris: Boivin, 3fr. 50.)

"Mon Amour." Roman. Par René Boylesve. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy, 3fr. 50.)

"Kants Kritischer Idealismus als Grundlage von Erkenntnistheorie und Ethik." Von O. Ewald. (Berlin: Hofmann, M.12.)

Letters to the Editor.

THE DEFEAT IN MID DEVON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Electoral psychology is a puzzle at the best, but the morrow of a crushing defeat is not the time to find the unsuccessful candidate in his most lucid frame of mind. A request from THE NATION, however, cannot be refused, and I hasten to single out, among the many causes which contributed to the result, those which appear to me to be the most important. I cannot, of course, deal with the personal equation either as regards myself or my opponent; I can touch only on causes of a general or public nature.

I take first those which were purely local, or which are not likely to recur in future. The Unionist candidate had been two years in the field, and had worked the Division well, particularly by means of smoking concerts and similar social functions, while the Liberals, whom previous elections had tempted into over-confidence, did little or nothing to counteract these influences. My opponent had lived in the Division for two years, while I myself at the beginning of the contest was a stranger.

The fear of Mr. Asquith's Temperance Bill roused the Liquor trade to more than their usual energy. They went to great expense in circulating leaflets and posters, and their methods may be best understood by recalling those employed by them in the campaign against the Local Veto Bill in 1895.

The most important temporary factor was, however, in my opinion, the increased price of bread, coal, and one or two other necessities. This was an electioneering opportunity which the Unionist Party was quick to seize. Great numbers of electors were undoubtedly persuaded that the rise was directly caused by the Liberal Government. While a few leaders repudiated in their speeches this childish suggestion, it was driven home by every conceivable means, and in particular by the notorious poster headed "Radicalism means Dearer Living," which adorned every hoarding. Coupled with the statement that the Liberals had promised to cheapen bread, and thrown into glaring contrast with the rosy hues of the Protectionist paradise, it was undoubtedly effective.

These causes of defeat may be removed. What is serious for the future of Liberalism is that a great part of the turnover is undoubtedly to be attributed to the attractiveness of Tariff Reform—Tariff Reform, be it noted, of the extremest and crudest type. It has now been found by experience that those arguments for Tariff Reform which can be advanced in a serious discussion—those subtleties which enable Mr. Balfour to profess adherence to the Tariff Reform creed—are totally useless on the platform. There was scarcely any appeal here to the Imperial sentiment on the question of Preference; no talk about freer trade; no reasoning about the steadiness of the home market. A vigorous appeal was made to the dormant hatred of the foreigner, and the belief was instilled that by excluding foreign goods the sum-total of employment and of wages in this country can be proportionately increased.

Compared to the causes mentioned, the efforts of the Women's Social and Political Union, and the abstention of a few Socialists, were, I believe, wholly insignificant. Some voters were probably turned against the Liberal Party by the deplorable rowdyism of the last few days, because, although similar rowdyism exists in other places in the Division on the Unionist side, all attention was concentrated upon that which took place in Newton Abbot, where the newspaper correspondents collected.

Apart from Tariff Reform, the moral of this contest is that Liberalism has now to meet, at the hands of wealth and privilege, a stronger, better organised, and more desperate attack than it has ever faced before. The staggering defeat experienced in Mid Devon will not be thrown away if it brings home to Liberals throughout England what new forces are at work against them; what special efforts are being directed towards bringing to the poll that great mass of electors who have hitherto never voted at all; what an immense obstacle to progress exists in the plural voters, who were alone sufficient to account for the majority in the late contest; and how a hundred new channels are being discovered by which the influence of the large employer, of the rich customer, and of the great landowner, may be brought to bear on all the less wealthy classes of electors. The General Election of 1906, and the beginnings of democratic progress achieved by the present Government, gave the note of warning which has brought these forces of Toryism into play. I venture to express the hope that the Mid Devon election may, in its turn, sound a note of warning to the friends of democracy, rousing them from the comfortable belief that the ground won in 1906 cannot be easily lost again, and spurring them to greater vigilance and more continuous and combined effort, than they are using to-day.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES RODEN BUXTON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is, of course, notorious that bye-elections are very generally decided on side issues, but there is undoubtedly one question that affects the minds of serious thinkers of all classes in the villages, and prevents their active influence being thrown on the Liberal side.

The decay of country life has profoundly impressed itself on the country people of England, and particularly so upon the thinkers amongst the poor. Moreover, the break-up of all permanent home life, owing to the cottage difficulty, with its concurrent decay of character, and the impossibility of obtaining land even without cottages attached, has become a perpetual burning sore. The Conservatives in Protection suggest a remedy; it is not a very inviting one, but it is something, and all of us know that unregulated competition is harmful and will probably be fatal to most small holders. The Liberals have given a Small Holdings and Allotments Act, a law so complicated in form and dilatory in its procedure that most of us turn from it in disgust. People freely say that it points either to the mental decadence or to the want of honesty of purpose of the party leaders; they wait to see whether the housing question will be dealt with in the same spirit.

Now if the Liberals wish to retain the country vote they must make a far more serious effort to understand and deal with both the land question and the whole matter of the revival of country life.

The people themselves are determined to find a remedy, but official Liberals and other party politicians seem completely detached from the real life and thought of the people, and are consequently quite unable to deal with our country questions in a broad and understanding spirit.—Yours, &c.,

MONTAGUE FORDHAM, M.A., Cantab.

Paine's Hill, Limpsfield.

January 20th, 1908.

[Our correspondent writes with authority, but we cannot endorse his judgment of the framework of the Small Holdings Act.—ED., THE NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The above election simply accentuates the feelings of the Radical and Labour Parties in relation to the Government in regard to the proposed ruinous wastefulness of expenditure on the Army and Navy, along with their dilatoriness in starting the old age pension scheme. Your teaching in regard to these points is worthy of all acceptance, and I think it is generally accepted by Radicals and Labourists worthy of their names.

What the Government should do if they would deserve and keep the votes of the working-classes is to inaugurate at once such an adequate old age pension scheme as shall make it a financial impossibility to fling away so much of the national treasure on the dubious pretence of business of preparing machinery for the slaughter of foreign working-men. Strange as it may seem to some official and other Whigs, the working-man thinks that the business of saving the lives of old working-men at home is a hundred times more important than the duty of getting ready to slay the younger working-men of foreign nationalities.—Yours, &c., D. K. AUCHTERLONIE.

WHAT THE TARIFF REFORMERS ARE DOING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your readers may be interested in having the following particulars as to a county constituency—the Reigate division of Surrey—which was won by the Liberals at the General Election by a narrow majority of 219 votes. They will serve to indicate the tremendous activity and the enormous expenditure of the Tariff Reformers, especially when it is remembered that to whatever organisation the speakers are nominally attached, and whatever the advertised object of the meeting, the burden of the discourse is Tariff Reform, with a few points thrown in as to dearer bread and dearer coal caused by the Liberal Government, Woolwich Arsenal discharges, horseshoes, and Socialism.

Following on a summer campaign, during which the great landlords and ladies in nearly every district have given garden parties, with refreshments free or at a nominal charge to thousands of poor people, a series of political smoking concerts, nearly always patronised by the leading gentry, have been held in the public-houses, clubs, and market halls, where drinks and smokes, not always paid for by the recipients, have been the order of the day, accompanied by the usual speeches on yellow press lines.

With the ground properly prepared in this way, a series of political meetings have been held during the last twelve weeks, and two or three definite subsidiary campaigns have also been carried out, mainly by the help of half-a-dozen so-called working-men, who are employed by the Tariff Reform League, the Rural Labourers' League, the National Union of Conservative Associations, and kindred bodies. A list of some of the meetings may be interesting to Free Trade Conservatives, who think they can safely attack the custodians of Free Trade, in the shape of the Liberal Government, for dealing with social reform.

In October meetings were held as follows:—

Date.	Place.	Speaker.	Organization.
Oct. 3 ...	Limpsfield ...	Ben Dent	T.R.L.*
„ 12 ...	Capel ...	A. L. Edwards	N.U.†
„ 14 ...	Godstone ...	Mr. Vaughan Gower
„ 17 ...	—	—	—
„ 23 ...	Burstow ...	R. Dunwoody	T.R.L. and North of Ireland.
„ 24 ...	Meadvale ...	H. H. Cannell	N.U.
„ 25 ...	Tandridge ...	R. Dunwoody	T.R.L.
„ 28 ...	—	F. Bindon	N.U.

In November meetings were held at—

Date.	Place.	Speaker.	Organization.
Nov. 4	Godstone Station	W. Hatcher	T.R.L.
„ 6	{ South Park, Reigate ...	H. Cannell	N.U.
„ 7	Horne ...	Alfred Austin
„ 11	Redhill ...	Captain Rawson
„ 15	Dorking ...	George Cave, M.P.
„ 18	Redhill ...	F. Bindon	N.U.
„ 19	Nutfield ...	Clovel Salter, M.P.
„ 20	Reigate ...	Captain Rawson
„ 21	Brockham ...	Councillor Hatson	T.R.L.
„ 21	Tandridge ...	W. J. Allen	T.R.L.
„ 26	Godstone ...	R. Dunwoody	T.R.L.
„ 26	Blindley Heath	H. Broughton
„ 28	Oxted
„ 29	Leigh ...	Jas. Hewson	N.U.

In December meetings were held at—

Date.	Place.	Speaker.	Organization.
Dec. 9 ...	Holwood
„ 12 ...	Limpsfield ...	R. E. Noble	N.U.
„ 17 ...	Redhill ...	P. O. Brien	N.U.
„ 17 ...	Dorking

* T.R.L.—Tariff Reform League. † N.U.—National Union.

Date.	Place.	Speaker.	Organization.
Dec. 18 ...	Tatsfield ...	T. L. Armitage	T.R.L.
„ 18 ...	Horley ...	H. Gould	T.R.L.
„ 19 ...	Outwood
„ 20 ...	Westcott ...	Geo. Borwick
„ 28 ...	Chipstead ...	Rev. W. G. Southey	T.R.L. (Vicar of Hollingbourne.)

In January meetings have already been held at—

Jan. 7.	Bell Hotel, Godstone.
„ 8.	Prince of Wales, Lingfield.
„ 9.	Hoskins Arms, Oxted.
„ 13.	Bull Hotel, Limpsfield.
„ 15.	Primrose League Meeting.
„ 16.	Smoking Concert, Lingfield Racecourse.

to be followed by another ten meetings during the month, in addition to a special campaign—beginning January 23rd—by the Rural Labourers' League, which appears at all bye-elections as a kind of handmaid to Tariff Reform, and which is run on the same lines, in the interests of the Tory Party. In addition to the foregoing regular meetings, thirteen meetings were held as part of an anti-Socialist campaign, conducted by Mr. A. L. Edwards and Mr. Langley, described as “working-men from London,” with other speakers named Avers, Brown, and Hemsall.

There were also eighteen meetings to hear a speaker described as ex-Inspector White, of the Metropolitan Police, give an address, with one hundred lantern slides, on “Poverty and Unemployment,” an ingenious title calculated to draw those who might decline to go and hear the usual quackery of Tariff Reform under its own name.

The Navy, the British Empire, anti-Socialism, unemployment, and other deceptive aliases have been used to describe the objects of many other meetings, and neither work nor money has been spared to make them as successful as possible.

To back up the assertions of the speakers, which are mainly repetitions of the canards of the yellow press, a local newspaper of about twenty pages is published monthly with the “Conservative Gazette,” dishing up the same paragraphs without mention of the exposures of their inaccuracy which have frequently followed the first publication.

The Liberals know all the facts as to the active and unscrupulous campaign of their opponents; but how can their scanty resources cope adequately with the lavish expenditure and concentrated social pressure of their opponents, disclosed in the facts related above?—Yours, &c.,

FREE TRADER.

A WOMAN'S CHARTER.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If the repeated conflicts in which the outposts of militant suffragettes have been engaged with law and order, in court-house and political meeting, testify to the courage and sincerity of the appellants, they testify also to the mode in which we may expect future political campaigns to be conducted. The demand for Parliamentary seats will be even more hotly fought than the present demand for the Parliamentary vote.

As one of those women who believe in the high calling of women, and the importance of their mission in political and social life, I deeply deplore what seems to me a waste of energy and the setting back of woman's influence for generations. When the Chartists marched upon London to the discomfiture of peaceable citizens, they brought with them a charter of their liberties and demands, a considered programme of political reforms. Of the points of the charter, some have already been won; some are still on the Liberal programme; others are relegated to the background of logical reforms which can wait.

What high hopes accompanied the struggle which won for us the ballot; when men could vote without fear, how they would rush to the polls!—and yet we have lived to see the apathetic indifference of the average voter, who has to be carried to the voting booth in a motor and galvanised into casting his vote. It is amazing that women should not estimate this mechanical fetish at its due worth.

May we not appeal to the militant ladies who desire the vote, and seem to expect to get it by unconstitutional means, to formulate a charter of their rights and demands. We are told of "abominable" man-made laws; will they tell us what laws they mean and how they wish them amended? What are woman's grievances and disabilities? Is it entirely a question of the vote? What are the wrongs from which she suffers? There are wrongs grievous and many in woman's industrial life, but can votes or Bills in Parliament right them? Woman, as the weaker, sometimes suffers from the brute force of the stronger. Will the vote protect her? If a man can ill-treat the mother of his children, will his brutality be checked by the thought that the poor soul has a vote? Man, too, sometimes suffers from a cruel and worthless wife, but no political machinery can avail him. Votes, unhappily, are not like pennies in the slot; the results do not come promptly to hand in neatly folded paper packets. In this materialistic age we do well to remind ourselves that for moral evils we need moral remedies.

We live perforce in a man-made world. Our laws, our systems of religion, our political constitutions, all come to us through the agency of men, from the Decalogue downwards, with its gift from the East of a day of rest. We cannot quarrel with the Ages, and may be thankful that someone was found to take the trouble to give us these things. The Portias of the world seem to have been few. It is time surely that we were serious in this matter. Let us have a woman's "Charter" accredited by the leaders of the Suffrage societies—that all may understand and consider—and meantime perhaps both sides may ponder that admirable saying of the late Mr. Spurgeon: "That they climbed up so high, they fell down on the other side."—Yours, &c.,

E. B. HARRISON.

"VILLAGE LIBRARIES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the letters that have hitherto appeared on this subject no mention has been made of any books dealing with social or political subjects. Are these beyond the range of those for whom such libraries are meant, or is it not possible to get suitable books on such topics?

As I am now engaged in founding small libraries of books in several villages, I should be very grateful for any information or suggestion as to such books. The few that I have been able to obtain have been read with much interest.—Yours, &c.,

O. M.

THE NEW EDUCATION BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your interesting article on the above subject you enumerate as one of the conditions of an "eirenicon" "a simple and elementary form of religious instruction such as in the main obtains in our secondary and public schools." The allusion to the latter schools was encouraging, because I understand that in later days more "liberty of prophesying" has been allowed in those schools than in the public elementary schools. But farther on you say that if the local authorities "generally decide for what is known as 'Cowper-Templeism,' it is hardly the business of the State to force their hands." Now what is "known as 'Cowper-Templeism'?" It is the literal acceptance of the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, and the historicity of Joshua and Judges with their divinely ordered or sanctioned massacres and murders. It is the theological though unprinted and unformulated dogma of a "plan of salvation," beginning with the fall of man, and ending with the incarnation by virgin birth, resurrection, and ascension.

I should be disposed to agree with what appears to be your view that this matters comparatively little to the children. It goes like water over a duck's back and does not penetrate. On the other hand, I hold that it seriously impedes moral training, which ought to be the business of the State, not of the local authorities, as indeed is recognised by recent Education Codes. But what of the teachers? In these days of "the New Theology," with its millions of adherents and widely circulated newspapers, do you seriously believe that fifty per cent. of public elementary teachers agree in the historicity of the Pentateuch, or the divine sanction for Joshua's massacres, or the virgin birth, or the physical resurrection of Jesus? That the large majority of elementary teachers continue to be Christians in a liberal sense I am quite aware. But I know that large numbers of them do not believe in what is known as "Cowper-Templeism." They read the works of Biblical critics. They have access, at least through public libraries, to the "Encyclopædia Biblica," and, rightly or wrongly, they have come to hold very different opinions on these subjects from those of their predecessors.

Please note that the question is not which opinions are right and which are wrong. "Cowper-Templeism" may possibly be infallible truth. But what does that matter if any considerable proportion of teachers do not believe it? If a man or woman is compelled to teach to a class of children as fact what he or she believes to be falsehood, is it not painfully like endeavouring to teach truth "with a lie in the right hand"? Knowing what I do from thirty-seven years' experience of elementary school work, I regard as utter cant the cry of "no tests for teachers." The local authorities in which you have such confidence take good care that it shall be a form of words and nothing more. No teacher has a chance of being engaged unless there is a moral—or immoral—certainty that the interpretation of "Cowper-Templeism" held by the majority of the local authority will be adopted in "simple Bible teaching." There are only two possible modes of escape from this impasse. The one is a frank permission to every teacher to tell the children what he thinks in his own conscience, while informing them at the same time that others think differently. The other way is to leave the teaching of the Bible for the present to the Churches. If Mr. M'Kenna renews the lease of the "Cowper-Temple clause" his Bill is already doomed—if not in the House, at any rate, after a year or two's trial.—Yours, &c.,

J. ALLANSON PICTON.

Caerlyr, Penmaenmawr, R.S.O.

January 20th, 1908.

"THE HOUSING QUESTION IN GERMAN TOWNS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A rather serious error occurs in the 27th line of the second column, on p. 569, of my letter. The word "cheap" before "plots of land" should be "very deep."

Some readers of THE NATION may be glad to know what are the views respecting town-building plans of those German Liberals who have given most attention to the subject of housing reform. They will find an expression of them in "Neue Aufgaben in der Bauordnungs- und Ansiedlungsfrage, Eine Eingabe des Deutschen Vereins fuer Wohnungsreform," published in 1906 by Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, Goettingen, which costs one mark.—Yours, &c.,

T. C. HORSFALL.

Swanscoe Park, near Macclesfield.

January 20th, 1908.

PREMATURE BURIAL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The instructive correspondence in THE NATION on this important subject will, I have no doubt, help forward the movement which has now been carried on for twelve years to promote burial reform in England. The evidence produced by Mr. Basil Tozer, in his able article in the "Nineteenth Century" for October, showing that a not inconsiderable number of people are annually buried before life is extinct, is overwhelming. This horrible fact, which to sensitive persons occasions an agony of apprehension, is partly due to the apathy and unwillingness of the public to deal with a gruesome and unpalatable question. Still, in the interest of humanity and civilisation it must be faced. There is also a widespread belief that anyone can prevent the danger of live-sepulture in his own case by making testamentary provisions for post-mortem surgical operations.

The answer to this is that the majority of people do not make wills, having little or nothing to leave, and when wills are made they are seldom opened until after the funeral of the testator. A peculiarity of this movement, which differentiates it from all other reforms, is that the evil which it is desired to remove has no defenders. The search for truth by means of torture to human beings and for knowledge by means of torture to animals, the existence of slavery and aggressive war, have at all times been justified by zealous advocates, but the fact that premature burial has no defenders ought to make the task of its suppression comparatively easy. It is an anomalous and scandalous state of things that while there are about 120 Acts of Parliament relating to burials, cemeteries, the superintendence of monuments, the establishment of mortuaries and consecrated grounds, &c., there are no provisions for ascertaining beyond all doubt that the bodies interred are really dead—as though this were a matter of trivial importance. The late Col. Edward Parry Vullum, M.D., the chief Medical Inspector of Hospitals, U.S. Army, who himself had a narrow escape from live-sepulture, having been laid out for dead, took a deep interest in the question, and just before his death declared: "The core and essence of a protective law should consist in the reasonable and systematic registration of a certificate of verified death, rendered by a qualified physician after his personal examination of the body, before the issue of a permit for burial or other disposal of the body."

A Bill has been prepared by the Association for the Prevention of Premature Burial, revised by an experienced Parliamentary draughtsman, to give effect to these indispensable provisions and for the establishment of properly equipped waiting mortuaries where the bodies can remain surrounded by a profusion of flowers until signs of incipient putrefactive decomposition—the only unequivocal sign of death—are exhibited. The utility of mortuaries is shown by Lenormand of ten recoveries in Berlin in two and a-half years; M. Gaubert, a high authority on this subject, reports that "he has collected fourteen cases of apparent death followed by return to life in mortuaries in spite of all that has been done in Germany to prevent such occurrences." In Munich there are eleven mortuaries, the earliest dating from the beginning of the eighteenth century; the new ones are of handsome architectural elevation and palatial proportions.

As successive Home Secretaries have reported that there are annually 10,000 death certificates in England and Wales in which the cause of death is not verified, the danger of premature burial is practically admitted. There ought to be no hesitation, therefore, on the part of the Government in introducing the Association's or some other Bill as a Government measure. The Lord Chancellor in March last admitted that the matter of death-certification was very unsatisfactory, and promised to give it his most serious consideration. When will this be done is surely a pressing question.—Yours, &c.,

WILLIAM TEBB.

Ride Hall, Burston, Surrey.

[This correspondence must now cease.—ED., THE NATION.]

THE REAL IRISH QUESTION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The paradoxical nature of the Irish question as stated by "E. D." is well illustrated by the fact that both his and Mr. Lynd's letters, while setting forth clearly certain sectional views, are wholly misleading and inadequate as general statements of the case.

"E. D.'s" vision is confused by too close contact with the warring, divergent opinions of the various Irish parties, while Mr. Lynd apparently ignores the fact that a large body of the Irish people, both Catholic and Protestant, and representing most of the wealth and intellect of the country, regards the interests and future of Ireland as indissolubly bound up with those of England.

What is wanted in Ireland to-day is a reconstructive policy, based on a greatest common measure of the many policies before our people, in which Nationalist, Sinn Féiner, and Unionist could work together.

This policy must chiefly be concerned with the industrial and economic sides of the question. Its advocates must seek to make the most of the country's resources under present conditions of government, while vigorously advocating, in England and Ireland, the ideal scheme which will complete Ireland's reconstruction.

The tide of emigration must be arrested, and here one is confronted with a difficult aspect of the question. While the emigration of the poorer classes has been widely deplored, it has almost escaped the attention of statisticians that most well-educated young men of the middle classes almost invariably seek positions in England, or abroad; thus the country is being almost as much depleted at one end of its most efficient intellect, as at the other end of its most physically fit.

Now, in any reconstructive policy one of the first steps must be towards a better educational system, yet the utility of such reform will be wholly nullified for Ireland, unless by the stimulation of industrial effort and drastic economic changes we make it worth the Irishman's while to stay in his country. The steady growth of England's prosperity, the equally steady decline of Ireland's, has made it impossible that both countries should flourish under the same fiscal system. As well expect a delicate plant to thrive in conditions which try the most robust. And here I must compromise with principle, and say, though a staunch Free Trader, that some measure of Protection will eventually have to be given to Ireland.

If space permitted it would be delightful to dwell on this side of the question, and on the great possibilities there are in Ireland's resources and in the commercial and administrative abilities of her people! Let me urge, however, the desperate nature of the case. The vast majority of the Irish people seldom go abroad, and are consequently partially unaware of how rapidly the country is decaying, just as the watchers about a sick man's bed often fail to perceive the rapidly advancing ravages of disease, which are apparent to the casual visitor. I have returned to Ireland after ten years' absence, and find the condition of the country has altered in almost every way for the worse. True, things are quieter; there is less active political unrest. But as the country has not bettered, this is disquieting. Agitation, after all, in such a country as Ireland, is a healthy sign. It is, as it were, the effort of sound tissue to combat the inroads of disease. And that sound tissue has, I think, grown less. There is little interest in life in Ireland. The arts and sciences interest but very few, and the stirrings of European thought reverberate here feebly, if at all. And yet the Irishman in the street has as keen an intellect as his compeer in England, and perhaps a keener vision. He would use his hands if he could to rebuild his country's fortunes. But they are tied by a wretched Government, and a vampire-like fiscal burthen. Will England free them?—Yours, &c.,

E. R. W.

The United Arts Club, Dublin.
January 13th, 1908.

Poetry.

BABY LOVE.

(From the Greek of Meleager.)

LET him be sold, I say! Let him be sold,
Even while he slumbers at his mother's breast.
Why should I tend a thing so bad and bold,
A snub-nosed imp, a little scratching pest!
I find him always laughing through his tears:
He treats his mother badly; won't be tamed;
Has baby wings behind him; pries and peers;
Behaves unruly, chatters unashamed,—
A shocking monster! Sailor men, this way!
Who wants a boy to carry off to sea?
O dear, he's crying! Come, I'll let you stay,
And live on here with my Zenophile.

JAMES FLECKER.

Reviews.

THE SCOT OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY.*

SINCE the time of Buckle a great change has come over the study of Scottish history. Buckle did much to revive in his day a view which long prevailed that Scotland, under the domination of the clergy, suffered from a despotism as galling as that of Spain under the priests. In support of his view, Buckle presented to his readers an appalling mass of evidence which to those ignorant of Scottish ecclesiastical history seemed absolutely conclusive. One bright spot only Buckle detected in the long reign of ecclesiasticism: the clergy were the leaders in the battle for political liberty. Not that they were enamoured of political liberty in the abstract, but because in the particular battle in which they were engaged, liberty was indispensable. Buckle's chapters on Scotland never imposed upon any intelligent Scot. Ecclesiastical despotism existed, but for this the people more than the clergy were to blame. In this matter the clergy were merely the representatives of the people, who were ready indeed to take them to task when they failed adequately to discharge their functions, not merely of preaching, but of superintending in their minutest details Sabbath observance, and the moral and the social habits of the community.

How completely at sea was Buckle in his estimate of the Scottish character is vividly shown in the book before us. The book, indeed, is a notable contribution to the literature of the subject. From out-of-the-way sources Dr. Watson has culled information which throws light upon the religion and social status of the people. From his pages we learn much that modifies the harsh judgment passed upon the Scottish clergy. Severely blamed they were for their inquisitorial methods—methods, however, which followed naturally from the fact that the Reformed Church took its policy from the Old Testament. What Knox wanted to establish in Scotland was a theocracy in which the people were to be a holy people; if not by persuasion then by compulsion. A specimen of what that meant may be taken from Dr. Watson's book: "It was the duty of the elders to go round a village at ten p.m. and see that the people were in their homes, from which has risen the phrase 'elders' hours.' And upon them lay the task—difficult in every age—of supervising the public-house, for although drinking was one of the characteristic customs of the eighteenth century, drunkenness was looked on as one of the sins of the flesh. The elders also patrolled markets and fairs to see that nothing was done amiss; they were indeed under the direction of the ministry, the moral police of the parish, and if they had no direct civil authority they could always appeal for the help of the magistrates, and in some cases it was arranged that a magistrate should sit in the Session in order to take civil action when the limit of ecclesiastical authority had been reached."

In the days when Buckle wrote, when the liberty of the subject was the one fundamental item in the creed of advanced thinkers, such methods were deemed the height of fanaticism, and in contrast to this was the popularity of the free and easy methods which Burns, in his fight against ecclesiastical despotism, popularised in Scotland. We have lived to see a marked cooling in the enthusiasm over liberty. We now see the State under the influence of advanced thinkers, and in the name of progress taking over the ideas of the Scottish Church, and by methods which Buckle would have called inquisitorial, renewing "elders' hours" in the form of "ten o'clock closing," superintending the education of the young, and generally interfering with the domestic and social liberty of the people. The only difference is that the theocratic idea implied in State interference is now taken out of the hands of the Church and linked to the democratic idea. What is our compulsory legislation in all directions of public life but an indirect admission that the Church in basing its policy on the Calvinistic doctrine of the depravity of human nature was nearer the nature of things than appeared to thinkers of the type of Buckle with their fanatical belief in liberty? It is open for others, however, to say that the democracy of to-day is simply repeating the error of the Scottish theocracy in placing altogether an exaggerated estimate on the value of a coercive policy. In any case, students of social history are not so apt as they once were to fling the charge of fanaticism at the heads of the Scottish clergy.

When Buckle reached the eighteenth century his admiration knew no bounds. He rejoices in the succession of the great thinkers, who, breaking away from the tradition of the clergy, revived the glories of Humanism which, during the long ecclesiastical struggles from the Reformation to the Union, had been practically extinguished in Scotland. Dr. Watson, as behoved a man of letters, was quite alive to the intellectual revival of the eighteenth century as represented by Hume, Adam Smith, and the band of thinkers who made Scotland illustrious, but he was also alive to the important fact that the Union itself in the form which it took was rendered possible by the heroic struggles of the Church on behalf of individual, spiritual, and political liberty, against Romanism on the one hand, and Episcopacy on the other. It is a very suggestive fact that before Locke, the Scottish Covenanters had a firm grasp of the principles of liberty which found expression in the Revolution of 1688, and it was in defence of these principles that Renwick, the Covenanter, was executed in Edinburgh a few short months before the final banishment of the Stuarts from the throne of England. In a word, the abused and despised Covenanters went to the scaffold on behalf of the principles which made the Union possible, and guaranteed Scotland the necessary peace for the cultivation of letters and philosophy. The blood of the martyrs was not only the seed of religion but also of Humanism. The Scottish clergy, on behalf of liberty, scorned delights and lived laborious days, and the men of letters of the eighteenth century reaped an abundant harvest of peace and cultured leisure.

Among the tragic elements in the life of Scotland, perhaps the one which in the intellectual sphere has proved the greatest hindrance to progress was the long antagonism between the religious leaders and the men of intellect, an antagonism which began in the Church itself, and was represented by the Evangelicals on one side, and the Moderates on the other. The antagonism in a sense was unavoidable, the two parties representing as they did two types of mind which never yet have existed harmoniously side by side. Scottish religion drew its main inspiration from the Old Testament; its spirit was Hebraistic. That is to say, it concentrated its attention upon the relation between God and man, and occupied itself with the great problem of fleeing from the City of Destruction. What is life but a pilgrimage journey? and the wise pilgrim is he who refuses to be allured by the things of the flesh. The watchword of the Evangelicals, who were the descendants of the Reformers, was Salvation. Naturally they looked askance at the secular idea of life. Great learning was valued solely in so far as it contributed to theology. To this we trace the fiery energy, the monotonous piety, the contempt for culture, the indifference to purely secular interests, which characterised the Evangelical party in Scotland. The Moderates, on the other hand, represented the Hellenic idea; their watchword was Culture. Without making an absolute break with the creed of the Church, the Moderates under the influence of Francis Hutcheson endeavoured to separate religion and ethics from the Calvinistic theology.

Moderatism did not take deep root in Scotland. The French Revolution brought the gospel of Reason and Culture into discredit. In presence of the outbreak of diabolism in France, the deism of the Moderates, with its optimistic theory of human nature, was helpless. As a theory of things, Calvinism, with its gloomy view of humanity, seemed more in touch with reality than the superficial philosophising of the men of sweetness and light. The Evangelicals gained the ascendancy, which showed itself in the dramatic episode known as the Disruption. Beneficial as the Disruption was in many ways, it certainly, by reviving in all their old intensity the theological controversies of the past, cast a blight upon the intellectualism of Scotland. Once again was revived the old antagonism between Evangelicals and Moderates. Scotsmen of to-day are learning to do justice to both parties, as this book of Dr. Watson's shows. We honour the Evangelicals for their sturdy defence of sincerity and liberty, and we honour the Moderates for their insistence upon culture. No longer enemies, both parties are now working harmoniously in Scotland in the cause of an enlightened progress.

* "The Scot in the Eighteenth Century." By the late Dr. John Watson. Hodder & Stoughton. 7s. 6d. net.

THE OLD WILD WEST.*

THESE are stirring memories; brave reading they make for a week of winter nights. The many-coloured West has changed indeed since Robert Williams, younger son of an English clergyman, first sought fortune there in the early 'fifties. He himself is now dead, and it is out of a past of old forgotten things that he seems to speak to us; for, albeit the remotest of these scenes are little more than a bare half-century behind us, oblivion has looked on nearly all of them. Here are drum-taps of the long and frantic Civil War, that freed the slave. Here are fights with the cruel Comanché Indian (not delicately treated by the whites, to be sure), who liked to do his victim very slowly to death by fire and knife and spear-point. Here are the gamblers of Bret Harte's pages. Here are the strange old camp meetings, with perfervid preaching and gulps of prayer, and whiskey in barrels for the wicked on the dusky outskirts of the throng. Here is shooting at sight, "frequent and free," if you were bold enough to speak with your enemy in the gate. Here, during the War, are lynchings in cold blood by the Vigilance Committees that equal some fiendish passages of the French Revolution. Here is the hand ever on the six-shooter and the shot-gun slung at the saddle-bow. But here also are the romance and reality of ranching and all forms of trading in the supremely Wild West and South of the 'fifties; setting up store, driving big bunches of cattle, camping o' nights, lassoing mustangs, avoiding the buffalo in his multitudinous charge from one ground to another, and cooking a bit of him for breakfast or supper on the prairie. It is a life by turns primitive and pastoral in its simplicity, strenuous in its toil, either for wealth or a living, adventurous on lines almost Homeric, chivalrous and mean, perilous at all times, and about as unconventional as the records of humanity have to show. It is the life of a world that has well-nigh vanished, the roaring America of the 'fifties and the 'sixties. It will be seen of men no more. Happily, therefore, we have something like a panorama of it in these intense but curiously modest chapters. The grittiest of parson's sons is not the least of a braggart; he is as clean as he is keen and well-contained; and there could be no simpler narrative of a career so varied, picturesque, and exciting.

No Britisher, of course, was called upon to bear arms in the struggle between North and South, but young Williams went as whole-heartedly as hot-headedly into it on the side of the slave-owners. At the outset, indeed, there were not many who knew or could have said clearly what it was all about; and at this date candour compels the admission that among neither of the two parties did the slave count for very much. Not until the fight was well toward did he and his claims begin to loom large. Thousands of Southerners believed that they were fighting merely or mainly to save themselves from being swamped by the Yankees. Says Williams, writing, after some preliminaries, of the 1860 days:—

"I do not propose to dilate further upon the cause of the dreadful Civil War, now on the point of breaking out, which have been argued out so fully on both sides; nor to attempt to apportion the blame for the internecine strife which slew so many hecatombs of men, and devastated some of the fairest regions of the earth. All I will say is that we of the South believed in our very souls that our cause was a just one. We made a brave fight, as I think all the world allows, for what we thought our rights, and, losing, paid the penalty for our mistake, if mistake it were, to the uttermost farthing."

In his first chapter, "looking back through all these years, whilst I sit by my quiet, happy English fireside," he confesses, in the candid way that was habitual with him, that he was mistaken in his cause.

"But, though I make this admission, I think it is only right to put it on record that, as far as my own personal observation went, the cruelties of slavery have been overdrawn."

We may take this from the honest rover and say no word in his dispraise; but the world's verdict on the institution of slavery, given a generation ago, is the true one. It was never justified, it grew out of no real necessities, it was one of the most monstrous mistakes in our own history, and from first to last we got out of it not good, but evil.

But we will not end on a note of deprecation a brief review of a book as interesting, original, and wholesome as this. A better story of the life of hazard and adventure, entered on with no sordid motive, and pursued to no sordid end, we have not often read. Mr. Williams returned to England for good at the early age of thirty-seven, and the frontispiece shows him a hale and handsome J.P. of this country, "at 70." His book is posthumous. Was he regaling his friends at home for more than a generation with the delightful yarns that fill it? We should have liked a night with him.

THE DIARY OF A TORY.*

MR. JEFFERY explains that he has only published in these two volumes a selection from General Dyott's diary, and that the diary in its original form runs to 500,000 words. He also tells us that Freeford Hall, the home of the Dyott family, possesses several manuscripts of considerable historical value, and he hints that we may expect further contributions from this source in the next few years. Those further publications will be awaited with interest, but the first instalment, if the truth must be told, cannot be regarded as a document of any considerable historical significance. Dyott lived to a great age; he travelled a great deal; he saw some service, and he was on terms of friendship at different times with persons of importance. But he has no secrets to reveal; he gives us scarcely any intimate touches; and he writes of high politics like a man who is of that world but not in it. His travels do not suggest any very interesting observations, and in his comments on persons he may be said to suffer from the want of that uncharitableness, which in a diarist covers a multitude of sins. The reader who turns to these pages to find anything very piquant or stimulating will accordingly be disappointed; he will find instead the good-natured, rather commonplace remarks of a typical English country squire of his times.

Dyott's life falls naturally into two parts; his career in the army, and his life as a country gentleman. He rose to some distinction in the army, was made an Aide-de-Camp to George the Third, and commanded a brigade at the Battle of Alexandria, and in the Walcheren Expedition. But there is singularly little professional enthusiasm in his pages, and though his life began in the exciting days of the American War, and lasted through the greater excitements of the French War, the description of his military career is chiefly occupied with trifles. The most interesting passages are those in which he describes the shameful treatment the army received from the incompetent Dundas, and the misery in which the soldiers paid for the Government's neglect. There is one chapter on which he writes with unrestrained satisfaction. When he was twenty-six he was stationed with his regiment at Halifax, and Prince William Henry, afterwards William IV., arrived there with the fleet from Quebec. The Prince and Dyott struck up a warm friendship, and Dyott describes the developing of that friendship with an innocent delight. "He did me the honour to talk a great deal to me before supper, during the dance. We went to supper about twelve, a most elegant thing, near sixty people sat down. We had scarce begun supper when he called out 'Dyott, fill your glass' (before he had asked any person in the room to drink). When I told his Royal Highness my glass was full, he said, 'Dyott, your good health and your family.' Not half-an-hour after he called out, 'Dyott, fill a bumper,' then 'Dyott, here's a bumper toast.' After supper he gave five or six bumper toasts, and always called me to see these filled at my table." . . . "I always made a point of attending him to his barge." . . . "The Governor, Commissioner, and all the great people attended him to his barge. Just as he pushed off he called out, 'Dyott, I shall send the cutter here on Friday at three.' I cannot avoid mentioning these little circumstances; it is so very flattering to be taken such particular notice of by so great a person." . . . "He did me the honour to say it was very seldom he took so much notice of a subaltern." After three months of dissipation and escapades, Dyott took a tearful leave of his friend, and he remarks with his engaging simplicity, "to be sure the company of a Prince added not a little to the joyous hours." Many years later, when William IV. ascended the throne, Dyott took a severer view of his former friend: "Having in younger days seen much of King William the Fourth, partaken of several weeks' familiar intercourse, as far as Prince and subject was allowable, I have little hesitation in auguring that William's will not be a reign to which any great benefits are likely to accrue to the nation from kingly exertion."

*"With the Border Ruffians: Memories of the Far West, 1852-1868." By R. H. Williams. Edited by E. W. Williams. With Portraits. John Murray. 12s. net.

* "Dyott's Diary." A selection from the Journal of William Dyott, sometime General in the British Army, and Aide-de-Camp to His Majesty King George the Third. Edited by Reginald W. Jeffery. In two volumes. Constable. 31s. 6d. net.

Dyott's diary suffers perhaps in more than one respect from his virtues. He was a devoted father, and his natural affection for his children was probably intensified by his domestic affliction. His wife, who had no reason to complain of neglect on his side, ran away from him and was eventually divorced. But the result of his engrossing interest in his children is that they occupy quite a disproportionate share of his diary. He makes interminable visits to London to try to get Dick promoted or moved into another regiment. Dick's wrongs pursue us almost to the end of the volumes. Bill, his second son, went to Cambridge, and pained his tender father very much by refusing for some months to write to him, the explanation apparently being that Bill's life at Cambridge did not lend itself to very edifying narrative. He afterwards took orders, and became a great favourite with the sporting parsons. His father worked incessantly to obtain livings for him, and his satisfaction was complete when Bill was made domestic chaplain to a peer. It is not many people who can make their solicitude for their children's advancement of vivid interest to outsiders; Lady Sarah Lennox could, but was there anything she could not make interesting? Dyott had neither Lady Sarah's gifts nor her children. One result of his immersion in family affairs is that he passes over some of the most important events of his time with strangely little notice; Trafalgar is not mentioned, and Waterloo only comes into these pages by accident some time after the event. Not that Dyott was without political interests. He had very strong political opinions. His hatred of reform made him use very bitter language about his old friend William IV., to whom he attributed more enlightened opinions than he possessed, and it enabled him to regard the burning of the Houses of Parliament as a warning from Heaven. For all the last part of his life he was an active magistrate and Tory squire, and he looked on with dismay at every encroachment on the power of his class. He spoke strongly to Sir Robert Peel (with whom he was on terms of friendship) against giving leases to farmers as a practice which put the landlord in a false position, by giving the tenant a dangerous degree of independence. He disliked "the modern rage for education," and repeatedly expressed the opinion that "the lower orders" were the worse for it. His general views of the relations of society to some of the main problems of the day were based on his opinion that "nothing but the terror of human suffering can avail to prevent crime," and he pressed for the legalisation of spring guns. In the same spirit he argued that flogging in the army was essential, and he was very severe on his old friend Lord Anglesey for his conciliatory temper towards Ireland. There is nothing surprising or novel in his opinions, which were those of the ordinary country squire. Perhaps the most interesting feature of his diary is the complete ignorance which it displays of the great causes and forces that were creating the great social discontents, some of the results of which the writer found so alarming. Dyott was a kindly, benevolent nature, but he never gave a thought to the tremendous miseries which the England he wanted to keep down by spring guns and fierce repression was enduring. He lived to a great age in complacent unconsciousness of their existence. If he dismisses the scare about cholera with the reassuring reflection that it only attacks the lowest orders, it is not because he has no feeling but because he has little imagination. He finds it very difficult to enter into any other world than his own. This is the plight of most people of his prejudices and position. To those who read his diary to-day knowing something of the wretched lot and the wretched horizons of the down-trodden men and women for whom Place and Cobbett and Owen struggled, it seems amazing that the realities of those times should have escaped anyone so completely as they escaped poor old Dyott. Yet if diaries are kept in country-houses to-day, will not the future historian read many of them with just the same astonishment?

IN THE AGE OF THE DESPOTS.*

THE name of Sforza, with its militant clang, calls up the age of the Condottieri, but the line of Sforza, or, more properly speaking, of Attendolo, produced types more complex than that of the rough-hewn fighter who first won the significant nick-name. Miss Ady has told the story of the house with clearness and sympathy, and with considerable mastery of the complicated political conditions which surrounded it. Historically considered, this study of Milan is very satisfactory: a record of facts faithfully set forth. From a literary standpoint it cannot claim quite so full a commendation, and that not merely on account of its occasional grammatical carelessness. The even narrative is curiously lacking in vividness of colour, in dramatic light and shade; it tells of dominant or of subtle characters, but it does not make them live.

Yet how full of contrast, of brilliant achievement and tragic vicissitude, is the history of that typical race of Italian fighters and despots, from the hour when—if we accept picturesque tradition—Muzio Attendolo flung his axe into a tree and deserted the humble work of a wood-cutter for the career of a soldier. The life of that founder of his family has some chivalric touches not to be matched among his greater descendants, and it closed very fittingly in an attempt to rescue a favourite page from the swollen waters of the river Pescara. The soldier of fortune—like most of the famous condottieri, he was but a hireling, at the service of the highest bidder—laid the foundations of power on which his son, Francesco, was to rear so proud an edifice. It was through marriage with Bianca, daughter of Filippo Maria Visconti, that Francesco Sforza laid claim to Milan; but before he could come from the March of Ancona, where he had fought, ruled, and, ultimately, failed, to hold sway in the Lombard city, Milan had its brief, futile attempt at a renewal of popular government. Miss Ady tells at some length of the establishment and fall of the Ambrosian Republic; an idealistic and pathetic effort to return to the days of the Lombard League, when Milan had upheld her civic independence in the face of the mighty Hohenstaufen Emperors.

The author is far more at home in dealing with the statescraft than with the martial exploits of the time. Her accounts of battles and campaigns are extremely perfunctory, but she follows with interest the political intrigues and civic developments of Milan under the Sforza rule. The Dukes of the Lombard town had a difficult game to play, assailed as they were by the rivalry of Venice and the ambition of France, which never abandoned its claims to Milan, founded on the marriage of Valentina Visconti with the Duke of Orleans. The ever-shifting alliances and antagonisms of the time are admirably treated in this narrative, especial care being shown in the treatment of the relations between Milan and the Swiss Cantons and their decisive influence on the career of Massimiliano Sforza. The historic background is, in fact, excellent: the conflicts of France and the Empire, the hostility of Venice and the friendship of Florence towards Milan, the rivalries of the smaller towns, are all well considered and explained. It is in the central figures of the drama that a lack is felt. Miss Ady is conscientiously anxious to set forth the good and evil of her characters, but she fails to make convincing human beings of them.

* "Milan Under the Sforza." By Cecilia M. Ady. Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

THERE are a few novels which satisfy one by the originality of their creative outlook, and a great many which please one by the piquancy of certain traits and tones personal to the writer. Mrs. Ritchie's novel belongs to the latter class. "Man and the Cassock" is not remarkable in its artistic conception or execution; it is written in a hesitating style, with an air of conscientious mental application rather than of underlying force; but the finish shown on every page lifts it out of the ruck of fiction, and sharpens the feminine malice of much of the character drawing.

Emily Neufmarché, a beautiful and conceited young woman, is exceedingly bored with her unattractive and uninteresting husband Geoffrey, a quiet Berkshire squire, with "a fringe of sandy hair and a small chin," a man more than double her age, whom she had married at seventeen. Emily believes in the doctrine of "self-realisation" and of seeing "life," and when her husband objects to her passing so much of her time in town with her smart friends whose "private lives had become public property," Emily assures him that she has interests above the nursery, and that as long as she lives she intends to have a good time and know the sort of people she likes. To give Geoffrey time to repent his "harshness" and come to her terms, the brilliant Emily sets off on a visit to her brother Theodore, who has dedicated his life and his fortune to the glory of God and the restoration of the old brotherhood of St. Michael's Priory at Dunnbury.

The society at Dunnbury is typical of many English circles to-day, in which a variety of educated people meet who have not much in common. There is the simple-minded rector, who is a croquet enthusiast, and has a hatred of intellectual responsibility; Colebeck, the athletic curate, who has a passion for the Anglican ritual; Colonel Travers, a retired Anglo-Indian, a genial and kind little man who is always at everybody's service; Frank Topham, a younger son, whose mother, Lady Topham, maintains that "his eccentric behaviour had nothing to do with intemperance, but came from overwork at books," &c. But none of these people are worthy of Emily's bow and spear, and she soon discovers that her ascetic brother Theodore and his friend on a visit, Dr. Connington, a famous specialist whose ugliness is "arresting and significant," are both under the spell of the rector's daughter, Marion Smith, who has run the parish since she was seventeen. Emily, on first meeting Marion, does not believe that this quiet-looking and insignificant little person has this strange power of "ruling men without their knowing it," and conscious of her own superiority in every way in beauty, intellect, and manner, she patronises her; but her failure to draw Dr. Connington from Marion's side piques her vanity, and she determines to conquer and teach the men a lesson. The strength of the novel lies in the clever analysis of Emily's feminine arts and jealousy in contrast with the charm of Marion's simple goodness. In some respects "Man and the Cassock" might be styled a direct satire on the feminine sex if the author had succeeded in establishing that there is a higher good for woman than love. She aims apparently at finding some philosophy of life which can bring spiritual peace to the disillusioned worldly mind, but the Church is shown to be a cold and austere mother in comparison with Marion's simple lovingness. We cannot, indeed, help sympathising with Emily's desire for love, even though she is shown us as being too frivolous and selfish to deserve it. How skilfully Mrs. Ritchie can catch and satirise the chameleon hues of feminine dissimulation may be seen from two little passages, the first after Connington has evaded her, the second where she has at last brought him to bay:—

"What were they doing, he and Marion, all this time? Where were they? She gazed round her, almost dazed. The world had reversed its order. Anywhere but here she would have been conspicuously attended by the man in whom she felt a momentary interest, and other women would have been waiting, other women watchful, and she would have noticed it all with complacency, magnanimous, broad-minded toleration for feminine small-mindedness, feminine meanness. She had always felt a contempt for women. Women could never be trusted. Probably Marion had an understanding about this morning's hunt with Connington, when they were alone in the vestry together last evening. It was just the sort of thing a pious person would do, and not know what humbug it was. How the rush and scamper and noise of the hunt was intolerably foolish. How absurd the little Colonel looked excited about nothing. What ridiculous people all these Tophams and Parachutes and Whatnots were, so easily amused, so stupid."

* * * * *

"All I say is," she went on, "that you put me down at once as shallow, without giving me a chance of showing you my real self."

"Connington turned towards her again."

"Your real self," he repeated."

"Yes," said Emily, "the self that is behind all this kind of shallowness that society makes one put on—makes one put on—when all the time one hates it and longs for sincerity and truth and all that sort of thing that one can't get. Don't you think that it's rather hard lines when one feels the misery of life, and tries to hide what one feels and appear to be cheerful, that a man who professes to know everything should take it for shallowness and frivolity, not see behind it or give one any credit for depth of character, or for suffering patiently, just because one isn't making a long face?"

Connington is, of course, deeply in love with the sweet unworldly Marion, but he has resolved to put aside "the clamour of his own egotism," and not disturb "the sacred friendship" between her and his friend, Theodore Moulton, who is a weak and lonely man and far more dependent on Marion's spiritual leading than he guesses. In his anger Connington resolves to punish Emily and show her what a hopeless little fool she is, and he suddenly simulates an absorbing personal interest in her to lead her on. We do not, as a matter of fact, quite believe that Connington's deliberate change of front is possible to a man who is suffering keenly, but if we credit him with a Jesuitical tinge, we can follow his thought, and, at any rate, we accept it for the interest of what follows. Emily is transformed by her apparent conquest. In a sense she is justified by this result of her feminine wiles, for reality has, it seems, come to her, the great reality of love of which she has long been confusedly in search.

"Until a few days ago she had played contentedly with toys; she now craved to play with fire. She was playing with it; the heat and light of it confused her senses. There was no danger; the only danger possible was that it might suddenly go out, through her want of skill, and leave her back in the darkness, the cold that she had so foolishly called 'life.'"

"Never mind what I seemed before; do I offend you now?" The movement of his hand towards her, from where he stood against the open doorway, was of the slightest, and yet to Emily it was one of the most profound significance. It was painful, but with the pain came the joy of contact with a strong inexhaustible life, filling all the shadows of her nature. It was a revelation almost too great to be endured."

Of course, Emily's fool's paradise is soon shattered. She learns that there is no reality between Connington and herself except his contempt. In a striking little scene she stands before him "significant only for what she was morally worth," and he tells her that he has deliberately drawn her on, in his anger, to show the absurdity of her pretensions, and to punish her. There is considerable psychological skill shown in the brief analysis of the woman's frozen feelings when she finds herself back "in the darkness and cold." "The whole world had grown cold. She seemed shrivelled up in some dry, frosty, sexless atom. She knew that before her stretched an interminable future that contained nothing but the confused past of existence, existence without significance. Her womanhood had gone."

While Emily's emotional tragedy is near its end, a real tragedy is at hand. Her brother Theodore is dying. Marion has been warned by Connington, before the latter's departure, that Theodore must be carefully nursed, and kept free from all strain, but the unexpected happens, and Theodore breaks a blood vessel a few hours after the warning. The author rises to her highest artistic level in the last five chapters in which the ascetic Theodore realises, with the shadow of death upon him, that he can never hope to marry Marion, and that there is an awful austerity in the doctrine which bids men renounce all earthly joy. The mingled feeling of tragedy and banality is rendered with a powerful touch in the scene after the ball at Colonel Travers' house. The hurried and broken character of life is admirably conveyed here, and the author shows that she can paint with a sombre brush, as well as touch off the comedy of things with a feminine malice.

* "Man and the Cassock." By Mrs. David G. Ritchie. Methuen. 6s.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE delightful collection of photographs which illustrate Mr. David Fraser's "Marches of Hindustan" (Blackwood, 21s. net) is in itself enough to ensure for his book a welcome. He has shown taste and skill in the choice of his subjects, and these 129 illustrations alone succeed in giving the reader a vivid impression of the wild and beautiful countries through which he passed. Peaks and precipices, mountain castles, dizzy rope bridges, strange types of unfamiliar peoples, laughing children and old women whose wrinkles suggest a comic masque, mosques with the magic name of Nashapur, and Persian pots that seem to talk in quatrains—it is a wonderful travel album. Mr. Fraser's journey took him through Tibet, Trans-Himalayan India, Chinese and Russian Turkestan, and Persia. The envious reader admires his courage and enterprise, but as one nears the end of the book the feeling grows that Mr. Fraser has not quite known how to use his good fortune. A hurried ride through strange peoples, with no knowledge of their languages and without a background of interest in folk lore or custom or religion, has resulted in a somewhat breathless and superficial book. Literary skill and charm in narrative would have saved it, but these are not often conspicuous. Some chapters on Persia amid the throes of the reform movement seem elaborately to miss the real interest of the theme. But they do leave one clear impression enforced with an accumulation of facts and opinions—that the poverty of Persia is not the temporary and accidental result of misgovernment and inertia, but an irremediable fact of nature, we might almost say of geology. The land is slowly drying up, as Central Asia has dried up, and its future is sinking beyond recall in the sandy soil under a cruel sun. That roads or railways or irrigation (on any large scale) could ever pay in such a soil Mr. Fraser more than doubts. The lesson is one which the Imperialists of Russia and Great Britain will do well to learn betimes. There is no Nile in these deserts, and without a Nile the temptation to occupy may perhaps be resisted.

* * *

A LITTLE book, "Keys to the Drood Mystery," by Edwin Charles (Collier & Co., 1s. net), is an ingenious and clearly thought out attempt, provoked of course by the play at His Majesty's Theatre, to discover what Dickens meant the "Mystery of Edwin Drood" to be. Three earlier solutions of that mystery have in turn been attempted—first, that Dickens meant Drood to escape murder at his uncle's hands and to re-appear in the story disguised as Datchery, a solution favoured by Mr. Proctor and Mr. Andrew Lang; secondly, that Drood was killed and Jasper's crime was discovered by Helena Landless disguised as Datchery; thirdly, Mr. Comyns Carr's solution, which leaves Datchery out of account altogether, and suggests that Drood was saved by seeing Jasper in the act of enacting the contemplated murder in an opium trance. Mr. Carr's reading, however, can hardly stand, for the omission of Datchery seems fatal. On the whole, the writer of this book, Mr. Edwin Charles, takes the line of most probability. He assumes that Dickens intended Drood to be strangled by Jasper and buried under quicklime in the Sapsea vault. Two powerful lines of evidence exist in favour of this solution. The first is Forster's description of Dickens's account to him of the idea of the story. This was the murder of a nephew by an uncle. The last chapters were to be written in the condemned cell, and the discovery of the murder would be through a gold ring which had resisted the action of the lime. The second witness is Sir Luke Fildes, to whom Dickens personally explained that he meant Jasper to strangle Drood with the black scarf, and who was asked to make for him a sketch of the condemned cell at Maidstone Jail, where the execution for a crime committed at Rochester (Cloisterham) would naturally take place. Mr. Charles presents this study with much care and plausibility. Datchery he identifies with Mr. Grewgious's clerk, Bazzard, whose character, judging by some touches in the fragment, Dickens was prepared to work out with some care. Mr. Charles writes well, if rather too sentimentally, and he has read Dickens's brilliant fragment with very intelligent eyes.

THE second edition of Vernon Lee's "Studies in the Eighteenth Century in Italy" (Unwin, 21s. net) differs from the book as issued twenty-six years ago by the addition of a "retrospective chapter" by way of preface, and the inclusion of a number of illustrations selected by Dr. Guido Biagi, of the Laurentian Library, Florence. In the new preface—an excellent example of discerning self-criticism—the author admits that the Italian eighteenth century was "taken all round a deal less interesting" than her book makes out. Coming between a period when there still existed a remnant of Renaissance genius and splendour and the earlier nineteenth century made illustrious by Garibaldi and Mazzini, the Italy of the eighteenth century was comparatively drab and colourless. But Vernon Lee, writing as she confesses with a scant knowledge of the period, managed to give an interest to this prosaic age, and she did well to republish this fruit of her youthful enthusiasm without any revision. An apologetic preface is oftener to be found in a good book than in a worthless one, and "Studies in the Eighteenth Century in Italy" is no exception to the rule. The subjects include the Arcadian Academy, once so famous but now forgotten, the Italian musicians, with a charming account of Dr. Burney's foreign tour in 1770, Metastasio and the Opera, the Comedy of Masks, Goldoni and the Realistic Comedy, and Carlo Gozzi and the Venetian Fairy Comedy. The book is a good example of Vernon Lee's personal type of criticism, and of her power of re-creating the atmosphere of a past age. A word of praise is due to the publisher for the excellent way in which the volume has been produced.

* * *

MR BUMPUS begins by warning the traveller visiting Italy for the first time not to be "too much carried away by the reaction against former prejudice." Certainly "The Cathedrals and Churches of Northern Italy" (Werner, Laurie, 16s. net) does not suggest that its author has fallen into any such mistake, if mistake it be—a matter that is open to doubt. Mr. Bumpus, who has studied and written much on English Gothic, is severely critical of Italian Gothic Cathedrals and everything that pertains to them. Now, criticism, as a well-known dramatic critic once remarked, is merely the expression of an opinion, and on the subject of Italian church architecture, Mr. Bumpus is entitled to express his opinion as much as anybody else. We cannot, therefore, grumble if he reserves his enthusiasm for a few world-famous buildings, such as St. Mark's at Venice, speaks patronisingly of others, and vigorously denounces many more. We might suggest that his purist sympathies in architecture, which are evidently very strong indeed, have blinded him to the real character of the Italian genius, which is not the genius for any one style, but for the fusion of many; but though his attitude on this point may not please, it is at least legitimate. But there is a limit to the expression of opinions, and Mr. Bumpus seems to overstep it in his comments upon the modern Italian people and their way of conducting religious services. The book is extremely discursive and the discursions are often irritatingly pompous. "The meal concluded, I sought the Duomo for High Mass," is Mr. Bumpus's way of saying that he went to church after breakfast. He seems indeed to have tried to combine a serious architectural treatise with a chatty sort of guide-book, and as he has not the literary touch of Stevenson, or Mr. Belloc, or Mr. Lewis Hind, or any others who have made similar combinations interesting, the result is elephantine in its clumsiness. This is a great pity, since he appears to have toured Northern Italy conscientiously, and his book contains plenty of solid fact. He writes interestingly of the polychromatic churches in Verona, and of those in Ravenna, though we notice that in reference to the sculptural ornamentation of the latter he misses the point that the naturalistic Acanthus-leaf capital can be traced directly to the art of imperial Rome. The eighty-one illustrations in colour and monotone are serviceable adjuncts to a volume which, unlike its predecessors on English and German cathedrals, hardly satisfies and certainly does not inspire.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.Rambling Recollections

BY

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF.

With Photogravure and other Illustrations.

Two vols. 8vo., 30s. net.

Westminster Gazette:—"An exceedingly readable record of the recollections of one who has had the good fortune to be 'in the swim' for more years than most of his contemporaries. It is full of good stories."

B. L. PUTNAM WEALE'S NEW BOOK.

THE COMING STRUGGLE IN EASTERN ASIA.

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE. Author of "Manchu and Muscovite," "The Reshaping of the Far East," etc. With Illustrations, and Map. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net. [Tuesday.]

H. FIELDING HALL'S NEW BOOK.

THE INWARD LIGHT. By H. FIELDING HALL.

Author of "The Soul of a People," etc. 8vo, 10s. net.

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON. Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 vols. Globe 8vo. Vol. II. POEMS. 4s. net.

SIR WALTER SCOTT. By the RT. HON. GEORGE

WYNDHAM, M.P. 8vo. limp cloth, 1s. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS—New Volume.

JAMES THOMSON. By G. C. MACAULAY. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.SIXTY YEARS OF PROTECTION IN CANADA,

1846-1907. Where Industry Leans on the Politician. By EDWARD PORRITT. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Tribune.—"Mr. Edward Porritt's complete, detailed, and most instructive history of 'Protection in Canada.'"

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES—New Volume.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY. Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Also cloth elegant, 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

OWEN WISTER'S NEW BOOK.

THE SEVEN AGES OF WASHINGTON. By

OWEN WISTER. Author of "Lady Baltimore," &c. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 8s. 6d. net.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

Illustrated. Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, 16s.

The FEBRUARY Number Contains:

THE REMINISCENCES OF LADY RANDOLPH CHURCHILL.

IV. London Political Society—Friendships with English Statesmen—The Primrose League—Campaign Experiences. By MRS. GEORGE CORNWALLIS-WEST.

THE SPELL OF EGYPT: As Revealed in its Monuments.

I. By ROBERT HICHENS.

THE EVOLUTION OF LIFE (Mars as the Abode of Life).

By PERCIVAL LOWELL.

"SENSE AND SENSIBILITY." An Autobiographical Record.

By HELEN KELLER.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.

MESSRS. BELL'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY. 225 COPIES ONLY FOR SALE.

SANDRO BOTTICELLI

By HERBERT P. HORNE.

Crown Folio. Printed at the Chiswick Press, on Arnold's Hand-made Paper. With an Appendix of Original Documents, many of which are printed for the first time, and 43 Photogravure Plates from special Photographs, in many cases of Pictures never before reproduced. Price £10 10s. net.

 A Supplementary Volume, containing a detailed study of the School of Botticelli, a 'Catalogue Raisonné' of all the known works of the master and his followers, a Bibliography, and a full Index to both volumes, is in the Press, and will be published as soon as possible. The price of this volume will not exceed £5 5s. net.

Orders will be accepted only for the Two Volumes.

A Prospectus will be sent on application.

Small 4to. Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.

QUEEN MARY'S BOOK.

A Collection of Poems and Essays by Mary Queen of Scots. Edited by Mrs. P. STEWART-MACKENZIE ARBUTHNOT.

"Whatever may be his point of view with regard to Mary, the reader interested in her personality and career should be glad of this beautiful collection of her poems and essays, and should be grateful to Mrs. Arbuthnot for her zeal in making the collection and in supplying renderings of those pieces not already translated." Daily Telegraph.

Prospectus on application.

LES CLASSIQUES FRANÇAIS ILLUSTRÉS.

Publiés sous la direction de DANIEL O'CONNOR. Small crown 8vo, with 8 Full-page Illustrations in Colour and 29 in Black and White. 5s. net.

NOW READY.

GEORGE SAND: LES MAÎTRES SONNEURS.

Préface d'EMILE FAGUET, de l'Académie Française. Illustrations de M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

READY FEB. 4.

GEORGE SAND: LA MARE AU DIABLE.

Notice Analytique de C. A. SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

Post 8vo. 6s. net.

HOW TO COLLECT CONTINENTAL CHINA.

By C. H. WYLDE. With 40 Plates, and upwards of 600 Facsimiles of Marks.

"Presents in a handy and compact form all that is essential for the average collector to know regarding the history of any old European factory whose productions he is likely to meet with."—Evening Standard.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

Cloth, 5s.

THE STORY OF AN ALPINE WINTER.

A Novel. By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND, Author of "True Tales of Mountain Adventure," "Cities and Sights of Spain."

"Will recall many pleasant memories to those who have already gauged the delights of ski-ing or being rocked in a bob-sleigh. As to the tyro—it will help him to look less like a tyro. Assuredly read the volume if you want a few tips."—Daily Chronicle.

LONDON:

GEORGE BELL & SONS, Portugal St., Kingsway, W.C.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

"MARSHAL TURENNE," by the author of "A Life of Sir Kenelm Digby," with an Introduction by Brigadier-General Francis Lloyd (Longmans, 12s. 6d. net), is of more value as a study of Turenne's modest and generous personality than as a contribution to military history. Still, the author has made a careful study of Turenne's strategy and tactics, and as he makes frequent use of Napoleon's criticisms this side of his subject is as trustworthy as can be expected from one who does not write as an expert. Turenne's career was a succession of triumphs. At twenty-four he had reached the rank of major-general, and a few years later he had established his reputation as one of the greatest of French soldiers. His death at the battle of Sasbach in 1675 threw the whole country into consternation. We see in Madame de Sévigné's letters how deep was the general sense of loss, and Louis XIV. was but the interpreter of public opinion in insisting that Turenne's body should be laid in the Abbey of Saint Denis beside the Kings of France. Of Turenne's character the cynical St. Evremont observed that he had two singularities, "a too great disinterestedness in an age when a spirit of self-interest was universal, and a too pure probity at a period of universal corruption." Sir Francis Lloyd contributes an introduction, in which he hints at the possibility of startling changes taking place in the principles of warfare in the near future. Aerial navigation, for instance, would alter the whole theory of war.

IN spite of Southey's admiration and Byron's praise it is doubtful whether there are many people to-day who read Kirke White's poetry. The charm of his character and the pathetic circumstances of his early death kept his work popular for some forty years after he died. However, it has little power or originality, and it seems to have been neglected during the past half century. For those who care to make acquaintance with this poet an excellent opportunity is provided by the issue of the "Poems, Letters, and Prose Fragments of Kirke White," edited by Mr. John Drinkwater, in Messrs. Routledge's series, "The Muses' Library" (1s. net). Like the rest of the series, the volume is edited with care and scholarship, and neatly produced. The same publishers issue a welcome reprint of "Poems" by Sir Alfred C. Lyall (1s. net).

IN "Francesco Bartolozzi, R.A." (Otto, Ltd., 5s. net), Mr. J. T. Herbert Baily has given us an "Extra Number" of the "Connoisseur," which can hardly fail to achieve success. A more popular subject could not have been found. Bartolozzi, though his fame suffered a temporary eclipse after his death, has steadily gained adherents throughout the last few decades. Only last year, the record price for any one of his prints was paid for a colour-print after Lawrence's "Miss Farren, Countess of Derby." The sum realised was over £600. Perhaps this is partly responsible for the "little thrill of emotion," without which, says Mr. Baily, the name of the engraver can hardly be mentioned by the connoisseur and the collector; but there are other reasons as well. Bartolozzi, whatever his faults and his later unscrupulousness in regard to putting his name to prints that were not his own, was undoubtedly a master of his craft, and was responsible for introducing into English engraving an element of grace and lightness of which, at the time, it stood in need. He was not, it is true, the inventor of the stipple technique, with which he is principally associated, but—as Mr. Baily observes—this technique was the perfect means of expressing his ideals of beauty, and his use of it demonstrated its hitherto unsuspected possibilities. With reference to his chief reproach, that he emulated his early master, Wagner, in founding what was virtually a print manufactory, it must be remembered that he also founded a school of engravers that included J. R. Smith, Charles Knight, and many another famous name. In the biographical sketch Mr. Baily makes good use of the somewhat scanty materials available. Since stipple was Bartolozzi's popular technique, and the space for the narrative is very limited, he is wise to content himself with a bare reference to the engraver's work with the burin or etching needle. Among the pictures, moreover, are reproductions from the Guercino etchings and other specimens calculated to give a good idea of Bartolozzi's variety in method. The bibliography contributed by Professor Hans Singer is fairly useful, though we are at a loss to understand his difficulty in finding the second edition of Mr. Tuer's work. Five hundred copies were printed, and the book is at the British Museum and the London Library.

No student of educational theory and practice should miss "Selected Writings of Thomas Godolphin Rooper," edited with a memoir by Mr. R. G. Tatton (Blackie, 7s. 6d. net). Always an enthusiast for educational reform, Rooper was appointed an inspector of schools in 1877, and his influence, though unobtrusive, was far-reaching and beneficial. He was a strong advocate of manual training, particularly in rural schools, and his essays on the subject in this volume are most valuable. His experience as an inspector brought him into close touch with the actual working of the schools, and his knowledge kept him free from faddism, that weakness of so many would-be reformers of educational methods. The essays collected by Mr. Tatton, while of special interest to teachers, will also be read with pleasure by the larger public who recognise the importance of setting a high standard for our elementary schools. We would call particular attention to those called "The Pot of Green Feathers" and "Gaiety in Education: A Study of Augustine and Calvin."

THE first edition of Mr. W. V. Vernon's "Readings on the Purgatorio of Dante" appeared in 1889, a second and much amplified edition was published nine years later, and now we have from Messrs. Methuen a third edition (two vols. 15s. net.) which, the author tells us, has been revised, "and many small improvements have been introduced." Further consideration has led Mr. Vernon to change his views as to the identity of "Matilda" who appears to Dante in Canto XXVIII. The majority of modern critics agree with the unanimous view of the old commentators that she was Matilda of Canossa, the daughter of Duke Boniface VIII., but, as Dr. Moore declares, the subject is one of the thorniest problems in the "Divina Commedia." Mr. Vernon's book in its new shape will be welcomed by all Dante students. It is indispensable to a serious study of the Purgatorio.

As a collection of readable essays about various phases of child life Mr. Maynard Smith's "Playmates" (Masters, 2s. 6d. net) may be commended to those who enjoy such reading. Mr. Maynard Smith is not entirely free from the "vanity of dogmatising" on the proper way to bring up children—he admits that he is a bachelor—a tendency from which those who have had experience of the matter are usually free. We must protest against his advocacy of the practice of whipping children. It is absurd to beat a child for a sudden outburst of rudeness or such an offence as running about in slippers on a damp lawn, as Mr. Smith recommends.

THE current quarterlies are particularly strong in articles on literary subjects. Professor Churton Collins contributes an excellent appreciation of Johnson's "Lives of the Poets" to the "Quarterly Review." While admitting that Johnson never distinguished between rhetoric and poetry, that he exalted art and talent above Nature and enthusiasm, and that he placed at the head of our poets those who belonged essentially to the second rank, Professor Collins holds that, within certain limits, Johnson's judgments are not merely sound, but almost infallible. Mr. Sturge Moore writes on "William Blake, Poet and Painter"; Mr. Warwick Bond on "Ariosto"; and an anonymous writer deals faithfully with "The Poetry of Mr. Alfred Austin." "The Edinburgh Review" has a fine piece of delicate and sympathetic criticism called "Heinrich Heine; Emotion and Irony"; an article on "Religion in Literature," discussing the great Greek dramatists, Shakspeare, Goethe, and some later writers, including Tolstoy; and a biographical article on "Lady Mary Wortley Montagu." "The Library" gives the first instalment of an essay by Mr. Arthur Tilley, on "A Paris Bookseller of the Sixteenth Century—Galliot Du Pré," and a criticism of "The Writings of Oliver Wendell Holmes," by Mr. James Ormerod. Lastly, in the current issue of "The International," we have a discussion of "The Democratic Spirit in German Literature," as seen in such writers as Arno Holz, Max Kretzer, Hauptmann, Henckell, Clara Viebig, and Felix Holländer, by Lily Braun.

Our Land

Edited by

George Radford, M.A.

¶ The first, the February Number of "Our Land," is now ready at all Bookstalls, price 3d. net.

¶ "Our Land" is a monthly journal devoted to the interests of Agriculture and Land in Britain. The central feature will be Co-operation, but Land Tenure, Housing, Taxation, Railway Freights and Local Traction, Sanitation, Purity of Food, Education, and other subjects will be discussed.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.

Scribner's 1908 Magazine

FICTION

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE,
by John Fox, Jr. A strong Serial Story commencing in the January number.

Richard Harding Davis, James B. Connolly, Thomas Nelson Page, will be among the contributors of Short Stories.

ARTICLES

The West in the Orient, by Charles M. Pepper.

Chateau and Country Life in France, by Madame Waddington, the author of the "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife."

Three Articles on South America, by Arthur Ruhl.

ART

ILLUSTRATED ARTICLES dealing with the work of Raphael, Millet, Ingres, will appear month by month.

THE FINEST COLOUR WORK REPRODUCTIONS will appear throughout the year.

On Sale Everywhere. ONE SHILLING.

Annual subscription, 15s. post free, to all parts.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
New York and London.

TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS ST., E.C. Telephone: Holborn 5849.

NOW READY THE JANUARY "BOOK MONTHLY,"
6d. NET. GIVING PARTICULARS OF THE LAST BOOKS OF THE YEAR.

APART FROM THE USUAL FEATURES THIS NUMBER INCLUDES A LONG AND SEASON-ABLE SYMPOSIUM ON JUVENILE LITERATURE
BY FOURTEEN OF THE MOST POPULAR WRITERS FOR THE YOUNG.

Begin the New Year by subscribing to the "Book Monthly," a Specimen Copy of which you can get on application to the Publishers, Simpkin Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS

JUST OUT.—First Edition Nearly Exhausted.
Second Impression in the Press.

IAN MACLAREN'S Last Novel, GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE.

6s.

CAROLINE. A New Novel. By CLEMENTINA BLACK.
Author of "High Treason," etc. 6s.

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF SOCIAL-ISM. By W. H. MALLOCK. Author of "The Vale of the Temple," "Property and Progress," etc. Crown 8vo. 6s.

[Ready next week.

THE FIRST BRITISH AMBASSADOR TO CHINA.

THE LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF GEORGE, FIRST EARL MACARTNEY. 1737—1806.
Governor of Grenada, Envoy Extraordinary at St. Petersburg,
Chief Secretary for Ireland, Governor of Madras, Ambassador Extraordinary to Pekin, Governor of the Cape of Good Hope, etc. By MRS. HELEN H. ROBBINS. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 16s. net. [Ready next week.

A FAMILY CHRONICLE.

From Notes and Letters selected by BARBARINA THE HONBLE.
LADY GREY. Edited by MRS. JOHN LYSTER. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 12s. net.

This book is a history of three generations of Englishwomen; Barbarina, Lady Dacre, well known in social, literary, and artistic circles during the first half of the last century, her daughter, Mrs. Sullivan, and her granddaughter, Lady Grey. It covers a period of about 100 years and includes many reminiscences and unpublished letters from Fanny Kemble, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Lord Lynedoch, Mr. "Bobus" Smith, and other people of interest and note.

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE SECOND AFGHAN WAR. 1878—1880. Produced in the Intelligence
Branch, Army Headquarters, India. Abridged Official Account. With numerous Maps and Illustrations. Medium
8vo. 21s. net.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

A new Monthly Magazine dealing with the Philosophy, Religions, Politics, Literature, Art,
&c., of the East.

ONE SHILLING NET.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

is the only Monthly Review in Europe exclusively devoted to the Eastern World.

FIRST ISSUE ON SALE

At Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Subscription rates, inclusive of postage—

14s. for 12 months; 7s. for 6 months.

If any difficulty in obtaining a copy send to

"THE ORIENT REVIEW,"

Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C

Publishing Office: 27, Chancery Lane, E.C.

The Week in the City.

ON Thursday, greatly to the satisfaction and advantage of the business and manufactures of Great Britain, the Directors of the Bank of England felt themselves in a position to reduce the bank rate from five to four per cent., so that money may now be said to be easier than at this time last year, when the rate was five. The step seems a trifle rash and precipitous when one remembers the number of banking and commercial failures that have lately occurred or are impending in the United States. However, the Directors ought to know, and the return is certainly strong enough to justify them. The conduct of the bank during the last year is much admired, and quite deserves the eulogy passed upon it on Thursday by the City Editor of the "Times." Talking of the "Times" reminds me that the control has not yet passed to Mr. Pearson, of "Pearson's Weekly" and "Daily Express" fame. The matter, I believe, is to be discussed before a judge in Chancery at the end of this month.

GILT-EDGED SECURITIES.

Cheap money has not caused much of a boom in the stock markets. The Americans seem to be exhausted, and even the most sanguine speculators are hardly inclined to attempt to forestall the large investment demand which would be necessary to lift prices substantially. But the combination of cheaper money with large sinking fund purchases has put life into Consols, and a welcome rise has taken place. The only question is whether the Government's old age pension policy and the embarrassments of Irish land purchase may not tempt Mr. Asquith to tamper seriously with the sinking fund. It is to be hoped not, for the improvement of the public credit is greatly to be desired.

OPPORTUNITIES IN CHILI.

I have been hearing from a British resident in Chili, who has returned for a short time on business, a very interesting account of the country. Chili has borne a high reputation among European investors as the only South American Government which has never defaulted. For many years it had a remarkably able and honest administration; but my informant says that there has been a serious deterioration of late. The President is good in intention but rather incompetent, and the country has suffered from want of stable administration. One Government has succeeded another with bewildering rapidity, and foolish measures, particularly in regard to the paper currency, have been adopted. The earthquake was a serious disaster, and the financial strain (which followed) put an end to the speculative boom and the fictitious prosperity that accompanied it. My informant thinks that the well-to-do classes have been severely hit. They have had to curtail their expenses—a very unpleasant task. But the half-caste peasants are quite happy and prosperous; for beans (their staple food) are remarkably cheap this year. The crops have been abundant, and I see that there is expected to be a surplus of 20,000 tons of wheat for export. But nitrate is of course the staple export of Chili. The deposits are vast and practically inexhaustible. Probably the present period of depression, which will only pass away slowly, offers a good opportunity for investors, for most of the securities have been unduly depreciated. But one cannot help feeling a little nervous about a country whose currency, measured in gold, has depreciated about eighty per cent. in a couple of years. There will probably be another Government loan issued in a short time by Messrs. Rothschild.

A JAPANESE BUDGET.

England has invested so enormously in Japanese debt that we are justified in watching very narrowly for a return to normal conditions. Since the war the clever financial department at Tokio has been hard put to it by the dominance of the military and naval faction. All the European shifts have been resorted to—among others the nominal maintenance of a large sinking fund by means of much larger borrowings. This year for the first time a drastic remedy (the only real remedy) is being applied. Severe retrenchment has been ordered, and no less than twelve millions sterling have been knocked off the postbellum programme of extraordinary expenditure on army and navy. Another large reduction has been effected in the projected railway expenditure, with the result that the Budget has almost been made to balance. I should have said that the naval and military reductions involve a saving of four millions sterling for the current year. Nevertheless the military and naval men have not given way sufficiently, and in order to balance the Budget it has been necessary to increase the already high level of taxation by taxes on consumption which are to yield about a million sterling. This has produced an unfavourable impression in the city of London which is anxious to have the credit of Japan rehabilitated and does not see how that can be effected unless our allies can see their way to reducing their expenditure to such an extent that real surpluses can be applied to the extinction of debt. But a good deal has been done, and moreover the emigration difficulties with the United States and Canada seem to have been happily solved.

AUSTRIA AND GERMANY.

Though there has been a heavy crop of commercial failures in Budapest, Austria itself is still very prosperous. Thanks to the fact that the trade boom did not breed speculation in Vienna, and thanks also to the fact that Austria has kept down her expenditure on armaments, she has hardly felt so far the sudden depression in Germany. Indeed, expenditure has been kept within such limits that it has been possible to give considerable relief to the lower classes by a reduction of the sugar duties, though this has probably not made up for the rise in bread and meat prices. However, a Vienna correspondent who is connected with several great manufacturing and commercial concerns, assures me that trade is still very good, and people, he says, are confident that the sufferings of Berlin will not be reproduced in the older capital. In Berlin things seem to be going from bad to worse, and the authorities now estimate the unemployed skilled workmen alone at 40,000. Food prices are higher, I suppose, than ever since the German Empire was founded.

HERR BALLIN AND THE KAISER.

Steamship circles have been occupied with some curious mail reports to the effect that Herr Ballin, the managing director of the Hamburg line, has fallen out of favour with the Kaiser. Hence, it is said, two well known naval officers have resigned lucrative positions under the Managing Director of the Hamburg line. One story runs that in spite of the immense services rendered by Herr Ballin to the company, "his autocratic management and the heavy sumptuary expenses incurred by him simply in order to flatter the Kaiser have provoked much dissatisfaction and severe criticism on the board of administration. The special fittings of the steamer 'Hamburg,' rented by the Kaiser whilst the 'Hohenzollern' was undergoing repairs, were the subject of observations and of the Imperial displeasure, and his Majesty was also not overpleased by the careless condemnation passed on a new sort of screw invented by the Duke of Oldenburg, and the recent incident which led to Captain von Grumme's resignation is stated to have been the last straw."

LUCCELLUM.

PARR'S BANK, LIMITED.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN that the Rate of Interest allowed by this Bank at the Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, on Deposit at seven days' call, is Two-and-a-Half per cent. per annum until further notice.

R. W. WHALLEY, General Manager.

Bartholomew Lane, E.C., 23rd January, 1908.

Investors who wish to be equipped with indispensable information and to possess the most accurate and varied price list of securities in existence, should purchase the DOUBLE NUMBER of the Investor's Monthly Manual.

Just Published.

Price 1/6.

Post Free, 1/9

Apply to the publisher—

3, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.

Ah, fill the Pipe:—what boots it to repeat
How Time is flying underneath our Feet:
Unborn To-morrow and dead Yesterday,
Why fret about them if to-day be sweet!
Omar-Khayyám (modernised).

A Pipe of PLAYER'S NAVY MIXTURE makes

Yesterday a pleasant memory,
To-day a time of sweet enjoyment,
and its anticipation
Tomorrow brings peace of mind and contentment.

SOLD IN TWO STRENGTHS:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

JOHN PLAYER & SONS, Nottingham, will forward Testing Samples post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

0443

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS. SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCHROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

SPECIAL NOTICE TO LARGE BIBLE BUYERS,
CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS, SCHOOLS, &c.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C., are offering 5,000 BIBLES also VICTORIAN PRAYER BOOKS at HALF-PRICE.
ILLUSTRATED BIBLES from 1s.
LISTS SENT POST FREE. TELEPHONE: CENTRAL 329.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF
BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION,
SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindlay at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers
of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

Twopence. Each Friday.

Established 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read
PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics,
Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals, and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy men and women it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen post free on application.

Offices; 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATIONIs NOW READY, and can be had free
on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road.

Miss Tye.

Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE.

E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL.

H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL.

First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL.

Tel.: 0199.

Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL.

S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE.

Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL.

Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street.

Wm. Russell.

Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL.

J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill.

C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE.

Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL.

Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES.

And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street.

Moderate.

Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL.

A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence.

Tel.: 6.

Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL.

Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

*Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.

Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER, B.A., Camb.ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.; NEXT TERM, JANUARY 15th.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Two Entrance Scholarships are offered for competition on April 6th, 7th and 8th, one of £70 a year for Friends under 16, and one of £50 a year for Friends under 14.

These Scholarships are tenable during the whole of a boy's stay at the school.

Further particulars may be obtained from the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School up to March 29th.

EDUCATIONAL.

CO-EDUCATION.ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been Opened for BOYS AND GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters." Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

A Resident Science Mistress is required immediately after Easter
A Graduate or equivalent preferred. Elementary Botany and Practical Biology essential. Salary according to qualifications and experience. Forms of application may be obtained from the Principal, Training College for Schoolmistresses, Darlington.

SHREWSBURY SCHOOL.—The Examination for House Scholarships, including the Old Salopian Scholarship of £70 a year, tenable for 5 years, will be held on Tuesday, March 10th, and Wednesday, March 11th. Apply to the Headmaster.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING.—Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To secure FRIENDS AND FRIENDSHIPS, join the CORRESPONDENCE CLUB, 10/6, and the ENGLISH-SPEAKERS' LINK, 2/6, of 350, Mansion House Chambers, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Jutta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	$\frac{1}{2}$ PAGE.	$\frac{1}{4}$ PAGE.	$\frac{1}{8}$ PAGE.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0
Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:
13 Insertions	8d. per line.
52 "	6d. "

Narrow Column.

An Advertisement drawn by the late H. STACY MARKS, R.A., for Messrs. Pears.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 18.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 621	The Best Children's Books. ... 638
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	By M. J. ... 638
The Future of the Govern- ... 624	"Village Libraries." By ... 639
ment ... 624	A. R. F. ... 639
Sound Principles of Taxation 625	What the Housing Bills ... 639
The Episode of Delcassé ... 626	Should Do. By Murrrough ... 639
A Time Limit and Investors 627	O'Brien ... 639
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	The Rush for Small Holdings. ... 639
A City of God. By Henry W. ... 629	By Frederic Impey ... 639
Nevinson ... 631	The Moral of Mid Devon. By ... 640
How the People Live ... 631	the Rev. R. J. Bond ... 640
Decadence ... 631	"The Mother Confessors." By ... 640
Waterfowl in London ... 632	"A." ... 640
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	"The Scot of the Eighteenth ... 640
A Re-Appearance. By ... 633	Century." By G. W. ... 640
the Abbé Dimnet ... 633	Mr. Campbell's Sermons. By ... 640
THE DRAMA:—	Ernest W. Leighton ... 640
A Study in Drab. By M. ... 634	"A Woman's Charter." By ... 640
MUSIC:—	Emily Tomlinson, Lillian ... 640
Music and Language ... 635	Harris, and Emily Ashton ... 640
ART:—	POETRY:—
The Royal Academy and its ... 635	An Irish Mother. By Percy ... 641
Associates ... 635	French ... 641
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 642
The Child and the Coming ... 636	Books to be Read ... 642
Bill. By "A Clergyman's ... 637	THE PROSPECT IN PARLIA- ... 643
Wife." ... 637	MENT. By C. F. G. Master- ... 643
"Simple Bible Teaching. By ... 637	man, M.P. ... 643
John Evans ... 637	REVIEWS:—
An Experiment in Education. ... 637	Jamie the Rover ... 644
By "Educational Expert" ... 637	Lucretius and Modern ... 645
"British Journalism and the ... 637	Thought ... 645
Anti-Christian Movement." ... 637	The Awkward Age ... 646
By Richard Davey, Robert ... 638	NOVELS OF THE WEEK ... 647
Dell, and Bernard Lord M. ... 638	BOOKS IN BRIEF ... 648
Quillin ... 638	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 652

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

PARLIAMENT was opened in State by the King and Queen on Wednesday. The lengthy King's Speech contained only one announcement of much novelty, that of a coming conference in London to set up a code of maritime law necessary for the guidance of the new International Prize Court. The first place is given to the Licensing Bill, which will be produced after the conclusion of the debate on the Address. The following measures of importance are the new Education Bill, based on an almost universal system of schools devoted to "simple Bible teaching"; Mr. Birrell's two Irish Bills, that setting up compulsory purchase for the grazing lands of the West, which the landlords withhold, and that establishing a new plan of University education, which Trinity College accepts; and Mr. Burns's schemes of Housing and Town Planning, which will be combined in a single measure. No specific reference is made to the House of Lords, but a direct challenge is thrown down by the re-introduction, without change, of the Scottish Land Bill and the Scottish Valuation Bill. The programme is of the first importance and makes an Autumn Session indispensable, while its full execution may probably be deferred to 1909. It will be generally superintended by the Prime Minister, who was kept from attending the House on the opening day by a domestic sorrow. But its active executant must be Mr. Asquith, who has arrived at the opportunity of his career.

* * *

MR. BALFOUR's and Lord Lansdowne's opening criticisms had only one point of seriousness, the promise namely of a formal impeachment of Mr. Birrell's administration and of his and the Government's refusal to revert to coercion. Mr. Balfour's picture of the state of the West was much over-painted, and probably not one member of the Ministerial Party will be deflected from the policy of government by the ordinary law. Ireland will be the subject of the single amendment coming from the Front Opposition Bench, but Mr. Balfour attacked Mr. McKenna's educational administration as "cynically partisan." Here, again, the Opposition meets a united party. All Liberals accept the policy, as stated by Mr. Asquith, of requiring training colleges to accept State conditions as to the free admission of its citizens if they desire maintenance by the State's money. On foreign policy the Opposition leaders professed the principle of continuity, but qualified it largely in the case of the Anglo-Russian Agreement, which is to be criticised on the ground of its inadequate provision for British trade in Persia and British interests on the Persian Gulf. Mr. Asquith's reply was singularly cogent, and more than adequate to the attack. Meanwhile, the Home Rule question is to be raised by a reasoned Irish motion, in favour of an Irish Assembly and a responsible Executive, which we have no doubt the Government will accept. The Nationalists appeared at Westminster as a formally united party, and both Mr. O'Brien and Mr. Healy attended its opening meeting.

* * *

MUCH more interesting was Thursday's debate on unemployment, opened by an amendment, moved by Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, the secretary of the Labour Party, censuring the Government for failing to legislate. It ended in a narrow division, yielding a bare Ministerial majority of 49—195 to 146. The result was due to a combination of Radicals, Labour men, and Irish members, and to a large body of Liberal abstentions. Unemployment is undoubtedly widespread, for a return of six per cent. among the organised workers is unusually large, and it is clear that wages have had an unduly small share of the boom in trade. The Government was ably defended by Mr. Burns and Dr. Macnamara. Mr. Burns and the Socialists are really agreed on the main point, that the remedies for unemployment must be general and indirect, rather than specific and direct, but the tone of the President of the Local Government Board was far too negative. The Government has not fulfilled its pledge of a revised Unemployed Act, it has done almost nothing in the way of afforestation, and it has not even touched the problem of vagrancy, which is free for treatment, and is not covered by the report of the Poor Law Commission. Mr. Burns has exposed some indefensible features of the labour colonies, but he has also discouraged experimental work. He rightly opposed national workshops, and indiscriminate State industries, and thought that relief would come through the Government's land and labour Bills, which would open land and reduce overtime, and through old-age pensions, which would relieve wages. He agreed to mark out some necessitous districts for special relief. Mr. Masterman, in a brilliant speech, said that the Government which shelved unemployment would be shelved by it, and thought that migration from specially congested spots offered the surest remedy.

* * *

THE party of economy has been badly beaten in the Cabinet, and the Naval Estimates will probably show a considerable increase this year, as a preparation for a much larger extension in 1909. This humiliating result probably accounts for the omission in the King's Speech of the familiar formula that the Estimates have been framed with due regard to economy. The prospect in Germany is thoroughly discouraging. The second reading of the revised Navy Estimates and the Naval Bill has been carried in the Reichstag, only the Socialists opposing, the Radicals effacing themselves, and the National Liberals urging a strengthening of the programme of shipbuilding during its later period, from 1912 to 1917. Herr Bebel truly said that the programme had caused a second anti-German reaction in England, to which our own Government has obviously yielded. Admiral von Tirpitz, on the other hand, denied that England was uneasy, and quoted British journals to prove that false proposition. But he strongly disclaimed building against this country or disputing with us the supremacy of the seas.

* * *

THE elections for the new Legislative Council in Cape Colony, to be followed next month by the choice of the Legislative Assembly, promises the long-expected downfall of Dr. Jameson's Ministry and the return to power of the South African Party, formed, like the Orangia Unie and Het Volk, of a combination of Dutch and English elements. The South African Party will probably have a majority of eight in the new Council, the towns being specially unfavourable to Progressive candidates. The choice of the party for Prime Minister has long been informally fixed on Mr. Merriman, perhaps the most brilliant and attractive personality in South African politics, with Mr. Sauer as his chief lieutenant, and there are new and powerful recruits in the persons of Mr. Graaff and Mr. Malan, the editor of "Ons Land." Mr. Malan was largely responsible with Mr. Hofmeyr for the re-constitution of the Bond on lines consonant with the after-war settlement. Dutch South Africa will now be the predominant force all over the sub-continent save Natal. It will consult the country interest and will quite probably be protective. But it will be moderate and thoroughly steadfast to the Imperial connection, though most of the statesmen we have mentioned suffered personal indignities at Lord Milner's hands during the war. A slight diversion has been caused by the re-appearance of Mr. Schreiner, who is a kind of South African Hamlet, but it has not affected the grouping of parties.

* * *

THE Blue Book on the action of the Natal Government towards Dinizulu shows them in full opposition not only to the home Ministry, but to the Governor, Sir M. Nathan, who records his disapproval in strong, though temperate, language. Sir M. Nathan appears to have assented with reluctance to the expedition against Dinizulu; but when it had accomplished its nominal object, he intervened to propose the cessation of martial law, the release of most of the prisoners taken in the "rebellion" of 1906, and a general amnesty. All these schemes of pacification were rejected, Sir Duncan McKenzie, in particular, pressing for a continuance of martial law and the raiding of Zulu territories. Lord Elgin also protested against the maintenance of martial law in the absence of armed resistance to the Crown. The Governor is to visit Zululand, a journey from which, considering his temper and policy, the happiest results may be anticipated. Meanwhile, the publication of the Report of the Native Affairs Commission is an unqualified censure on Natalian policy; while Miss Colenso telegraphs to the "Manchester Guardian" a statement of the "Times of Natal," that 700 natives had "their backs torn to ribbons" during the administration of martial law in 1906, that 4,500 were sentenced to more or less severe floggings, and that during the present expedition many Zulus were flogged by Colonel McKenzie's orders. The nation will want to know whether these are the crimes that the Act of Indemnity has covered. The Natal Premier has been obliged to promise a fair trial for Dinizulu; but, after the revelations of the Blue Book, small reliance can be placed on its good faith.

* * *

THE long-expected debate on Morocco occupied the French Chamber from Friday to Tuesday. M. Jaurès tried to extract a precise declaration of policy from the Government. He pointed out that France had been step by step extending her operations; she was already fifty miles from the coast and she would be led on to Fez, and drift into a war against Morocco which, though successful in the end, would be chequered by defeat and involve for many years a garrison of 100,000 men, a serious weakening of French power. The right course was honest neutrality. France should assist neither claimant to the throne, whether with men or money or sympathy, and she should put an end to the military occupation and return to the original policy of patient, slow, pacific penetration. M. Ribot and M. Deschanel, who represent the Conservative Republicans, and are not a little alarmed by the present situation, also urged neutrality. M. Delcassé intervened with a defence of the policy which had culminated in his own downfall. He had resisted Germany's suggestion of a conference, because, unlike his colleagues, he did not believe in the imminence of a war. Germany saw in the network of alliances and friendships he had built up the passing of her hegemony, and the conference was intended to destroy that network. It had failed to do so. His own aims had been peaceful, though he had sought to liberate France from German tutelage and to reconstitute the international equilibrium in Europe.

* * *

M. PICHON, the Foreign Minister, did not feel called upon to make many pledges after M. Dubief on behalf of the largest section of the Government's supporters, though giving expression to a vague feeling of embarrassment, had refrained from making definite demands. The troops would go neither to Fez nor to Marrakesh, though M. Clemenceau later refused to treat this as a pledge, and the generals would have a pretty free hand. For the present there was to be no Moroccan loan, but no assurance for the future would be given. France would be neutral, but the Sultan she recognised at present was Abdul Aziz, though she might in case of need deal with his successor. In the end the Chamber approved the Government's declaration by the overwhelming majority of 436 to 51. Every section, except the Socialists, voted for it, even the Conservatives, and the Cabinet is free to plunge deeper into the Morocco morass.

* * *

THE Labour Party in Parliament has elected Mr. Arthur Henderson as its Parliamentary Chairman in place of Mr. Keir Hardie, and has chosen Mr. Barnes as Vice-Chairman and Mr. Macdonald as Secretary. Mr. Shackleton, the most powerful and most persuasive member of the new party, was withdrawn from the contest by his work in Lancashire, and after him Mr. Henderson is perhaps its most energetic and representative figure. He is a non-Socialist, but he represents the Left rather than the Right wing of Labour politics, while his two colleagues, Mr. Barnes and Mr. Macdonald, are both declared, though not doctrinaire, collectivists. Meanwhile, the vote adhering to Socialist doctrine at Hull has been weakened by the declarations, published by the "Morning Leader," from secretaries of societies whose delegates voted with the majority without instructions on the Socialist question. It is clear, indeed, that the resolution, which is not new, and was passed at the Trade Union Congress at Norwich, will be inoperative.

* * *

MR. ASQUITH announced on Wednesday that the Government hoped to announce a general agreement between the Transvaal Government and the leaders of the British Indian community on the question of the treatment and status of those subjects of the King. This hope has been fulfilled, and Thursday's papers announced a kind of concordat. The registration offices are to be opened for a resumption of purely voluntary registration, which the Asiatics will now accept, the finger-print method is to be dispensed with in the case of educated Asiatics, and penalties are to be remitted in the case of those who accepted the voluntary system. These concessions leave the main question where it was; both white peoples have agreed to stop all fresh Asiatic immigration. But some regard is to be had to racial pride and religious feeling. The Blue Book exhibits the efforts made by Mr. Morley and, less conspicuously, by Lord Elgin and Sir Edward Grey, to mitigate the severities and indignities of the two anti-Asiatic laws. They were not notably successful. The Transvaal Government promised to try and discover a less degrading form of identification than by finger-prints, if the Immigration Act were allowed to pass. The Act was allowed, but the Ministry were unable to mitigate the plan of identification. But it was promised that ruling Indian chiefs and cultivated Asiatics in general were not to be subject to it.

* * *

THE Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister's annual statement, coming in the midst of the Morocco debate, attracted little attention. Baron von Aehrenthal welcomed the multiplicity of international agreements as lessening friction, and in particular the signs of better relations between England and Germany. The Dual Empire was on good terms with Italy, and he appealed to the Press to assist in maintaining them—a timely demand, coming, as it does, on the top of the recent exchange of broadsides between the bellicose Italian and German journals. But it might profitably have been directed also to the Austro-Hungarian Naval Minister, who has been putting his demand for a bigger navy in none too discreet a form. With regard to Macedonia, Baron von Aehrenthal confessed that the war of extermination between the Christians continues unabated, though Turkish violence has been nearly eliminated. He admitted that Article 3 of the Müritzsteg programme had contributed to the adoption by the Balkan States of the policy of massacre, and gave no credence to the protestations of their Governments. But there was no suggestion that something of the undiplomatic pressure which is so readily applied to Turkey should be extended to the Balkan Governments, though it is obvious that, until this is done, the hands will persist in their devastations.

* * *

THAT barbarous measure, the Polish Expropriation Bill, was sharply criticised on Thursday in the Upper Chamber of the Prussian Diet. Cardinal Kopp, the Prince-Bishop of Breslau, and a personal friend of the Kaiser, denounced it strongly, saying that it furnished a classical example for Socialist expropriation, and that to plead reasons of State for such a Bill was to "affront the conscience of humanity." Prince Bülow answered with cynical coolness. The sole question was whether Eastern Marches were to be German or Polish. Germany could not afford to lose two provinces—one, Posen, only ninety miles from Berlin. The Bill received a good deal of damaging criticism from representatives of the landowning classes, who dislike the compulsory principle, but it will probably pass.

* * *

THE Duma has reassembled, but found little work ready for handling. A religious toleration Bill to carry out one of the promises of the October manifesto has been withdrawn after the Holy Synod had suggested amendments framed in the true spirit of Pobiedonostseff. Probably M. Stolypin feared a conflict with the fanatical Right. The Bill for the reconstruction of the fleet will, it is understood, demand something like £200,000,000 to be spent within the next twelve years. The Government's scheme is opposed by many naval experts as mere wastefulness and by such a reactionary as M. Purishkevitch on the ground that the officials cannot be trusted with the money. The Octobrists, too, have no love for it, but M. Stolypin will push it through and the threat of dissolution will get him his way. The Siberian railway line is also to be doubled, so that a huge loan is certain at no distant date. Meanwhile, nothing has yet come of M. Stolypin's reform programme.

* * *

THE Turks have taken advantage of the internal trouble in Persia to drive Prince Firman Firma out of Suj-Bulak, and to occupy that place. The boundary between Persia and Turkey has never been settled precisely. The map drafted by a Commission in 1865 left a border strip of 20 to 40 miles wide, within which the boundary was to be fixed by agreement, and since then nothing more definite has been done, despite another Commission. Suj-Bulak apparently is Persian in any case, but in pushing their boundaries at the moment a new Commission is at work the Turks are acting according to precedent. The British and Russian Governments have protested, and the Russians are strengthening their frontier force, so that doubtless the Turks will be compelled to retire. The political situation in Persia is still very unsettled. There is something like civil war in Tabriz, and the Parliament is very nervous. The text of the Shah's eirenicon of last December leaves little doubt that the Constitutional differences between him and his Parliament are still open.

* * *

THE "suffragettes" paid a series of rather intrusive morning calls on the private houses of Ministers on Thursday. They sought interviews with Mr. Haldane, Mr. Birrell, Mr. Harcourt, and Sir Edward Grey, but after a prolonged skirmishing with their footmen, were generally foiled by those trained diplomats. Several were arrested and appeared at the police courts on charges of obstruction or annoyance. They were mostly fined, and, refusing to pay, were taken to prison. The Home Secretary, asked to make them first-class misdemeanants, replied that this was a matter for the magistrates to decide. If he has powers of relief, we hope he will use them, for the proceedings of the suffragettes are merely a political game, and have no intent that can be called criminal. Meanwhile, Mr. Asquith, addressing a deputation of women suffragists, has declined to add women suffrage to the Government's programme, on the ground that it had no sort of electoral mandate behind it.

* * *

"OUIDA," whose name was Mademoiselle Louise de la Ramée, died on Saturday at Viareggio. She had quite lost the brilliant vogue of her middle years, and the authoress of "Moths" and "Two Little Wooden Shoes" was little known to this generation. Nevertheless, she was an artist, a title which neither of her two chief successors in the writing of popular fiction deserves. She had sincerity, a real, if rather violent, sense of colour, and could suggest, not without power, what she defined as the common or corrupting sides of luxurious life. Her "Lady Dolly" in "Moths" is a much more powerful satirical portrait than Miss Corelli could ever draw. She was peculiarly sympathetic to children, to Italian peasant life, and to the lot of animals, her fondness for which touched eccentricity. She was excellent as an essayist, dropping many of the exaggerations of her style and writing with insight and knowledge. One of the best examples of her critical work is a singularly compact and sharply drawn portrait of Mr. Chamberlain. Her over-colouring and inaccuracies of detail were brilliantly caricatured by the late Editor of "Punch," in his burlesque novel, "Strapmore."

Politics and Affairs.

THE FUTURE OF THE GOVERNMENT.

It is good for parties, as for individuals, to get to their work, for then they measure difficulties instead of foreboding or dreaming about them. The Ministerial party has reached its critical Session, has before it an ample programme, devoted almost entirely to social reform, has suffered no serious defeat or discredit, and preserves the superficial, and, to a large extent, the essential unity of its overwhelming material force. Even the reverse at Mid Devon produces a counter-acting effect, for, by the paradox of our Parliamentary constitution under democracy, passing defeats at the polls tend, for a period, to prolong the life of Ministries rather than to shorten it. And the check itself has its compensations. No astute Conservative manager can see with pleasure the now certain conversion of Toryism into a purely Protectionist party. Mr. Balfour has doubtless striven, after his fashion, to avert or to minimise that disaster. He has now accepted it, and even bases his leadership on it. In the act, we believe, he dooms himself and his party to exclusion from all but brief and fitful spells of power. Protection does not work out as an economic practice for the people of these islands, and if it will not work it will come to grief even as party tactics. We approve of the intention to restore the machinery of Free Trade agitation to full strength, and we are quite sure that Free Trade will win its second campaign, even though the victory be less brilliant than that of 1906.

The main asset of Liberalism, therefore, remains, but we may need to assure ourselves that the moral strength and the practical energies of the party will be sustained during the coming Session. We have said that the Ministerialists remain united. But there are obviously two strains of thought and temperament in the Parliamentary following. One—the smaller—section has never regarded the result of the General Election as yielding a mandate for a constructive policy of social reform, but rather as an essentially conservative revolt against Protection and an essentially English objection to Mr. Balfour's over-subtle and indecisive temper and his inferior capacity for modern statesmanship. The other and greater section has accepted the verdict of 1906, emphasised by the dramatic appearance of a powerful Labour Party with a semi-Socialistic programme, as a call to action. Our sympathy is with the latter section, for, looking at the state of European politics and the general conditions of party life which the growth and education of the democracy have brought about, we believe that the only chance for Liberalism consists in a vigorous alternative to Imperialism and Protection. There at once duty and interest lie—duty, for the inequalities of life in the modern State are serious, and their physical and moral consequences are written for us in plain letters by our doctors, scientists, school-masters, and social observers; interest, because the people, easily diverted to light-minded courses, needs powerful and sympathetic leadership and readily responds to it.

But a course of democratic reform is not easily initiated or sustained in this country. The social conscience is hard to awaken and soon goes to sleep again.

The timidity of wealth is extreme, and the upper classes in Great Britain have lost the habit of considering, as Mr. Chamberlain once brusquely invited them to consider, that they must make concessions—that in a modern State, based on the popular vote, they must pay "ransom" for great possessions, enjoyed in peace and security. We doubt whether the practice of private munificence in Great Britain is anything like as extensive as it was in Imperial Rome. We are certain that the conceptions of social duty, and of the right of the State to devote a reasonable proportion of acquired wealth to raising the general standard of living, are still more feebly developed. We are glad to see, therefore, that Mr. Churchill has begun to argue these questions out with his middle-class and working-class constituents. They must be discussed, for we cannot ask the middle-classes to go blindly forward even to old-age pensions without convincing them of the propriety of the step. To such an end it is necessary to enlist both moral and intellectual forces, to convince the nation that the extreme degradation of a portion of our people, especially of the unskilled and unorganised workers, is both wrong and impolitic. If we do not, and try to force reforms down the nation's throat, we either embark on the "class war," or we tend to fall back on Mr. Balfour's negative and inhuman formula that the business of a statesman is to look after the production of wealth, and to care little, or not at all, about its distribution.

On one point, we are afraid that the Government, with a certain thoughtlessness that now and then marks it, has placed impediments in its own course. Mr. Asquith is said to have accumulated or provided money enough to supply an old-age pension fund amounting to eight millions at the start. This would be a handsome beginning, and no reasonable workman could quarrel with so large an initial measure of relief of the immense drag on wages, especially the wages of women workers, which the sustenance of the aged poor involves. But how is this fund to be sustained in the future? The Cabinet, we are afraid, have entirely failed to secure a reduction of the Army and Navy estimates. The latter are to be increased, the former will not be sensibly reduced. We deplore this result, because, as we have said, it menaces the stability of an old-age pension fund, gradually increasing as the finances of the country are restored, while it impairs its value and attractiveness to the workmen, who may be called on to pay for their pensions by new taxes on sugar, tea, and bread.

But there is a second reason for regretting the Government's decision to maintain and increase the Navy estimates, a decision whose fruit will assuredly be seen next year in a heavy advance. It brings us perceptibly nearer a conflict with Germany. It is not enough to suggest, as the King's Speech suggests, that the political relationship of the two countries is much improved. That is true, but the fact remains that when the late Government entered on a course of "Dreadnought" building, it opened the race of armaments afresh. The German revised ship-building programme was an answer to that re-opening, and to the French imitation of it. It grew out of the senseless policy of building a fleet so large and powerful that it almost dominated the world. But for that prepossession, we might have paused when we had a fleet so strong that the German Admirals would not have ventured to put to sea against it. But we were not satisfied with that superiority. We must needs go on from strength to strength. Now the failure of the Hague Conference—for failure it is—and our insistence on the right of capturing commercial ships in time of war, further accentuate the veiled and polite but real rivalry of the two nations, and will almost certainly involve a prolonged contest in the building of marine monsters even more powerful than the "Dreadnought." Germany must bear her full share of responsibility for this serious confrontation, and we entirely repudiate Admiral von Tirpitz's suggestion, during the debate on the naval estimates in the Reichstag, that any English journal approves her new naval programme. He may say, as we say, that it represents a work of defence, not of defiance. All statesmen use this language about their national armaments. But it is the acts, not the words, of diplomatists that count, and here are these two countries committed to a long strain on their finances, for ends which are mutually provocative, and yet lack a single ground of policy or interest to excuse resort to them. It will be a grave reflection on the moral strength of a Liberal Government if it suffers final defeat on this question of armaments, and, while our naval security is as absolute as Sir John Fisher declared it to be a few months ago, allows its experts to master it, without any resort to diplomatic methods. The contest in shipbuilding might go on without peril of war if one could be sure that peaceful and sensible statesmen would always be at the head of affairs in England and Germany. But we have no such guarantee; and Herr Bebel was well-advised to warn Germany and Europe that it might suffer a sudden and bloody interruption.

SOUND PRINCIPLES OF TAXATION.

THERE can be little doubt that the reputation of the Government, and its fate at the next General Election, will be determined more by the financial policy it discloses this Session than by any other factor. In placing it in power, the electorate was well aware that many, if not most, of its serious legislative efforts must be thwarted or enfeebled by the hostile action of the House of Lords. But financial reforms are subject to no such ban, and three urgent reforms of our system of national taxation have been imposed upon the Government by as clear a mandate of the people as our electoral method is able to reveal. Whatever may have been the precise pledges which individual members of the Liberal Party may have given to their constituents, none of them would deny the general popular demand for a reduction of expenditure on armaments towards the peace level of 1899, the removal of the war taxes on food and the achievement of the "free breakfast table," and, finally, a revision of our method of taxes upon incomes and property, directed at once to relieve the burden on the poorer classes, and to furnish an advancing public income for the work of social reform. For reasons into which we need not enter here, the Government has felt able to do comparatively little towards fulfilling these expectations in the first two Sessions. This fact serves to give unusual distinction to the approaching Budget. If the Government were prepared to resist the combined pressure of alarmists, contractors, and the services, and to effect a really large reduction of expenditure on the army and the navy, this saving might properly be utilised to secure the second of the financial objects we named, the free breakfast table. The conviction, only too well founded we fear, that the Government is prepared for no such reductions in the services, must give greater urgency to the provision of so large an increase of revenue from the Income-tax or from other new sources as shall enable it make a satisfactory advance in the direction of the other two demands. Though sums not inconsiderable in amount might be obtained by a tax upon site values (accompanied by reduction of the grants in aid), by a reform and an increase of license duties, and by a tax on motor cars, it would be wiser to concentrate upon a further and a bolder graduation of the Income-tax as the largest, safest, and most satisfactory source of an advancing public revenue. We hope that the fears which have impelled Lord St. Aldwyn and his friends to form their Income-Tax Reduction League may be well founded, and that it is the intention of Mr. Asquith to essay the new project of imposing a surtax upon the incomes of the rich.

The necessity for furnishing a new large reliable revenue for education, old age pensions, and other tasks of constructive reform has recently been emphasised by the declared tactics of the vigorous leaders of Tariff Reform. Socialistic theory quite apart, every modern Government is called upon to spend more money in establishing new public services, or in the more efficient performance of old ones. A strong section of the Protectionists, with Mr. Austen Chamberlain and Lord Milner among them, is labouring to commit the Unionist Party to expensive schemes of social reform, to be financed by a system of protective "duties" upon food and manufactures. "The Liberal Government," they urge, "professes its inability to find the money to do these things: we will find the money by making the foreigners pay." It is idle for Liberals to denounce this false form of constructive finance, unless they provide a true one. This true Liberal finance consists in what to the alarmed imaginations of Lord St. Aldwyn and his friends appears a predatory attack upon property. In reality, it is based upon a thoroughly sound distinction between two sorts of income and of property, that which is earned by the output of useful personal energy, skill, and foresight, and that which is not. Earned income, in the shape of wages, salaries, minimum interest or profit, is the only sort of property which is really "sacred," and its sanctity is vouched for by the fact that any attempt to appropriate it by taxation, or otherwise, impairs the incentive of its owner to apply his ability, his labour power, or his savings to the effective processes of production. This is why taxes upon tea and sugar are so injurious. They constitute an attack upon the standard of living of the workers through the purchasing power of the money-wage, and pro tanto diminish the efficiency of labour and production of national wealth. Herein consists the folly of those who urge that every worker should be made to bear some tax, in order that he may contribute his share to the upkeep of Government. Any tax whose incidence is upon a "living wage," or a living rate of profit, or upon any other income commercially necessary to evoke the best use of the skill, labour, or capital its recipient owns, is a truly injurious attack on property, and is, ipso facto, a bad tax.

Conversely, the only sound and safe tax is one which lies on incomes or property which are "unearned," in the sense that they evoke no useful productive energy. It may not be easy to distinguish unearned from earned elements of income, or to ear-mark them for special imposts. But it is safe to assume that all incomes above a certain "reasonable" level contain elements which can be taken in taxation without disturbing any industrial motive or productive operation. Indeed, such an assumption is necessary to any financial statesman who desires to obtain a growing public revenue by honest methods. We regret to perceive in certain Liberal quarters a tendency to disparage the proposal to extend the graduation of the Income-tax by means of a surtax as barren and provocative of evasion. We are hardly surprised that Lord St. Aldwyn, who, when Chancellor of the Exchequer, saw no harm in selling to himself in his public capacity an estate which he owned in his private capacity, should dwell without reprobation upon the probability that gentlemen of England whose incomes may be subjected to higher taxation will practise evasion to so large an extent as to damage the yield of such taxes. But when we find a powerful Liberal organ like the "Westminster Gazette" roundly asserting that a supertax on incomes over £5,000 "would in practice produce friction out of all proportion to its yield," we cannot refrain from wondering by what financial methods reformers so timid would propose to achieve those social changes to which the Liberal Party is committed, and which the most powerful wing of our opponents is prepared to finance by a protective tariff. We do not accept the view that a surtax upon large incomes would be made unproductive by evasion or other friction. It would, of course, involve an extension to the higher incomes of the obligation to make a declaration of income from all sources, which last year's Budget imposed upon the owners of incomes below £2,000, who claimed taxation on the lower level. But this obligation, accompanied by such reasonable checks as are required to defeat the conduct that Lord St. Aldwyn cheerfully anticipates, must be recognised as essential to the constructive finance of the future.

As for the doctrine that the Income-tax is essentially a war-tax, and that it should be lowered in peace in order to be raised in war, there is nothing to support it save what may be termed an historic accident. It is true that we have been driven from unsound indirect methods of taxation on to sound, direct, and more productive methods, largely by the special financial exigencies of war. But is that a reason for reverting to unsound methods, when the unsoundness has once been demonstrated? For ourselves, we are not wedded to the single proposal of a fixed surtax upon incomes above £5,000. We would prefer to see a graded surtax, beginning at £3,000, which would preserve a better continuity in the process of graduation which Mr. Asquith extended last year, and might give a higher yield than a fixed surtax, beginning at so high a figure as £5,000. That considerable difficulties attend this or any other attempt to secure for our public revenue a share adequate to the advancing requirements of sound public expenditure we readily admit. But in our judgment the present Government has been put in office for the purpose of meeting and overcoming such difficulties. The only method of attaining success consists in adopting the cardinal principle that taxes should be shifted from the wages of the workers and the incomes of the struggling members of the middle-class, to those elements of rent, surplus profits and interest, and other "unearned" payments which will bear them without interference with the industrial life of the nation.

THE EPISODE OF DELCASSÉ.

THE world is sentimental over the reappearances of the fallen great. We think almost wistfully of the "might have been," dally with the destiny which we ourselves rejected, and see only the romance of an interrupted career, where formerly we saw its dangers. We are curious, moreover, to scrutinise our leaders out of uniform, and to penetrate to the essential man who once impressed us by his office. The sudden emergence of M. Delcassé from retirement last week moved us all, as the occasional reappearances of Bismarck used to move us. The French Chamber listened to him and applauded, much as the Prussian soldiers obeyed the Captain of Koepenick. Three days later it had realised that he holds no commission, and his words passed over it, like an echo from the past. The secret of the authority of this virile and confident little man was not in any personal magnetism or power of persuasion. The speech which stirred the Chamber so strangely seems thin and unimpressive in cold print. It has none of the mingled wit and passion and largeness of thought of M. Jaurès oration. It lacks the somewhat commonplace wisdom of M. Ribot. Even its appeals to the idea of a great France do not glow with the poetry which a Coppée or a Déroulède would have breathed into them. Its power lay solely in the fact that the man who spoke it had played with Kings like chessmen, gambled with the fate of nations, and faced the risks of war.

M. Jaurès, in the course of his speech, described his adversary as "a man of genius." He deserves the title, for he achieved greatness in the most deadening of all careers, the life of a bureaucrat. Physically insignificant, without magic of speech or personality, his ascendancy, held so firmly for so many years, is by no means easy to explain. He had neither wealth nor family nor achievements behind him when he succeeded M. Hanotaux. He was not like his predecessor, a notable man of letters, and still less was he a formidable parliamentarian. His career had been simply that of a skilful and ambitious journalist, who had won for himself a reputation for thoroughness and good sense. Yet he became at once the indispensable man, and held his office in Cabinet after Cabinet, unshaken by the Dreyfus case or the Church controversy. France allowed him long years to mature his vast projects abroad, while her domestic chiefs came and went in a bewildering procession. Nor can it have been that the country at large realised the importance and the interconnection of the complicated plans which he was furthering. No Minister, in France at least, was ever more secret. He kept his own counsels, and when at the end he found that M. Rouvier had a habit of consulting the leaders of all the Republican groups, from M. Jaurès on the Left to M. Méline on the Right, he withheld the more risky details of his schemes from M. Rouvier, and even, it is said, from M. Loubet himself.

A phrase or two in his own speech gave the measure which he himself applied to his own projects, and it is a just standard of comparison. Bismarck, with all the prestige of three triumphant wars behind him, succeeded in creating the Triple Alliance, and fastened on Europe that Prussian hegemony, which still boasts that nothing shall happen the world over without the consent of Berlin. It was M. Delcassé's pride to have made for France a position no less enviable, without the aid of a Moltke. Fortune to some extent favoured him, when it brought King Edward to the throne, and removed Lord Salisbury from the Foreign Office. To a certain extent he was able to profit by the natural reaction throughout Europe against the ascendancy which Prussia had so long exercised. But even with these admissions, the feat which he accomplished was a work of supreme diplomatic skill. Two years after Mr. Chamberlain had talked of a Pan-Teutonic alliance and bade France to "mend her manners," he had laid the foundations of the entente cordiale. He overcame the secular jealousy between Great Britain and Russia. For the Treaty which Sir Edward Grey was to sign long after his fall, was really the fruit of his influence on Lord Lansdowne. He "debauched" Italy from the Triple Alliance, despite the memories of Papal intrigue and an economic war. He overcame the sensitive pride of Spain, fearful though she was of a risky adventure, and distrustful of her powerful neighbour. Even in Norway and Austria his influence was felt. Convention, of course, still requires him to say that in all these ententes and rapprochements there was no "point" directed against Germany. In a sense that is true. Had Germany been content to see the world's affairs arranged without her consent, she would have been left undisturbed. The coalition menaced none of her acquired rights; it only challenged her hegemony. The "pen" into which she was hemmed was a safe place to lie quiet in; it confined only her movements. There came a moment when Germany realised her isolation and determined to break the circle. We do not know as yet the whole story of those anxious closing months of 1905. We only know that Germany demanded an international conference to settle the affairs of Morocco, and that M. Delcassé refused. We only know that the inspired German Press demanded the dismissal of M. Delcassé, and that when he fell, Herr von Bülow was made a Prince of the Empire. The people of the Rhine valley tell tales of mobilisation orders and preparations on the railways. Rumour speaks of an ultimatum, and we ourselves are left conjecturing what part our own fleet so nearly played in the catastrophe which M. Rouvier's good sense averted. M. Delcassé fell, but his work has been solid and durable. The Moroccan complication, indeed, is far from a settlement, but the grouping of the European Powers which he conceived still subsists, and Sir Edward Grey and M. Pichon have only pursued the course marked out for them by Lord Lansdowne and M. Delcassé.

As an achievement in the technique of diplomacy, this performance of M. Delcassé was doubtless a masterpiece. The technical critic can only say of him, that in the end he was intoxicated by his own success. If he really believed that Germany would not have dared to declare war, he misread the national character. If he thought that such a war could have ended happily for France, he forgot, as the "Temps" puts it, to create the army which his diplomacy required. But in the judgment of history, the brilliancy of the craftsmanship will not excuse the egoism of the aim. It was a great conception to unite the two Liberal democracies in a close and lasting friendship. It was unlucky workmanship which based this friendship on the repudiation of our pledges about Egypt, and balanced this repudiation by sanctioning the Moroccan ambitions of the French Colonial group. A Liberal alliance is ill founded which rests on the subjection of two immature peoples. In form, moreover, this compact vitiated the principle of the Concert of Europe. There is no security for the world's peace save in the development of a conception of international solidarity, which makes all bargains in territorial and national rights dependent on the sanction of all the civilised Powers. The manners and motives of German diplomacy were ill adapted to win sympathy.

The Kaiser's pandering to the Mohamedan reaction, the intrigue for the possession of Casa Blanca, the brutality of the official Press, the manifest desire to humiliate France, the refusal to accept her concessions with grace—all this detracted from the foundation of reason which there was in the German case. But in so far as she said that two Powers ought not, by an act of barter between themselves, to dispose of the fate of a country over which they possess no exclusive rights, Germany had a sound basis for her protests. M. Delcassé had not behaved as "a good European," and his procedure involved a reactionary conception of international right.

There may come a time when it will be possible to organise a Liberal "bloc" in Europe, and to group the progressive peoples against a reactionary Power, as parties are grouped in Parliament. But the mechanism of such a coalition will not be that which M. Delcassé used. He had a certain moral sanction behind him. He took advantage of the alarm and jealousy which every democracy feels at the spectacle of a great military Power planted in the centre of Europe, poisoning its politics with the Bismarckian virus, setting the pace in the race of armaments, and encouraging the reaction abroad, as she lives by repression at home. But the means which he chose have in practice contributed more powerfully to the perpetuation of this reaction than any other diplomatic adventure of our generation. The first effects of his policy of "isolation" were felt in Germany itself. Throughout the years 1905-6 there seemed to be a powerful stirring against the Prussian domination in Germany itself—against "personal rule," the agrarian clique, and the excesses of Protection and Imperialism. Prince Bülow chose his moment, appealed to the country to reply to isolation by internal unity, and succeeded in the General Election in crushing the Socialists, and enlisting the Radicals in his "bloc." The reactionary Powers of Europe have become more reactionary, the Liberal Powers less Liberal, and the world has watched the hope of disarmament vanish amid the general distrust. M. Delcassé's fall was a fortunate event for the world's peace; his rehabilitation would be an international disaster. His fall, unhappily, could not repair the mischief he had wrought.

A TIME LIMIT AND INVESTORS.

As the intention of the Government to make the enactment of a time limit the central provision of their Licensing Bill becomes evident, it also becomes apparent that the chief danger to their policy is the possibility of a panic among investors. For it is one of the difficulties which the development of modern company finance has added to the complexities of the licensing problem that so large an amount of the capital invested in the liquor trade belongs to thousands of persons whose knowledge of the real conditions of that trade, its social consequences, and the evils which are inseparable from it, is of the slightest. They hold Debentures or Preference Shares in Brewery Companies, or they are interested in Investment or Insurance Companies which hold such Debentures or Shares. They are, many of them, men and women of sensitiveness and refinement, ignorant of the extent or the nature of the evils, their vast and almost incalculable range, which their property creates, but easily reached by the persuasively worded pamphlets of the National Trade Defence Association, or by such productions as the letter in last Monday's "Times" from Lord Burton, Mr. Whitbread, and the Chairman of the Brewers' Society, predicting "grievous injury" to investors and "widespread ruin" to the trade if a time limit is put to licences. Under these circumstances, Sir Thomas Whittaker's powerful and closely reasoned exposition, in the same newspaper, of the true financial effect of a time limit, is as opportune as it is useful.

What is the proposal which has called forth these characteristically energetic and skilful efforts on the part of the trade to shake the nerves of the investor? It is that the State shall be free, at the end of, perhaps, fourteen or fifteen years, to regulate the retail sale of liquor without regard to any other considerations than that of the welfare of its subjects. What stands in the way of that freedom at present is the existence of a monopoly in the hands of private individuals. That monopoly is the creation of the State. It could be extinguished next month without a line of legislation, by the grant, at Brewster Sessions, of licences to all applicants, or by the resumption of the policy which was actually carried out for a few years with regard to beer, under the Act of 1830. Or it could be extinguished by the immediate repeal of the compensation clauses of the Act of 1904, followed by the refusal of the Local Authorities to grant any licences except as new licences, subject to the monopoly value clauses of that Act. No one, of course, would suggest the adoption of the former alternative, though it would be strictly legal to do so, and the legal possibility of such a course is not without its bearing on the controversy. The latter alternative would be welcomed by thousands of well-meaning enthusiasts, but no responsible Government would propose it, and no House of Commons would sanction it. It would be neither statesmanlike nor just; it would create universal confusion and widespread distress among innocent persons. Dismissing these impracticable methods of realising what is desired, the problem remaining is how to attain it by means which will create the minimum of financial disturbance and individual hardship. It can be attained either by a system of State purchase, or by granting to the interests affected a lease of life long enough to enable them to create, out of annual profits, a sinking fund sufficient to provide for their ultimate extinction. The Government, for obvious reasons, have chosen the latter method. What are the interests to be extinguished? They are not the wholesale businesses of brewers and wine and spirit merchants, which will continue after the time limit has expired; they are simply the difference between the value of public-houses with, and their value without, licences. In looking at the arguments of both parties to the controversy, one is struck with the very slight difference between their estimates of the amount of this monopoly value. Sir Thomas Whittaker says that he estimated the value of all the on-licences in England and Wales in 1904 at £125,000,000, and that his estimate has not been challenged by any serious authority. He adds that it must now be reduced in consequence of the subsequent falling-off in the sale of liquor, and the general depreciation of the capital values of securities. Mr. E. N. Buxton estimates the on and off licences as worth £150,000,000. Lord Burton and his colleagues adopt the same figure. It seems, therefore, within the mark to say that when the operation of the reduction clauses of the Act of 1904, amended by the Government Bill, has gone on for another fourteen or fifteen years, the value of the on-licences remaining will not exceed £100,000,000. That sum could be wiped out in fourteen years by the setting aside of an annual sum of £5,467,000, or in fifteen years by a similar annual sum of £4,994,000 invested at 4 per cent.—the average rate of interest paid on Brewery Debentures. This is not a heavy charge to impose on a trade whose total annual turnover is nearly £150,000,000, probably £100,000,000 of which is taken in on-licensed premises. It only means saving a sum equal to 5 per cent. per annum on gross sales, either by better management and cutting down expenses, or by getting it out of the customer through slightly increasing the price or lowering the alcoholic strength of the liquor supplied. Considerable savings in administrative expenses will certainly be obtained by greater concentration and diminished cost of upkeep, as the process of reducing licences goes on. And it is significant that by the testimony of the trade the very considerable additions to its taxation made in recent years have been got back out of the consumer. When Mr. E. N. Buxton was asked before the Royal Commission how taxation was got out of the pockets of the public when the price of liquor was not raised, his answer was: "The pump, or, possibly, lower priced materials."

The "Times" writes of the "permanent value" of a licence as if it were practically a freehold. It falls far short of that, even now, when a statutory right to compensation on its extinction exists under Mr. Balfour's Act of 1904. That measure expressly provided that the compensation should be the difference between the value of the premises licensed and unlicensed "calculated as if the licence were subject to the same conditions of renewal as were applicable immediately before the passing of this Act." These words are often overlooked by Quarter Sessions, but they are none the less of great importance, as showing that even a reactionary legislature recognised that one of the factors to be taken into consideration in determining the value of a licence in the case of a public-house, or a post 1869 beer-house, was the risk it had up to then run of being refused as unnecessary by the licensing authority. We write without information as to the exact number of years which the Government have decided on for their time limit, but on the assumption, which we believe to be a safe one, that it will not be less than fourteen years, there is nothing in it that need alarm any investor in a well-managed and not over-capitalised brewery or wine and spirit business. As to those who have invested in over-capitalised concerns, or in companies which have recklessly bought houses at prices beyond their real value, they cannot expect that the policy of the State shall be deflected from sound lines in order to protect them against the results of their own imprudence.

Lord Burton and his co-signatories argue that the annual charge necessary to create a sinking-fund must be equivalent to such an additional tax as will make it impossible for strictly supervised and controlled houses to compete with clubs, which have no licence duties to pay and have a free hand to make their premises comfortable and attractive. But if clubs are going to do the trade which is now being done in public-houses, it is not the brewers who will suffer. The way to prevent such a result is one which will be received without any enthusiasm by those who sell liquor to clubs, whatever they may say at licensed victuallers' dinners. It is to impose some form of taxation on clubs and to prevent their illegitimate increase by making the existence of, at any rate, new institutions, dependent on the consent of the licensing authority. And this protection against the undermining of their legislative policy the Government will, we imagine, have foresight enough to include in their Bill.

No serious student of the licensing question will deny that the task of legislating upon it is one of much complexity, or that it is attended by grave difficulties. But neither the inherent difficulties of the subject, nor the outcry which is being raised by those who think that their pecuniary interests are threatened, afford sufficient grounds for declining the task. "A gigantic evil remains to be remedied, and hardly any sacrifice would be too great which would result in a marked diminution of this national degradation." These are not the words of a fanatical teetotaler; they are those of the timid and cautious Majority Report of the Royal Commission on Liquor Licensing, signed by every trade member of the Commission. A Ministry which was deterred by the cries of alarmed vested interests from any attempt to deal with an evil thus characterised by the representatives of those very interests themselves, would stand condemned of even greater weakness than the most hostile critics of the present Administration impute to it. It would show itself more regardful of the claims and the fears of money than of the welfare and the character of men.

Life and Letters.

A CITY OF GOD.

BENARES, New Year's Day.

I HAD escaped to the Ganges, as myriads of transitory pilgrims have escaped before. From the distractions of politics and the dust of practical reforms I had come to the quiet river, sliding under immemorial walls. The water was still white and dove-coloured with morning, but already along the thin crescent of the shore, white-robed men and women were coming down the steps with naked feet, and silently approaching the edge. They threw long strings of marigolds into the stream. Stooping down, they scooped up the water in brazen pots, and set a marigold upon the mouth of each. Hung with flowers, and bearing on their foreheads the triple mark of the god, men settled cross-legged upon slabs of stone or wooden platforms, and plunged at once into prayer, or, opening long and narrow books, began to recite aloud the words of inspired ancestors. Men and women alike, still draped in white, walked step by step down into the water, till it passed over their heads, and then came back step by step, and stood dripping in prayer. They raised water in their hands, splashed it three times on their mouths and foreheads, and with arms lifted to the risen sun, poured what was left back into the river. Covering her face with her hands, one girl knelt upon the bare stone so long in adoration, that the sun dried her one white length of sari, and it hung loose around her again.

The common life of the holy city began, and the calling of the milkmen, the cake-sellers, the fruiterers, and drivers of bullock-carts mingled with the temple bells. They brought the dead down to the river, hung with marigolds, and wrapped in cotton cloths as when they lived. Pushing them feet forwards a little way out from shore, they let them soak in the holy water until wooden pyres should be ready to consume their deserted forms, happy in a double purification. Washerwomen brought down their bundles of linen, and swung each piece over their heads again and again upon flat stones in the water, until it was cleansed, with the added advantage of sanctity. Ascetics in brick-dust robes passed up and down among the crowd, bearing long staves in memory of their vow to constrain their thoughts, their speech, and their desires. Other ascetics, dressed only in a transparent coating of ashes, sat in perpetual contemplation, forgetful of the body and the world. One man I saw in faded yellow robe, worn by sun and rain, passing quietly in and out of the worshipping throng, as he followed the little footpath by the water's brink. He was of those who all the year long tread the bank of the Ganges, from her source in the mountains to her mouth among the forest swamps, and back again to her source in the mountains. On that day's walk he happened to be passing again through her most sacred city, but that seemed hardly to interrupt his contemplation of her holiness.

"Yours is the Order I should belong to by nature," I said, giving him a halfpenny, for which he had not asked.

"For you it would be easy and difficult," he answered, in good English, and led me up many steps and along galleries overhanging a cliff of ruinous masonry to a cool courtyard, where Brahmans are daily fed on boiled rice and salt, laid out upon a plate of stretched banana leaves.

"Obviously it would be easy," he went on as we climbed up, after his meal, to the top of the flat roof where a little shelter had been erected for shade and worship; "but for you it would be difficult, because you hang upon the world, and your soul is entangled in illusions and desires. Like all your people, you call the unreal things realities, and for reality you have no name."

Having devoted himself for a while to prayer, he continued: "You see this low parapet? Many years ago a boy was seated upon it reading a Sanscrit book of wisdom, when, it is thought, a monkey, inspired by the god, pushed him, and he fell. Look over and you will see the projecting slab half way down which he broke as he fell. They gathered up his shattered body, and laid it, almost alive, in the Ganges. I cannot doubt that he attained at once to salvation, his soul returning to the universal consciousness, as the space inside a pot returns to universal space when the pot is broken. And in his salvation I may claim a share, for I was his father."

It was noon, and the sun blazed upon the roof. Green parrots flew screaming among the trees of a garden far below us. The hum of the city arose, pierced with loud cries, and over the far-off iron bridge across the Ganges a train was slowly passing with prolonged and shrieking whistle. But still the crowding pilgrims moved down the steps to the water's edge, and bathed and offered flowers, and stretched up their hands in silent adoration, or recited ancient and sacred words aloud.

"It is possible for you," I said, after a long time, "to desire escape from the danger of rebirth, and to speak of being merged in the universal consciousness as salvation. But how about these people who come in millions to the river? All their lives they struggle only to live. From day to day their thought is only to keep alight their little glimmer of life, and hand it on to others that are their children. How is it to be supposed that they come to the river so wearied of existence as to pray only to be saved from being born again? I myself, who am one of them, would walk in the opposite direction if I thought the river was going to extinguish my life, and for choice I should rather be born a mouse than nothing."

"You remind me," he answered, "of those Vishnuites, who pray in great humility, 'Let me be born a cat or dog, if only I may love thee, O God.' It is a great prayer, and you may join in it, for, being a wanderer through the world, you can always hope to become a religious man, avoiding the many-sided degradation of which people tell me who have visited the West. I, too, was once engaged in common business, managing great estates in this very city, and I know the rich men in the streets, though they cannot now tell who passes them so close. But each day I gave much time to contemplation, and I took the vow of kindness to every living thing, just as you see those Jain monks there who are feeding ants with sugar, and would not wittingly kill a cholera germ. By such means, even in your present body, you may begin to penetrate the illusions of existence, and at rare moments may even perceive some gleam from what one of your poets has called the white radiance of eternity."

"As for these pilgrims," he went on, "they are like a woman who lights her cow-dung fire at evening, not considering as she cooks that the flame is composed of ten divisions, each symbolic of a faculty of the soul. Or they are like a man who walks by the light of sun and moon, not considering that sun and moon are nothing but symbols of creative power, as are men and women, fire and water, heat and cold. Or they are like the nautch girls who have a separate song for every hour of the day and night, but do not know that their songs are only the pulses of eternity. In cooking, in the light, and in song, each finds an ignorant joy, and in the same way these pilgrims have a dim sense of righteousness and purification in the outward symbols of truths that they will never learn in their present life. By such means, for a few hours together, they may free themselves from the illusions of existence, and in some cases even reach the state of those highly religious men who devour putrid cats, to prove that in their estimation all material things are alike, all being equally unimportant."

"But for people like you," he continued with pity, "what can one say? You are still ensnared by political anxieties, artistic interests, and by the desires of personality. You have far to go before, by contemplation and hard discipline, you perceive how like harp-iness is to its opposite—how accurately the joy of existence may be compared to a fire-fly wandering in an unlimited vault of darkness, or to the inch of cool shadow thrown by a snake's head upon a burning desert. Till you can reach that supreme state when birth, and life, and death have no separate meaning, you have far to go. But there is always hope for one who will begin by overcoming earthly desire. For, as you may have heard, there has been one being and one alone who in this flesh attained to salvation without death, and he was Ranaka, the father of Sita, Rama's wife. He sat still, you remember, with one hand in a blazing fire and the other upon a woman's breast, showing that to him the one was the same as the other, and both indifferent."

We descended, and I went away in the rapid twilight, sorrowful because I was not in the least like Ranaka. But as I went, I came to the courtyard of a temple to Shiva, the dissolver of existence, and there in the darkness I found a lonely woman walking round and round a sacred tree, driven by the blind desire to bear a child. So untameable among the unlearned is the passion for life.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

HOW THE PEOPLE LIVE.

THE future, we are sometimes told, is wrapped up in the present: the play of contemporary forces provides everything that will create the coming changes; prophecy is, as a matter of sober fact, insight. A few enthusiasts for knowledge are warmed into eagerness by this present: by the mere desire to apprehend, here and now, what is the condition of the world. But to the vast majority of mankind this disinterested desire for pure truth is altogether subordinate to the thirst for the truth which will enable them to anticipate or to modify the business of life. We demand that we may know, in order that we may act. We are concerned with the changes which may come to ourselves, to our children, even to the remoter generations of mankind. "That he values knowledge only as means to social action," Mr. John Morley once boldly declared, "is one of the highest titles to our esteem that any philosopher can have." We ask for knowledge, to-day in a situation more than usually complex and baffling, concerning the actual condition of the people of England: that people which, in Mr. Chesterton's poem, have never found articulate voice, and have always been ruled by the alien, and will finally vanish from history, still silent and uncomplaining and unknown.

Here at least are the people of England to-day, in outward circumstance, as condensed in summary and symbolised in tables of figures in an enormous Government Blue Book issued this week: bearing the forbidding title, "Cost of Living of the Working-Classes." It shows them, gathered into various astonishing cities, labouring for variable wage. It reveals the dwellings in which, for a season, they abide. It follows their wages from production to distribution, in the cost of their daily economy, the manner in which they divide up their exiguous incomes, the amounts they think it worth while to allot to shelter, to food, and to pleasures. It analyses over a thousand "family budgets," each giving details of how much is spent weekly on butter, tapioca, or treacle. It shows the rate of birth and the rate of death: varying from city to city, both materially changing. It gives, in fact—in outline only—that stamped image of a huge and laborious population, whose complete apprehension would furnish the key to most of the pressing problems of to-day.

Here are the homes in which for a season they abide: in part the product of their own volition; more, the creation of external changes which they can but little control. Carlyle was accustomed to picture these forms of habitation as clothes, the garments which cover the life of a people. Swept into aggregations by the demand of the newest industries, the clay and stone has been hastily fashioned into place for human shelter. And now these stand to-day, made by and yet making the temper and characteristic of the people. Here the normal standard is a four-roomed cottage: there "back to back" houses injure the health of their inhabitants; here again huge cliffs of tenements encompass the bewildered inhabitants in a kind of human ant-heap; here the ancient dwellings of wealthy or comfortable classes have been "swarmed out" by the busy people. Carlyle pictured mankind flowing, as it were, through the visionary arena of material things. A wave of humanity beats through these solid constructions; vanishes, another succeeds. "Orpheus built the walls of Thebes by the mere sound of his Lyre. Who built these walls of Weissnichtwo, summoning out all the sandstone rocks to dance and shape themselves into Doric and Ionic pillars, squared ashlar houses and noble streets?" And all cities are built to music. What discordant melody to-day is responsible for the creation of Jarrow or Salford, or Canning Town?

This book reveals three Englands sharply separated; Rural England, Urban England, and London; and the laws and conditions of each are altogether divergent. Everywhere, indeed, this million-peopled, exaggerated London sets at defiance the generalizations drawn from the normal town areas. House rent is immensely higher; the mean weekly price for two rooms in London is six shillings, in the provinces a little more than half; for four rooms the variation is between 9s. in the one, 5s. in the other. Part of this surplus is the booty of more highly paid labour: the greater part, the increased value of the land, heaped up by the mere fact of aggregation, and flowing away into the pockets of many affluent and fortunate persons. Many speculators have ascribed various reasons for the Tory reaction of the later Nineteenth Century: fear of Home Rule, desire for Imperialism, weariness of change. The answer is hidden in these strings and congestions of little comfortable two-storied red and grey cottages, which multiplied with such amazing rapidity in the preceding generation: pushing their tentacles from factory or industrial centre out over the neighbouring fields, and proclaiming with their cleanliness and tiny gardens and modest air of comfort, a working population prosperous and content. "One type of dwelling," says the investigation, "is found to be more or less prevalent throughout the country; that is the small four or five-roomed cottage, containing on the ground floor a front parlour, a kitchen, and a scullery built as an addition to the main part of the house; and on the upper floor the bedrooms, the third bedroom in the five-roomed house being built over the scullery." Here, if anywhere, is concealed the secret of the future of the people of England. Retail prices vary less than rent, and, where variations occur, the causes are obscure. The most remarkable fact of these statistics is the differences in the price of bread, from city to city, and this despite the foreign importation of corn and flour. "The predominant price of the 4 lb. loaf ranged (at a certain date) from 4d. in one town to 6d. in a number of others. The most usual price was 5d., this being returned as the predominant price in twenty-one towns; in ten towns it was 4½d., in two from 4½d. to 5½d., in seven it was 5½d., and in eight it was 6d." These variations, converted into the price of quarters of corn, would signify gigantic divergencies, amounting to more than a quarter of the total. It would seem that some kind of explanation was necessary for this remarkable eccentricity of price in the first necessity of life. The Budgets of the family incomes are extraordinarily suggestive of the struggle which takes place in the submerged regions of the city. Classified according to amount of net receipts, they reveal an ever-growing proportion devoted to the bare necessities of bodily nutriment: until, at the bottom, where the income appears permanently below the "living wage," there is practically no margin left when the food demand is satisfied. "For the incomes below 30s., two-thirds of the total income is spent on food, while in the case of the incomes of 40s. and above, about 57 per cent. is spent.

on food." Amongst the poorest, actually one-fifth of the total food expenditure is spent on bread and flour: a conclusive statistic condemning those who lightly justify a tax on imported corn on the ground that much stale bread is committed to the pig-stye. Tea, in these lowest incomes, demands 9½d. a week, and sugar 8d. It is expenditure on the margin, counted in farthings, a life exceedingly difficult to realise amongst those to whom a few coppers more or less means no appreciable difference.

That most difficult of all economic problems—local variations in wages—though assisted in its ultimate consideration by this collection of raw material, finds no solution in these pages. The common assumption that difference in wages is roughly averaged by difference in prices and rent finds no manner of support when the facts are examined. "The table," so runs this summary, "does not indicate the existence of any close connection between the local variations in the level of rent and prices combined, and the level of the standard rates of wages in the selected groups of occupations, while the relative levels of wages in the different trades of each district show considerable differences." But immediately such accurate facts are collected as this volume assembles, it is questions rather than answers which are excited by them. Nothing is more evidence of the fact that we have hardly commenced in this country to produce anything like an accurate sociology. Why (for example) should Middlesbrough have the highest birth-rate of England? Why, indeed, the cynical might ask, should any children be born in Middlesbrough at all, considering the more than dismal picture which the investigation draws of existence in that feverish industrial centre? There is, again, the evidence of enormous wastage of life force in these appalling aggregations of infant mortality, especially in the factory centres—soiled, wasted child lives, whose existence stands for no intelligible or rational significance in any rational scheme of human affairs. There is the statistic of mortality which shows so many years knocked off human life in the transition from the life of the field to the life of the factory. And there is the evidence here of perhaps the most remarkable and significant change which is operating to-day in modern England: in the tumbling down of the birth-rate with ominous rapidity, until nothing but a similar reduction of the death-rate, with the increase of sanitation and the limitation of disease, seems to stand between the two meeting in a henceforth stationary population. Is the vitality of the race being burnt up in mine and furnace, in the huddled mazes of the city? And is the future of a colonising race to be jeopardised, not by difficulties of over-lordship at the extremities of its dominion, but by obscure changes in the opinion, the religion, and the energies at the heart of the race? These and other subjects confront even a superficial examination of the material condition of England. Karl Marx was wrong in his defiant assertion that economic causes were the sole factors in the transformations of history. He would have been right had he asserted that many startling overturnings of opinion, in political and social, and even ultimate religious change, can ultimately be traced back to the economic condition of obscure masses of the common people.

DECADENCE.

PERHAPS the best feature in Mr. Balfour's Cambridge address on "Decadence" was the tentative spirit in which his suggestions were put forward. In truth nothing is more characteristic of the immature state of general sociology at the present day than the tendency to discuss questions for which the evidence, if available at all, has not by any means been put into shape. We are accustomed to hear people asking whether the world at large grows happier or better; whether there is material progress; whether there are signs of racial deterioration, long before they have even made up their minds what progress is, or in what deterioration would consist. Mr. Balfour himself does not seem to have thrown much light upon this preliminary question, but he takes it for granted that just as societies grow and expand, and come to full maturity, so in course of time they decay, and finally meet with destruction, either from within or from without. Both processes he is inclined to regard as quite normal.

By way of explanation he made somewhat ingenious application of an idea which Weissmann has applied in biology. Weissmann suggested that the death of the organism is of positive advantage to the growth and development of the germinal tissue which does not die, and applying this idea, which even in biology is perhaps little more than a fancy, Mr. Balfour suggests that the death of nations may similarly be of advantage to the advance of general civilisation. We have no more warrant for the suggestion in this form, in sociology, than for the Weissmann theory as a serious account of the origin of death; but if Mr. Balfour means that only one nation as it decays hands on the torch to another, that one civilisation begins where another left off, or at any rate starts in the race with the advantage of the ground which its predecessor has already won, we may agree with him. This, however, is by no means to say that there is any advantage in decay as such. There seems no reason for going beyond the common-sense truth, and decay is only useful when a structure has become so wooden and solidified as neither to grow itself nor make room for the growth of anything else.

Mr. Balfour is also, we agree, on the right track, when he declines to explain decadence by particular historical events. Great catastrophes seldom or never were responsible for the fate of nations. The Western Empire would have survived the mistake which admitted the Gothic army within its boundaries, if the Roman Empire had retained a fourth part of its pristine vigour. The French monarchy did not fall through any one of the mistakes of Louis XVI., or even, roughly speaking, through all of them combined. It would be far truer to say that the mistakes were made because the monarchy was already falling. But to say so much is by no means to admit that there is any necessary law of decay in the very essence of national life; still less that that law rests upon any biological analogy, or that it rests upon some failure in physiological vigour which exhausts the recuperative power of races. Generally speaking, to explain the deterioration of a people as resulting from the exhaustion of their vital forces is merely to re-state the facts in some obscurer language. All that we can say apparently is that there is a complexity of forces which holds society together, which leads men to co-operate with greater or less energy and more or less mutual understanding to common ends, and that there are also multitudinous forces which make for disruption and decay, which distract social energies, and disturb that harmony of civic life. Of course, too, external enemies would take advantage of domestic weakness. The life of any State is so far similar to that of a physical organisation that it represents a kind of balance between these forces in which the scale is ever swinging to one side or other of the equilibrium points, and if it dips too far may never recover itself.

If we take the classical case of decadence, that which has been most studied by historians, and never with perfectly satisfactory results, the case of Imperial Rome, we can at least see some of these forces at work. We can see, to begin with, how the expansion of the Roman people from a free City-State to a great world power, carries within itself potentiality of disaster. We can see that in this great amalgamation of peoples united under a rule that stretched from the Clyde to the Persian Gulf, and from the Rhine to the African desert, there was not that feeling of community, that singleness of purpose, which in a smaller and more compact race holds it, and leads it on the path of progress. The threat of disruption is palpably present from the earliest days of the Empire, and is excited rather by the powerful mechanism of the bureaucratic machine than by the living will of the peoples themselves. Roman protection assimilated peoples whom it only imperfectly repaid by extending them peace, and a certain measure of civilisation. We cannot see, again, how within the shelter of the Roman peace, a new force grew up, a new religion, which however valuable for the future of the world, drew minds and energies of the best men away from mundane affairs—some to the loneliness of the desert, others to the less profitable controversies of theology. The later union of Christianity with the Empire did indeed do much towards preserving civilisation, and maintaining for the world much of what was best in the traditions of antiquity; but it did not contribute to maintaining the political fabric of Rome. What happened rather was that the one movement which was really vital, the one course which could enlist and concentrate the energies of the best men, far from supporting the political fabric, tended rather to its disruption. The conclusion which seems to emerge from the history of Roman decadence, and on the whole, we think, from the comparison of the most notable instances of the rise and fall of States, is that the intangible and subtle principles that Mr. Balfour desires are to be found, not so much in the physique of races as in the harmony between social order and the thoughts, the feelings, and the enthusiasms of men. In so far as there is a social purpose widely diffused throughout the citizens of a State, inciting them to public effort, and encouraging men to unite, that life is vigorous and healthy, and that State will develop and grow. The institutions which divide class and class, which set interest against interest, which distract thought, clearly contain within themselves the seeds of disruption and decay.

The growth of physical science, of which Mr. Balfour speaks, would indeed be a preservative to modern nations against the irruption of such barbarians as became formidable in the last days of Rome. But it would be of little avail for a modern democracy against a great despotism which should have the full force of modern lethal weapons at its disposal. It is, therefore, not to physical science as such that we should look for a guarantee of the maintenance of civilisation, but rather to the scientific spirit applied to human and social affairs, and inspired by a love of liberty and humanity. In this temper we may endeavour, calmly and rationally, to go to the root of controversy, to supersede debate and doubt, and establish certainty as to the conditions of social welfare. Thus guided, the modern mind may hope to solve the problems that disturb society, and so maintain the unity of that social purpose that keeps civilisation alive and inspires progress.

WATER FOWL IN LONDON.

ONE of the most delightful water pieces in the world is the pond that receives the overflow from the Serpentine. At the far end as we look up the water, the overflow drips or dashes down dark, moss-covered rocks, that gleam with the cool moisture among bamboos and other growth, meeting high over an alley of water that broadens to the main pool at our feet. The sun shines through a gracious rift in the fog, bringing up the velvet of the grass lawns, and the precocious pale green noses of the butter burr, and other foliage of very early spring. A gorgeous mallard, in the full glory of his new plumage, is sailing to and fro, a fleet in himself, to maintain the mastery of his little sea. On the bank nearest us, a duck quacks angrily at him, using all the bad words in her vocabulary to let him know what she thinks of him. A second, more favoured duck, quietly explores the recesses of the finest nesting site in London.

The drake endures the termagant on the bank, so long as she remains among the butter burr. But when, presently, she crosses the water, he pursues her up the meadow and back to her tribune. Later, he catches her in the pool, and, driving at her neck feathers with remorseless bill, forces her to fly off to the Serpentine. Then he sails up the alley to his own duck, and announces that they are alone once more. A very few minutes later, two specks in the blue air, far up towards Kensington Gardens enlarge rapidly to flying ducks that, wheeling in a fine spiral, drop with a splash into the coveted pool. Again the drake in possession propels himself furiously after them, and again and again, as successive pairs arrive. Sometimes he ungallantly attacks the lady, whereupon the drake rises and follows her in her flight, sometimes with equal efficacy and more glory he falls foul of his rival mallard. The fight with endless variants can be seen almost any fine day, even now, a fortnight before St. Valentine's day, and many weeks before a town duck begins seriously to make her nest and raise hostages to the rats.

Poor as is the ordinary bird life of London, this group of water birds is susceptible of delightful study, for many of them live a semi-feral life in our parks. They lighten the gloom of mid-winter, by putting on full early their nuptial finery, which is more striking in the ducks than in nearly every other family of birds. Before the peacock on the bank has more than half regained his train, the tufted pochard, affectionately called the diving duck by his many friends among the people, has emerged from an all-over dinginess into brilliant black and white, the white panelled vividly into his side, and the black iridescent with purple. And from the back of his head hangs down a jaunty tassell, as if he were wearing a smoking-cap of Turkish pattern. His still dowdy consort wears a replica of his old plumage, and marks the extent of the transformation. We are never weary of seeing them swim about together, almost as often under water as above it. Particularly pleasant is it to watch them from some bridge, when the divers can be seen dashing about under water, with all but the velocity of fish, then suddenly popping brilliantly out from the veil that the water had drawn over their beauty.

A quieter scheme of colour is affected by the pintail, now fortunately often to be seen in our parks. The clumsy sketcher soon realises the inimitable grace of the whole contour, from the neck made to look more slender than it is by an artful white line, to the long pointed feathers that complete the sweep of the body. The delicate browns and milky chocolates that take the place of more prominent markings in most other ducks make the colour scheme of the pintail a more lasting delight than that of nearly all the others. Then we have the shoveller that, incredible as it may seem to the uninitiated, generally passes muster as a mallard, with perhaps a little more white on him than usual. He is one of the most luxurious of drakes, never being seen without his plain mate, content to paddle in his wake without asking whither. Their large beaks earn for them the discriminating title of spoonbill. The effective shovelling they do with them makes us wonder why every duck in the lake has not infringed the patent long ago.

The red-headed pochard usually goes among children by the affectionate name of "coppernob." His cloak is a quakerish dove colour, his muffler a brilliant but respectable black, and his bright "carrotty" head always looks as though it had been freshly shampooed and machine brushed, so fiercely stands up each particular "hair" upon it. And his beak has beyond doubt just come from the wheelwright, who has painted it and varnished it with his choicest vermilion. "Coppernob" is a flirt. His muddy-headed wife has much to put up with, so have strange ducks, victims of attentions which their furious lords are powerless to prevent. Like the mallards, the red-headed one has the use of his wings, and it is common to see a distracted drake labouring along overhead, in a vain effort to follow all the turns of the abductor and his fickle lady. Last summer a red-headed pochard settled down at St. James's Park as the accepted mate of a common duck. Two drakelings issued from the union, and they have grown up remarkably handsome hybrids. Instead of the well-known green head of the mallard theirs are a rich plum colour, with a fiery gleam in the high lights, faintly reminiscent of their sire's captivating hackles.

One of the noisiest of our London ducks is the sheldrake. Every now and then a shrill and rapid series of quacks, addressed to his mate, draws the eye to his bright red, beknobbed beak, and his sharply contrasted plumage of chestnut and white and black. He and his mate do not produce in London, or at any rate not abundantly those fluffy spotted ducklings that make merry the solitary coves of the Scottish coast, but his very early spring plumage and his lover-like antics are as wild and natural in our smoky town as the best of the other ducks. The golden-eye is the most grotesque wooer on the lake. Sometimes he seems ashamed of his black head with a white powder puff on each cheek. He throws it right back till it touches the back of his tail, thus bringing into almost ridiculous prominence his snowy breast, which he thrusts under the eye of the seemingly indifferent duck. Then the head comes back from its retreat, and the neck is stretched upward to its extreme height, only as a preparation for a renewed effort to tuck it completely beyond the tail, and to bring the last feather of the breast into view.

There are many other equally interesting ducks to be found in a morning walk through the Parks. We have said nothing of the widgeon, the teal, the common pochard, the ruddy sheldrake, nor of any of the geese that are usually represented. We are inclined to dip beyond the British list, in order to call attention to the American summer duck, and its congener, the mandarin from China. The latter is assuredly the most brightly coloured and quaintly decorated of all the drakes, and the fussy and gallant way in which he marshals his mate about makes him one of the darlings of the lake. He takes kindly to our climate, and in many an English lake-centred wood would make his nest and lead forth his ducklings to the water. So would he grace any farm duck-pond, provided he were not placed in too close proximity to boisterous neighbours, for he is ill adapted for a rough-and-tumble life. With apologies to the ducks, let us also mention the moorhen, whose amatory battles now begin. They fly furiously after one another, thrashing the water with their hanging feet, or run hump-backed on the bank, neck stretched forward and red beak menacing. But, best of all, is to see two cocks that really mean business, facing one another on the water. When they are near enough, they sit back and thrust out before them their long-fingered toes, then dance splashingly up and down on the water, employing very much the same tactics that our gallinaceous birds use. In a few weeks the sequel to their wars will be seen in the shape of jealously guarded nests. They begin the summer betimes.

Letters from Abroad.

A RE-APPEARANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—M. Delcassé was always a man of very few words, who seemed to take quite special pleasure in his taciturnity, and his reappearance the other day does not mean that he is going to interfere more often than he did during the last three years in the daily politics of France. He has never ceased to play a considerable part in the parliamentary action of his "group"—the Radicals—and he will most probably be content with that. On the other hand, the French never take much interest in a dead man or a man supposed to be so, least of all in a politician whose speciality is foreign politics; that is to say, a branch of public affairs for which the average Frenchman has as much aversion as the average Englishman has liking. The Paris papers already say very little about Friday's speech, and when the unofficial German Press have passed their usual belated comments upon the incident, it will become history and nothing else.

But history it will be, and from another standpoint than the trivial everyday curiosity of the newspaper reader. M. Delcassé's apologia is even farther-reaching than it seems. This dramatic incident had two acts—the first being the justification of M. Delcassé by himself, and the second the justification of the present French foreign policy by M.

Pichon; but the latter, like Balaam, spoke more praise than he wished, and though M. Delcassé may not be a scrap more influential to-day than he was yesterday, though his speech may even have been like the seal on his tombstone or like a passing farewell to a policy which he initiated but will never help to carry on again, he appears a greater Frenchman than he had been regarded for three years.

One part of his speech was undoubtedly rash. He repeatedly asserted that the policy followed three years ago had never brought France near a danger of war. "On ne fait pas la guerre à la France parce qu'elle ne va pas à une Conférence." If on meant anybody, the statement might be right, but on, in the case in hand, means nothing if not Germany, and it seems sheer blindness to deny that Germany was within a hair's breadth of declaring war against us. Whether going or not going to the Conference was the gist of the difficulty is another matter, and it is almost a quibble to introduce the Conference as the crux. Everybody knows that the two months' conversation between M. Rouvier and Prince Radolin, or, I should say, between the French and the German Press—for never was the Press raised to the dignity of diplomacy to the same extent before—had only apparently the Conference as its object. The talk was all the time about Algeciras, but "Will you or will you not come to Algeciras?" meant in plain French: "Will you or will you not give up your entente cordiale?" and it was a most fortunate circumstance that the charade was played on two words instead of one.

The real sacrifice of French pride was not the decision about Algeciras, but the sacrifice of M. Delcassé, and that was one of the bitterest humiliations ever swallowed by a country. The other day, when the Left were bringing the House down with applause of M. Delcassé's proud vindication, M. Jaurès stood up and shouted to the Radicals that they were applauding a man for the very thing that they had hooted him for three years before. That was true, but the Chamber were, at that moment, recompensing themselves for having once given in to panic and given up the man without whom they see at present that the panic might have announced a disaster. For the entente cordiale was, beyond doubt, the cause of German discontent, but without the entente cordiale, the German discontent had been a ruse to vent itself in such bullying as might have been unendurable even to a country with André as commander-in-chief and Pelletan as chief admiral. This was powerfully felt by the Chamber on Friday's sitting, and M. Delcassé, the ex-Minister, could enjoy to the full the pleasure of seeing his work appreciated as it deserved. He must have enjoyed it even more while M. Pichon was supplementing what his predecessor had said with the vindication of the present Cabinet.

It is a curious fact that M. Pichon, who is a professional diplomatist, and has been all his life in the career, should be the perfect type of the democratic Foreign Minister, a man who does not take a step without consulting with his colleagues, and submitting his views to the five hundred statesmen in the Chamber; whereas M. Delcassé—once a poor teacher in a provincial school, ushered into foreign politics by the pleasure of a Parliamentary clique—used to be the most reticent of men, and even kept a great deal of what he did or knew from the responsible Premier. M. Rouvier was complaining the other day that whenever he urged him to take the Chamber, or, at least, the heads of the groups, a little more into his confidence, he would answer that the exercise of power requires a degree of secrecy. In the Chamber, he hardly ever committed himself to any definite statement, delivered his declarations with marked and constant reference to his manuscript, and more than once flatly denied to answer M. Jaurès's pressing interrogations.

Gradually the Chamber had grown accustomed to this method, and while M. Pichon was speaking, the applause which welcomed his utterances was the solemn consecration of its results. The France that was speaking through the Foreign Minister's mouth is certainly stronger than the France of three years ago, when M. Delcassé held office; but M. Pichon, throughout his address, seemed to be little more than his predecessor's agent. The policy that he extolled was not his, but M. Delcassé's. He boasted of his agreements with Japan and Siam; but, as the "Temps" pointed out, with quiet cruelty, other agreements with England, Spain, and Italy are the work of M. Delcassé.

Men whom I have known to be the bitterest opponents of M. Delcassé's policy have no other way at present of diminishing his merits than to say that his ideas were obvious, and needed no genius. When satire is reduced to such pleas, it becomes the highest praise. M. Delcassé may have been dangerously blind three years ago to the risks in which he was placing his country, though for these the flexibility of democratic institutions had a ready remedy—the sacrifice of a man. But the man's views were undoubtedly right.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST DIMNET.

The Drama.

A STUDY IN DRAB.

THE daily newspapers contain the cheerful announcement that Mr. Granville Barker has been offered terms for organising a theatre of his own, in the United States, that the offer is so splendid that he is bound to accept it, and that Mr. Vedrenne, his partner in the conduct of our own "intellectual theatre" has been driven back into the circle of the actor-managers. Thus the English drama falls again under the sole control of gentlemen who, for the most part, organise it on the lines and for the reasons that Messrs. Harrod organise their establishment in Kensington. The managers and the critics and the public have so contrived matters that those who regard the drama as a school for the interpretation and criticism of life must, like the early Christians, form societies for themselves, and draw into them those companion souls to whom the common standard has ceased to be attractive. There at least they have a chance of escaping from the crackle of fools' laughter and applause for which nearly every man of organising or mimetic talent associated with the London stage must lie in wait, seemingly content with it, and its material rewards, as the fitting meed of his work.

In this desolate state of the national theatre, it is all the more interesting to observe the kind of dramatic literature which finds favour with the directors of the Incorporated Stage Society. The last production of this society is Mr. Arnold Bennett's "Cupid and Common Sense." The title of Mr. Bennett's play is a bad one, flippant and slight, and, like all journalists, I am prejudiced by a bad title. On the other hand, its subject is very good. It is Money. Money—the thing we all want (it or its equivalents), that makes us all, and mars us all, that no nation, no individual, knows what to do with when he has got it—how to spend it, how to share it. Could there be a more important and suggestive topic? Moreover, Mr. Bennett has observed something of the characters of men who acquire money, and thus obtain the power to shape the outer circumstances of other people's lives. He is acquainted with the agreeable neighbourhood of the Potteries, and there he lays the scene of his play, as of his best-known book. He chooses a family, or rather three families, of middle-class Dissenters, or Wesleyan Methodists, who are all (presumably) occupied in the manufacture of pottery ware. Again an interesting set of figures, which Mr. Jones drew in a play that, slight as it was, promised more than its author has since performed. I did not always recognise Mr. Bennett's portraiture, but as characters in a book or a play are partly people whom an author has known, partly his own dream-children, and partly adaptations from conventional literary or dramatic types, it is absurd to require one man's impressions of character to harmonise precisely with another's. Mr. Bennett looks at this class of Englishman with unsympathetic eyes, and regards their chapels and Sunday schools as mere diversions from their real "business"—the business of getting rich. With many touches, he persuades his audience that their existence is "dismal and illiberal," and yet that they are absorbed in it, and enjoy it. But how does he work out his problem, so far as he suggests a problem, and does not merely offer a number of detached and cynical observations about life? I can best answer that question by a brief sketch of the scheme of the play, if schemed there be.

The Boothroyd family of Bursley (a widower and his two girls) live in the money atmosphere. They spend nothing, save and invest everything. They live in mean rooms, and sit on horse-hair chairs. For diversion the girls discuss the mild love-affairs of chapel society. The father is half a maniac about money. He brutalises his daughters about it, invests it ably, uses it mercilessly, and on the other hand suffers tortures at the idea of spending a shilling on a school treat, and rages like a demon when he hears that his eldest child proposes to make a merciful use of her own fortune in order to save an old friend and fellow-Wesleyan from disgrace. This man, Eli Boothroyd, is cleverly observed, though he is too like the stage miser to be satisfying, and represents, I think, the mid-century type of hard-fisted manufacturer, rather than his modern successor. More subtle is the drawing of his elder daughter, Alice. She derives partly from her father. She is inclined to be "near," and is cool, even fish-blooded, in her love affairs. Here she hovers deliberately between affection for a weak man and regard for a rather strong one, who has her and her father's ideas about money, crossed with an ambition to shine as the local Mayor. More than this she does not want—there, with the chapel and the small round of local shows, and successes, and gossip, lies her life. But she is honest. Her father has forced her into a hard act—the wringing of a rack rent from the father of young Beach, whom she half loves and wholly pities. The rent is a mill-stone round two shiftless necks. It can't be paid if the factory is to thrive, and when Alice and Eli Boothroyd put the screw on between them, the younger Beach forges a bill of exchange, and the father hangs himself. These events make, at least, a thinking being of her. She asserts herself, saves the shallow boy who might have been her lover, and breaks with her father, releasing young Beach with her own money for a new start in Canada. In this business of reparation her blood for a few moments runs quick; remorse, compassion, sense of right, romantic love, the motherly affection that strong women cherish for weak men, the pride of self-knowledge and self-assertion, the conviction that money may be used too basely and cruelly, and that she cannot accept her father's standards about it, look as if they would make a fine creature of her.

What happens then? Well, nothing much happens. Life flows on in Bursley. Alice marries her Mayor, and we learn that she is still thrifty, for, Lady Mayoress as she is, she dusts her own drawing-room on her reception day. Young Beach returns from Canada, with a rich wife from Pittsburg, silly and self-confident, as he was silly and despondent before, and only anxious that Alice should not "tell" about the bill of exchange. A little wave of the old feeling mounts to Alice's bosom and flutters out again, and she goes tranquilly out on her Mayor's arm to receive the Mayoral guests.

Mr. Bennett's artfulness is, of course, rather obvious artfulness. He means to show that average life is built thus. A small flash illumines it; and then, for the most part, it passes back into the grey, the commonplace. The play, therefore, lacks a special theme. Nothing is worked out in it, neither the money-motive (though old Boothroyd is degraded into a lunatic, begging threepenny-pieces from servant maids) nor the love-motive, nor the motive of rescue. The dressing of the piece is kept drab and dull to the end, and the romantic element is thoroughly scorned by an artist who forgets that the play, being shorter than life, and differing widely from the deliberate and expository method of the novel, must deal with dramatic moments and occurrences, must compress them, must show the visible and half-visible currents of character and circumstance, meeting in a shock that powerfully impresses the audience. For they should be made to learn and feel, as their mind and fancy turn to the mimic world of the stage for light on the narrowing circuit of their own days.

Music.

MUSIC AND LANGUAGE.

IN attempting to solve one of the problems of programme music by throwing the text of his poem on a screen, Mr. Herbert Trench certainly succeeded in clearly defining the limits of music. The idea itself was simple. Mr. Holbrooke's music was to interpret the emotional basis of "Apollo and the Seamen," and, perhaps, to heighten some of its descriptive passages, and while the audience was hypnotised by the music it would be set in the right mood to appreciate the poem. The idea seems good, but in practice it did not work for some very good reasons. In the first place, Mr. Trench's poem is too complete in itself. From the first stanza to the last all his command of imagery and verbal colour is bent on creating a sensuous background to the philosophic arguments of Apollo on true immortality. For the achievement of this aim the poet indulges in detached descriptions, which, in the reading of the poem, certainly do create the kind of atmosphere he has desired. No less than thirteen stanzas depict the coming down from the woods of Apollo, "furred like a merchant fine," to the inn where he shares a jug of wine with the seaman, and so on throughout the poem. Music can describe these things in its own way, but it would be a very lengthy business unless the briefest figures and the merest snatches of harmony, in the manner of Richard Strauss's incidental music to "Enoch Arden," were used. That has not been the method of Mr. Josef Holbrooke; nor was it the idea of the poet. On the contrary, "Apollo and the Seamen" is a kind of symphony, and that means the musical illustration of the poem had to be largely abstract. The expression of the mood and the emotion of the poem gave enough material for a programme. Just as Mr. Trench has employed all kinds of specific devices of poetry, so Mr. Holbrooke has been compelled to express himself in the terms of his own art. As a consequence, there is a natural and essential clash.

At the Queen's Hall last week this clash had a very curious effect. In the dimly lit room one saw verse after verse thrown on the screen. Very seldom did the music really describe the stanzas of the poem, and often the slowness of connected musical speech made it necessary that certain of the verses should be held in a state of suspension. The sense of the poem was broken with ludicrous effect, and Mr. Trench's style does not lend itself to this kind of suspension. It is possible that a poem of stanzas that come to a full close might be thus illuminated without destroying the continuity of sense. "The Ancient Mariner" is a case in point, for almost every quatrain of that poem is complete in itself. It stands to reason, however, that the musical illustration could not be at all in symmetrical form, using the term in its most elastic sense. The orchestra would have to adapt itself rapidly to each verse, just as if the poem were being sung or slowly recited. That would be a very different thing from the Trench-Holbrooke symphony. Or a composer could make use of a reciter, as Berlioz made use of recitation in his "Lelio" symphonic-poem, or Grieg in his "Bergliot" music. In such musical treatment, the art of music makes concessions. It is no longer self-contained, as in a symphony, or even in one of Richard Strauss's symphonic poems, but is conditioned to a great extent by the exigencies of the text. But the effect of the speaking voice with music is not good. All kinds of composers have tried that hybrid type of art, and none has really succeeded.

The experiment of Mr. Trench failed, because the wrong kind of poem was illustrated by music in the wrong way. There was no close connection between the two, quite apart from the fact that Mr. Holbrooke chose to take a very militant and grandiose view of Mr. Trench's subtle poem. The problem of whether programme music can be made clearer by a visible and changing text was not even in the way of being solved. All that can be said is that the changing of an illuminated text by magic lantern slides is physically and mentally annoying. The effect of watching the screen produced a mild kind of hypnotic headache, and in the endeavour to grasp the poet's meaning during the brief time that the text remained on the screen, the music was apt to be forgotten, or, if heard, seemed an impertinent interruption. But the bigger question is, Does programme music require such a detailed description? True, there are passages in Liszt and Strauss which have no definite meaning without some kind of textual explanation, and yet suggest that they do express something definite. The attempt to interpret these cryptic utterances is futile, and yet they have no right to exist unless they can be interpreted. The most practical method is to print an explanatory programme, which the audience can read; but Richard Strauss most illogically sets his face against this. Perhaps he instinctively feels that music should explain itself, or should not be so conditioned by some external factor that it requires labelling to be understood. To those who have the musical mind and have been accustomed to walk through life with music always in their brains, it is almost impossible to disconnect music from the emotions and sentiments of life. To these a composer speaks an occult language, and has no need to explain himself as long as he makes his music self-contained. It is only when music in the midst of its own expression suddenly imitates external phenomena and actions that we seek for a key to its language. Mr. Trench's experiment will not supply that key, and, although dogmatic opinions are to be deplored in dealing with questions of art, it may well be doubted if any key should be required. The analogy of the descriptive notes of pictures in a catalogue is generally urged in favour of a detailed programme to music. Certainly the analogy is just, but those who really understand pictures and do not look on them as so many illustrations of stories, do not want the explanations of catalogues. A title is sufficient. What explanation is required of Rembrandt's "A Man in Armour"? It impresses immediately as an imaginative expression of the mystic suggestions of light and shadow. Except for certain passages in which Richard Strauss seeks to imitate phenomena and action does his "Heldenleben" really require an explanation? Not to musical people; and the others do not count. "The Life of a Hero" is sufficient programme, and immediately you feel it is insufficient the composer has lost grasp of the subjective expression which is the basis of all self-contained music, and has employed the art in a secondary manner, that is to say, as the complement of something that is not explained. When composers refrain from that mixed style of objective and subjective expression, there is no need of a detailed programme, and their music gains in strength and beauty.

Art.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY AND ITS ASSOCIATES.

AT the Royal Academy elections last week Mr. George Clausen was raised to the full rank of Academician. Two French artists, M. Dagnan Bouveret, the painter, and M. Mercié, the sculptor, were made honorary foreign members. The vacant Associateship, created by Mr. Clausen's promotion, has been filled by Mr. Charles Sims. The choice of Mr. Clausen and of the honorary foreign members invites but little comment. A more popular election than that of the first-named was hardly possible. As a painter, Mr. Clausen enjoys an enviable reputation, which is the fruit of an art brought to maturity by conscientious endeavour; and the lectures delivered by him as Professor of Painting exhibit a fine and subtle intellect, calculated to increase the respect that is felt for that art. The honour accorded to MM. Dagnan Bouveret and Mercié is not less well deserved. Their names are household words in modern French art. A few months ago rumour was busy with the name of M. Rodin in connection with the appointment of a sculptor to the foreign vacancy, and—although his presidency of the International was thought to be a bar to his acceptance of Academic distinction—there will be some disappointment at his non-inclusion, if only because his election would have provided a sensation. M. Mercié, however, though more orthodox, is an excellent choice.

But in this election the main feature of interest is the success of Mr. Charles Sims. Following on that of Mr. F. Cadogan Cowper on the last occasion, it has a significance that lies outside any question of individual merit. For here, in two successive elections, the ballot has fallen in favour of two men, who, whatever may be their abilities, have not yet had time to do more than cross the threshold of their artistic careers. They are both young men who before the last two or three years were practically unknown. This is in no way to suggest that they do not merit the recognition and encouragement that an associateship confers. On the contrary, Mr. Sims, in particular, has given proofs of a quite exceptional talent in his important "Island Festival" of last year, and his "Land of Nod" of the year before, and in a number of fresh plein air paintings, handled with a surprising mastery, which were shown at the Leicester Galleries some time back. Mr. Cowper has hardly gone as far as Mr. Sims. Before his skilful "Nun" picture in last year's exhibition, he had not accomplished more than might be expected of a clever Academy student. Even this picture, considerable as was its notoriety, was thought by some to be little more than an essay in a precious technique, a demonstration of technical ability, rather than a masterpiece of art. Yet the execution was able beyond the ordinary; and if the work showed less of the imaginative vigour of the "Island Festival," it also had fewer obvious faults. If it did not reach the same heights of expression, it expressed more completely the lesser truths it set itself to illustrate. Mr. Cowper has the makings of a fine painter; Mr. Sims possibly the promise of something greater; and both may be congratulated on their laurels and their luck.

The question, however, that we have to consider in dealing with the Academy's selection is not the art of the new Associates or its future, but their youth. It is many years since men as young as these were chosen Associates, and the policy of the Academy in so choosing them invites examination. It is not a new policy. When the Academy was founded the conception of an Associate was a young painter who gave promise enough to warrant his support and encouragement by the Academicians, to whose ranks he might hope at some future date to belong. In those early days the idea of encouraging young men was paramount in elections to associateships, and it prevailed until well past the middle of the last century. Leighton and Millais were examples of this speedy recognition of talent by the Academic body. But during the last few decades this conception of Associateship has given place to something entirely different. It has come to be believed that the honour is reserved for those painters who have earned it by long and faithful contributions to the Royal Academy Exhibitions. The term of service, the length of time during which artists have been "before the public," has, rightly or wrongly, been regarded as part-qualification at any rate for the distinction. Only in a few cases has this rule of Academic policy been departed from. Young artists who have shown a disposition to resist the Academy, and whose power of resistance has proved formidable, have from time to time been enrolled from motives of prudence. It has always been the Academy's policy to absorb those whom it cannot silence.

In these latest elections, therefore, there are indications of a change, of a return to an older order. We suspect, however, that it will not be regarded with favour by the large group of outsiders who for many years have been waiting their turn. One cannot help sympathising with the men who have exhibited so often in the Academy that they have established a moral right to exhibit there, who have been stimulated to maintain their allegiance by the purchase of their pictures by the Chantrey Trustees, and who have come so near election that its postponement seemed merely a matter of a few months. Theirs may have been a mistaken ambition; but it was based on the assumption that the associateship was the reward of a career of sustained merit, and that while there was life there was hope. If the recent elections indicate the character of the future ones, the vast majority of these old Academy Exhibitors may consider themselves definitely shelved.

Their plight raises the whole question of the Academy Associateship. Why is there not room in the ranks for the twenty or thirty men who deserve this modicum of recognition equally with those who have gained it? To ourselves the thirty-two artists, at present so favoured, seem ridiculously few in view of the levelling-up of talent. The Academy constitution places no limit on the number of Associates. Since 1866 the maximum has been entirely at the discretion of this body. There is nothing to prevent there being a hundred Associates, if need be, except the natural reluctance of the Forty to finding themselves in a minority at the elections at which Associates are privileged to vote. But Associates have not always been entitled to vote at all elections, and there seems no particular reason why, in return for an extension of the Associate list, a compromise on the voting question should not be arrived at. Let the Forty elect to their own sacred circle, and thus preserve its long-cherished exclusiveness. Let the Associates take part in the voting for Associates, and, by virtue of their greater number, obtain a more representative opinion on the merits of the candidates for their ranks. The plan would at least do something to diminish the too high value that is at present placed upon an Associateship, and would sustain the Academy against the charge of injustice to old adherents.

Letters to the Editor.

THE CHILD AND THE COMING BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Now that the education question will shortly be again to the front, it is well to remember that the negligible quantity in the controversy that raged around Mr. Birrell's Bill was the child. "Let it be neither mine, nor thine; divide it." And so it has been, from Solomon's time to our own, and no Solomon is with us now to solve our embarrassments by the strenuous application of the reductio ad absurdum.

Many voice the harlot's cry, "Neither mine nor thine; divide it!" The odium theologicum has nullified every concession and compromise: religion, too often party politics in all but name, is annexed by every writer, speaker, and orator both in and out of Parliament as their own special invention, possession, and monopoly: scurrilous attributions are hurled indiscriminately all round, and the "child is overlaid." But the rigor mortis will not last for ever. We must bury our dead—and what then?

Perhaps Scherer's phrase, "We must accept ourselves as we are," reconciles us to the impossible situation, the real British muddle, in which we are landed educationally; years of debate, many Education Acts, an expenditure of millions, and the resultant—an impasse!

Few understood or had mastered the Education Bill that all discussed so hotly and dogmatically. Experts, cognisant how differently things work out, and how much schemes vary in perception and operation, agreed to differ as to its potential achievements and shortcomings. Belgravia and Mayfair drawing-rooms saw through it at once, decided it was unworkable, ridiculous, and ungodly, "but all you could expect from Birrell, the Atheist!"

Perhaps one of the most curious features of the debate was the line adopted by the Bishops and others towards the Bible; but the Bible, well-named the "Statesman's Manual," will survive being snubbed, ruled out of court, almost put on the "Index," as it was during those heated controversies. Carved on a pillar in the underground prison of the Mamertine in Rome—possibly by the hand of St. Paul himself,—in almost effaced letters, we read, "The Word of God is not bound," so we need not be disquieted overmuch. Charles Gordon's sister—the Miss Gordon of the Letters, whose epitaph might be "Amatrix Pauperum"—spent much time in reading the Bible to the untalented, both old and young, and always without explanation or comment. She shrank from either as almost sacrilege, deeming that the inspiration claimed for the book would find its echo in the listener, and reveal many things not to be taught by flesh and blood. Without endorsing Miss Gordon's view, and acknowledging that the recognition of spiritual truth is mediate, as well as immediate, would not most of us admit that many years of maturity are spent in unlearning the dogmas taught us in our youth? Forgetful even of the etymology of the word, religious instruction does not aim at educating and evoking what is in the child, but too often consists in letting anyone teach anything, anyhow.

The Roman Church, with characteristic wisdom, devotes its best and most highly trained teachers to the education of the young. Monseigneur Dupanloup, when asked the reason of this apparent waste of talent, declared with emphasis the paramount necessity of giving them our best, on account of the all-round demands they made on us—ranging “depuis son âme jusqu’aux cordons de ses souliers.” Massillon’s “Petit Carême” did not cost him as much as teaching a young child, when he was said to follow the example of Elisha, who, in giving life to the Shunamite’s son, “contracted himself to his measure.” May not leaders, both lay and clerical, have still something to learn? Their contention that all religious instruction must be given by teachers in school because no help can be got from parents who are without religion themselves is a condemnation of past systems and points to the necessity of fresh methods of inculcating the righteousness “which exalteth a nation.”

Generations of English parents have been trained in our schools; yet the verdict of Bishops, clergy, and laity, expressed in both Houses of Parliament and on many platforms is—Parents cannot give what they have not got! Why are they without religion? Does not this admission stultify the teaching of the past and drive many thoughtful and spiritually minded souls to secularism as a counsel of despair? One thing is clear. In the event of the failure of Mr. McKenna’s Bill, secularism will remain as the sole alternative. In that event, is it vain to hope that, emancipated from daily teaching, and the financial burden incident to the support of schools, clergy and others will throw themselves with fresh enthusiasm into Sunday Schools, now avowedly, both in town and country, inefficient? A different calibre of teachers, certified to possess the gift, as well as the will to teach; peripatetic catechists, as useful in instructing the country parson as the Catechumens; and a Saturday school made attractive in many ways—especially as qualifying for the annual treats and prizes, would kindle zeal all round and eventuate in a generation of parents to whom the odium of being without religion could not be applied.—Yours, &c.,

A CLERGYMAN’S WIFE.

London, January 27th, 1908.

“SIMPLE BIBLE TEACHING.”

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—If I were the father of a boy in an elementary public school, and found the teacher was teaching any of the subjects referred to by Mr. Picton in his letter, on which public opinion is so divided, I should see that teacher or one of the managers and express my objection to such teaching, considering such subjects beyond childhood, and that it would be better to confine all Bible teaching to conduct and character; also, that if any boy should be put up to ask questions on such subjects, the teacher should tell him it was not a school subject and that he should ask his minister. Such subjects are not in the school syllabus Mr. Picton knows so well.

I think with him that, all things considered, it would be better that the Bible teaching should be left with the churches; it is their proper work, and the Government knows that the people are not yet ripe for secular teaching only.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN EVANS.

6, Park-road, Clevedon, Somerset.

AN EXPERIMENT IN EDUCATION.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The proposals which Sir Sydney Olivier laid before the Jamaica Board of Education on December 17th are of more than local interest. They will appeal to all who are concerned with the higher aspect of our imperial problem. While the United States have been spending men and money freely but methodically in raising the educational status of their own fellow-citizens in Porto Rico, the provision for public education in Jamaica has actually fallen back. The Archbishop of Jamaica, one of the best guides and most devoted friends of the island, admitted this at the meeting to which I refer. “There are fewer people,” he said, “being educated among the working classes in Jamaica to-day than there were in former years. . . . Of the whole population of the island we are practically, as I believe, not teaching more than half the children, and this half spasmodically and irregularly; and what I have said applies largely to Kingston.” The last official returns fully confirm this, giving 81,000 odd children in the school books, for the year 1905-6, as against 83,000 in the year before. As the population is estimated at 806,000, and we must put the child population at a rather higher proportion than in England, a fifth of this, or 160,000 children of school age, is certainly not an exaggeration. Seeing that, in spite of an improvement in the regularity of attendance in the last school year, the average in attendance for the year did not reach 52,000, the Archbishop’s estimate does not err on the side of pessimism.

The period under review—the very years in which the Americans were making such strides in Porto Rico—includes times of great financial distress and one first-class calamity, the hurricane of 1903; but it does not include the earthquake of last winter. The earthquake, indeed, like the Great Fire of London, seems likely to clear away a good deal of debris—material and moral—and usher in a new era of greater strenuousness and prosperity. It has sent Jamaica a new Governor, full of ideas and energy; it has compelled a fresh start in a good many businesses and institutions; it has given the island the support of a substantial loan as well as a public subscription.

The Governor, in introducing his suggestions on December 17th, spoke hopefully of the financial future. Money, of course, as well as public interest are essential for the development of public education. After the hurricane of 1903 the Government were compelled to rehouse a good many schools entirely out of public funds, thus departing from the usual practice of looking to the denominations for the buildings, and paying the too meagre public grant for the support of the teacher. This creates the precedent which, it seems clear, will generally govern the future. “As it should be the policy of the Government,” said Sir Sydney Olivier, “to see that educational facilities are provided, it is quite reasonable that the initial cost of school buildings should be provided out of public funds.” Here the American example is instructive. The first American civil governor of Porto Rico, who in 1900 replaced the military occupation, gave up his summer residence—the palace at Rio Piedras, with botanical gardens attached—as a normal school for the island; and President McKinley ordered that the Customs duties paid in the United States on Porto Rican products should, for the time, be paid into the Porto Rican exchequer for the construction of school houses. This amounted to an average of over a quarter of a million dollars for each of the three years 1901-2, 1902-3, and 1903-4. This one act did more than anything else to convert indifference or hostility to education into enthusiasm, a change represented in figures by an increase of from 21,000 to 41,000 children in average daily attendance. Between 300 and 400 new schools were built in the three years.

In Jamaica there is an actual deficiency of schools, but still more a want of decent and suitable buildings—very few of those in use being built for school purposes—and, of course, since the earthquake, a certain number to be rebuilt altogether. Hence the Governor very rightly puts in the first place the building of new schools with public money. But his second proposal will perhaps be of still more interest to home readers, and will in the end, if successful, affect the character of the schools more profoundly. It is that local bodies should be formed—on the model of the English Local Education authorities under the Act of 1902—with power to raise a rate, and with certain powers of management. He is anxious, on the one hand, to retain the active sympathy of the denominations, and, on the other hand, to secure efficient and stimulating administration from headquarters. The latter, if the Government provides the buildings and continues the present grant, is certain to be enforced. The former is interesting, in view of our own controversies, and more essential in a backward country, where the intelligent and public-spirited laity are more thinly-scattered than at home. The details of the scheme remain to be worked out—the constitution of the local authority, arising probably out of the existing parochial boards; the amount of their control, and, most serious item, the nature and extent of the rate.

The third proposal, which follows immediately from the grant of more public money and local control, is that compulsion should be tried, beginning with Kingston and one or two other populous centres. Here again the Porto Rican experiment is before us. By their general school statute of 1903 power is given to municipalities to enforce attendance between the ages of eight and eleven, and in all cases of those already enrolled at school.

It is to be hoped that Sir Sydney Olivier will carry public opinion with him and stay long enough in Jamaica to see the proposed measures put into effect. I have called attention to American progress in Porto Rico in no invidious spirit. They found there much more leeway to make up than we have in Jamaica. But they are doing it so heartily and generously that we are being left behind; and the first Colonial Power in the world cannot afford that. It is not only in the provision of new schools that they have given us an example; the annual sum spent in maintenance of schools is more than twice the beggarly £60,000 to which for several years the educational budget of Jamaica has been restricted, and the population of Porto Rico is only a million to 800,000 in Jamaica. Money, however, is not everything in education; method is more, and goodwill most of all. One illustration of the two latter factors in the Porto Rican case must suffice. I quote from the last published volume of the U.S.A. Commissioner of Education: "During the summer of 1904 a study trip to the United States was arranged, and 540 Porto Rican teachers spent five weeks in summer study at either Harvard or Cornell University, and one week in travel seeing the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, and Washington. A special act of Congress gave us free transportation on two army transports. Each teacher who joined the expedition contributed one month's salary, and the citizens of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia made up the sum to over $36,000, which paid all the remaining expenses. When we consider that many of the teachers had to make provision for their families during their two months' absence, it is a remarkable sign of their earnestness of purpose that nearly one-half of the entire native teaching body of the island participated in this expedition, and the results for good are easily noticeable in every schoolroom in the island."—Yours, &c.,

EDUCATIONAL EXPERT.

January 20th, 1908.

"BRITISH JOURNALISM AND THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a letter published in your issue of the 18th inst., and signed "A Paris Correspondent." Permit me to observe with regard to it:

First: That my letter in the "Catholic Union Gazette," which displeases that gentleman, was not written by me as "a representative of the Catholic Union," but in my private and individual capacity as a member of that society.

Secondly: That I possess ample evidence in support of my views, to which he takes exception, but that I have at present no intention of publishing that evidence in a newspaper: nor should I do so, in any case, at the bidding of a gentleman who, doubtless for good reasons, withholds his name, and with whom I decline further discussion.—I am, Sir, yours &c.,

RICHARD DAVEY.

200, Ashley Gardens, S.W.

January 23rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. Davey makes the usual excuses of a gentleman who has made statements which he cannot substantiate. I will remove one by signing my name. And I will appeal from Mr. Davey to Mr. W. S. Lilly, who, in the days when I had the pleasure of collaborating with him to a certain extent, was neither an anti-Semite nor a fanatic. Does Mr. Lilly really think that the cause of Catholicism will be served by the importation into England of the anti-Semitic agitation or by reckless and sweeping charges against a whole body of men, for which not a particle of evidence has been produced?

Mr. Davey's accuracy is admirably illustrated by other passages in the article from which I quoted. He says: "Within the past few weeks the Church of France has received a still more staggering blow by the abolition of what remained of the liberty of public instruction." Further on he continues: "The new law states that no priest may open or preside over any school, male or female. . . . M. Theodore Reinach made an attempt to save the Jewish schools from this proscription, and M. Briand put out a feeler in favour of the Protestant schools, but both ministers were outwitted by M. Brisson and his followers."

It would be difficult to compress more errors into so small a space. What Mr. Davey describes as a "new law" which has already been passed is a measure proposed by the Government which has been considered by a commission of the Chamber, but not yet by the Chamber itself, to say nothing of the Senate. The provision prohibiting a minister of religion from being head of a secondary school was inserted by the Commission, and M. Briand, on behalf of the Government, has refused to accept it. M. Theodore Reinach is not a Minister, and M. Brisson, who is, of course, President of the Chamber, has naturally taken no part at all in the matter. Moreover, the measure does not propose to abolish "liberty of public instruction," unless the requirement that teachers in secondary schools shall have a proper qualification is such abolition.

Does Mr. Lilly, as a historian, think that "views" (the word is Mr. Davey's and is exactly appropriate) of this description in regard to matters of fact are likely to be instructive to the members of the Catholic Union?—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT DELL.

Paris, January 27th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I beg to reply to the letter from "A Paris Correspondent" in your issue of the 18th.

What Mr. Davey in the "Catholic Times" doubtless complains of is the unfair way in which reports, often false, of incidents antagonistic to Catholics are given such prominence in the British Press; for instance, a communication appeared in one of our leading journals attributing a most brutal remark to Pope Pius X.—the statement was at once denied, but the "fair" and unbiassed newspaper refused to publish this authentic denial.

Again, one often reads reports in English papers of immorality committed by Catholic priests. Much publicity is always given to such cases, which are tried in their country of origin—and the unjustly maligned priest is triumphantly acquitted. But unbiassed British papers take care not to mention this fact!

One hears much of the anti-"clerical" agitation in France, but never is the infamous remark given which was made by a leading French politician, speaking of our Lord, "Nous l'avons chassé de la cour, des écoles, et nous le chasserons de la France"—"We have expelled Him from the courts, from the schools, and will drive him from France"! I ask your readers, Is this anti-clerical or anti-Christian?—Yours, &c.,

BERNARD LORD M. QUILLIN.

The Constitutional Club, Leicester.

THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In "Early Victorian's" letter on this subject I noticed a slightly inaccurate allusion to "The Fairy Bower." This most charming book was by Mrs. Thomas Morley, née Newman. It had a sequel entitled "The Lost Brooch."

The great difference between "The Fairy Bower" and most other children's books of the period was the touch of life, of individuality, that made every mamma in the background as real and vivid a character as the children in the foreground. It is supposed that Mrs. Morley sketched one aspect of her brother, Cardinal Newman, in the formidable but delightful Mr. Everard.—Yours, &c.,

M. J.

January 22nd, 1908.

"VILLAGE LIBRARIES."To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, "O. M.," asks for suggestions as to books on social or political subjects suitable for village lending libraries. On the former subject I think he would find the following books useful—they are all ones that are in circulation in our library in this village:—

"How to Live," Richard Caton.

"The Courtesy Reader."

"Easy Lessons on Things Around Us."

"First Principles of Cooking," Lady Barker.

"Hints to Girls."

"Industries of To-day."

"Laws of Every-day Life."

"Why Boys Should Not Smoke."

"Industrial and Social Life in the Empire," J. St. Loe Strachey.

"The Little Book of Health and Courtesy."

"Practical Social Science."

"Simple Lessons on Health," Sir Michael Foster.

"Social Economy Reading Book."

"Ten Boys Who Lived on the Road from Long Ago to Now."

"Up From Slavery," Booker Washington.

—Yours, &c.,

A. R. F.

Failand House, Failand, Nr. Bristol,

January 28th, 1908.

WHAT THE HOUSING BILLS SHOULD DO.To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In reference to your article on this subject (January 26th, 1908), may I point out a difficulty not alluded to by you, viz., the reluctance of those who suffer most directly from bad housing to complain, and their anxiety to conceal existing nuisances.

The occupants of insanitary premises are usually weekly tenants. If they complain, or if complaint is made on their behalf (as ratepayers may), or if the sanitary authority condemns the premises, or orders the abatement of nuisances, the lessor of the insanitary premises may either turn out the tenant who has given offence, or may increase the rent to cover the cost of any work ordered by the sanitary authority. This is frequently done. Tenants therefore don't and dare not complain; a bad house is better than none; an increase of rent is nearly as bad as eviction. The interference of other ratepayers, or a visit from the sanitary inspector, is resented and dreaded. A remedy for this would be that in the case of houses condemned or declared to be nuisances by the sanitary authority no rent should be recoverable until they were made fit for human habitation, or the nuisance complained of abated, and no increased rent should be recoverable for those premises for a period of years after the work was done, nor should the occupier be liable to eviction except for non-payment of the rent fixed.

The owner or lessor of the condemned premises should be entitled to require the sanitary authority to purchase the premises, and after notice to the owners of any superior interest, the sanitary authority should become owner of the fee, the price being summarily and finally fixed by an arbitrator with regard to the condition of the premises and their unfitness for habitation, not on the basis of the rental they produced. Municipalisation of town sites would thus be commenced. Food unfit for consumption or injurious to health is seized and destroyed without compensation. Insanitary premises are more permanently dangerous to the community.

If the premises could not be made reasonably habitable, and the nuisance could only be abated by demolition, the owners should not be entitled to any compensation, and the sanitary authority should demolish the premises as soon as it had provided other accommodation for the occupiers. The ground owner who let his land to be made a slum is as guilty as the owner of the slum. In Ireland the condition of the houses of the working classes in towns is worse than in England, but the Act of 1903, which contained, among others, two very useful provisions extending the period for repayment of housing loans, and enabling the Local Government Board to enforce building schemes where the local authority was in default, was not extended to Ireland. Ireland was to be dealt with by a separate Act, and that good intention, like many others for Ireland, has remained an intention.—Yours, &c.,

MURROUGH O'BRIEN.

January 26th, 1908.

THE RUSH FOR SMALL HOLDINGS.To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—During the last two months I have been called upon to speak at meetings summoned to hear an explanation of this Act in the counties of Worcestershire, Shropshire, Cheshire, Lincolnshire, Suffolk, and Yorkshire. Throughout, I have refrained from party politics, and the meetings have been thronged by men and women, including many Conservatives, who have been sometimes present in good numbers. Not infrequently I have spoken at the invitation of Parish Councils composed chiefly of men politically opposed to me but most friendly and kind in personal intercourse. Many come to learn how their interests may be adversely affected, and to these I point out the protection assured to them under the Act. Of course, the majority at these meetings consists of people desirous to hire land and eager to learn if the Act will in truth put them speedily in the way to get it. Of the demand there can be no shadow of doubt. Last week, on the wolds of North Yorkshire, I spoke to men who had tramped six miles through the mist and darkness of the winter's night to hear about the Act, and in every place it appears, it only needs a small bill to be distributed to ensure a crowded and eager attendance.

What all this clearly proves is the urgent need for the Liberal Party energetically to stir themselves to see that not a day be needlessly lost in getting the land. The County Councils have made a start. The one I know most about is Worcestershire, of which I am a member, and at a meeting of the Council on January 20th it was reported that 5,400 acres had been applied for to hire by about 400 applicants, and that 549 acres were applied for to purchase (under the Act of 1892) by about 38 persons. The Council approved a recommendation of the Allotments and Small Holdings Committee to levy a penny rate for the purposes of the Act—so as to have money in hand to pay rent for any land hired, &c.—and it was further agreed that a land agent for the county should be advertised for and appointed as soon as possible, his salary coming out of the management fund sanctioned by the Act. This County Council had previously circulated a description of the Act, called upon Parish Councils to hold meetings to discuss it, and advertised that forms of application for land could be obtained at all the police offices in the county.

I hope other counties have done as much as Worcestershire, where there is the intention on the part of the County Council that the provisions of the Act shall be promptly and fully carried into effect. It is useless to blink the fact that in many counties the Act is being ignored as far as may be safely done, and no real interest or intention exists to provide land for the people asking for it, as they have a right to do.

Under these circumstances, is it not the duty of Liberals in the House of Commons to press upon the Government the necessity for firm and unceasing pressure to secure the proper working of the Act? With Earl Carrington at the Board of Agriculture we may be sure that nothing will be left undone there that Parliament sanctions, but a time may come when a new President might arise less able and less keen, and of less practical knowledge of the subject than Lord Carrington; and then, amidst the pressure of departmental statistics, what more easy than for small holdings to be given a back seat and having to take their chance along with returns and details of swine fever?

It is a serious matter for our party. Men will be grumbling in any case at the unavoidable delay in getting land, and frequently disappointed at the want of buildings and houses which may be supplied by means of the Housing Bill to be soon introduced.

Questions should be put to the Government, returns required from all the county councils, and stiff measures taken without delay to ensure the prompt action of defaulters.

The country people are clamouring to return to the land their fathers have been driven away from, and the retribution will be stern and speedy on any Government or party which, having set its hand to the plough, turns half-heartedly away from the business it has undertaken.—Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC IMPEY,

Chairman of the Allotments and Small Holdings Association.

Northfield, Worcestershire,
January 26th, 1908.

THE MORAL OF MID DEVON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In Mr. Buxton's account of the causes of his defeat I do not see any mention of the strong feeling of disgust and indignation of the great majority of Churchmen caused by the Education policy of the Government.

As an incumbent of twenty-one years' standing in Devon, the last seven of which have been spent in Ashburton, I might be supposed to know something of this. Moreover, any politician must be unwise if he can shut his eyes to the power of the Church when it is aroused.

Now, in this Ashburton contest, it has been called into action in a manner unprecedented so far as I know. As one who throughout the contest has been in touch with more than forty incumbents in the division, and who, through them, has circulated 8,000 copies of a manifesto to Churchmen, a copy of which I enclose, I am in a position to testify that the education question was largely the cause of the victory won by Captain Morrison-Bell. It is acknowledged on all hands that the result was unexpected by the party leaders. They did not know the Church vote was being quietly organised, and that Churchmen were roused to action as never before. The indignation meetings and petitions of 1906 against the Education Bill had great influence at the time, and it was then resolved by hundreds of Churchmen that as soon as the opportunity came they would show their displeasure.

Whatever politicians may say, the Church is a force to be reckoned with, as candidates will discover all over England. If they do not repudiate Mr. McKenna and all his ways, and shake themselves free of Dr. Clifford and his party, they must expect defeat.—Yours, &c.,

R. J. BOND,
Vicar of Ashburton.

January 27th, 1908.

"THE MOTHER CONFESSORS."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The perusal of the first ten lines (while dining alone here this evening) of "Mother Confessors," in THE NATION was quite sufficient to make me lay down the paper, moved by the instant impulse to ask you to convey to the writer of those words at least one expression amongst the many grateful but silent tributes which that delightful picture must surely evoke.

To me the article is a portrait. But if, as we may infer, it depicts a type, how magnificent and cheering the fact!—Yours, &c.,

Aberdeen,

January 19th, 1908.

"THE SCOT OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your reviewer (p. 608) hardly does justice to Buckle, who is treated as an authority by eminent historians, e.g., Lecky. I suggest that it is misleading to call modern collectivist interference with liberty "taking over the ideas of the Scottish Church." The Kirk was blinded by a narrow bibliolatry. The modern secular politics are utilitarian and humane. We do not persecute for witchcraft, or Sabbath-breaking, or heresy. We do not oppose the mitigation of human suffering (e.g., by vaccination or anæsthetics) on the ground that such mitigation is in opposition to a God's laws.

The harmony which your reviewer finds between Culture and the Evangelical party is, so far as it exists, due to the weakening or cowardice of modern orthodoxy.—Yours, &c.,

G. W.

January 26th, 1908.

MR. CAMPBELL'S SERMONS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Many students of Liberal thought will be grateful for your reviewer's admirable remarks upon Mr. Campbell's recent volume of sermons, and will appreciate the service he has rendered in giving a wider constituency to the pertinent criticisms of Father Tyrrell and Dr. Rashdall than can be appealed to by the "Hibbert Journal."

It is a matter for great satisfaction that such well-balanced reviews (and incidentally, one may remark, such deeply religious articles) should so frequently find a place in your journal; they are by no means its least pleasing feature.

Time alone will prove whether Mr. Campbell's wholehearted advocacy of what are known as "New Theology" views can accomplish all that he hopes of them, but it is undoubtedly taking far too superficial a view to regard them as merely iconoclastic in tendency. Opinions may differ as to whether they are not sometimes presented in too polemical a spirit, but that there is much positive teaching of the highest and best kind enshrined therein can scarcely be doubted, and the review in question has rendered a real service by drawing attention to this in a dispassionate way.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST W. LEIGHTON.

Woodford Green,
January 15th, 1908.

"A WOMAN'S CHARTER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I should like to make a few comments upon Mrs. Frederic Harrison's letter, which appeared in your columns last week.

Mrs. Harrison argues that because the militant section of the advocates of Women's Suffrage now seek to gain their ends by unconstitutional methods they will, after having obtained the vote, continue to use unconstitutional methods at subsequent Parliamentary elections, and thus they will increase rather than diminish the much to be deprecated present rowdyism which has recently manifested itself among men, notably at the Mid Devon election.

Such an argument does not hold good. These militant ladies now consider themselves outside the pale of the constitution, and therefore they act unconstitutionally. Give them the vote, receive them within the constitutional pale, and they will become law-abiding citizens.

There is no analogy between the advocates of Women's Suffrage and the Chartists. We are of all shades of political creeds and religious beliefs. We make no shibboleth of the "vote"; we desire it as a means to an end, and that end is our greater freedom.

Grievances we have, many and great. For a list of these I must refer Mrs. Harrison to the literature of the subject obtainable at 25, Victoria Street. Suffice it to say that anyone who has followed Parliamentary procedure must have become aware that Bills relating to women and children are apt to be relegated to the end of the session, and then slaughtered with the innocents. If members in charge of such private Bills had a strong constituency of women behind them they would be more careful as to the lives of these unfortunate Bills.

The high percentage of electors who polled at the last general election was most satisfactory. I believe I am right in saying that it seldom fell below 70, and it even went as high as 92. This does not look as though the vote were despised by those who now possess it; moreover, it is small wonder that a workman should accept a lift in a motor when he has to poll in his dinner hour or after a hard day's work.

Nor does the extension of the franchise seem to have seriously affected morality, since there is a considerable falling off in crime during the past half century. Let us hope, then, that when women have got their heart's desire they will still remain guardians of morality and types of a high ideal.

We wish no war of the sexes, but rather we would that men and women should work together in a congress of peace.—Yours, &c.,

EMILY TOMLINSON,
M.B. Lond., C.S. Girton Col.

January 27th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The general attitude of your correspondent, Mrs. Harrison, is a striking illustration of your admirable article "The Sex War." But the acceptance of masculine ideals is no excuse for ignoring the facts of life. In what way are laws of less importance to women than to men? or, in a democracy, how can any one, either man or woman, have direct power over the making or alteration of laws, except by the vote? Modern conditions have increased women's need of the vote, for the ballot and extension of the franchise have completely altered the conception of the province of the State. Democracy has decided that the State shall not only provide a clear course for the race of life, but that it shall see that the competitors have an equal start and are not unduly handicapped. More and more, therefore, legislation concerns itself with home and family life—always considered women's special province—and with the conditions under which work in factories is carried on, especially when the workers are women.

Still more fundamental in the relation of women to the State is the fact that economic and social conditions register themselves in laws. Any alteration in these conditions requires a change in law before it can become fully effective. Ideas are now rapidly changing, and just as the workers are demanding their rights and not charity, so women are making a similar demand. They are beginning to ask for equal pay for equal work; they are no longer content to be shut out from professions and trades, or to be in the unequal position before the law, so flagrantly evident in the laws about divorce and illegitimate children, and not less so in the Common Law view of husband and wife, which may be summed up in the saying attributed to a husband: "My wife and I are one, and I am that one." While the husband lives the wife is not the legal parent of her child. She cannot even obtain a vaccination order. Unless she has property of her own, or goes out to work, she is entirely dependent on her husband's pleasure for the support of her children and herself. Every working woman can speak of cases where the support given is miserably inadequate, a most disproportionate share of the income being kept by the husband. But as long as the wife lives with her husband, bears his children, toils for unlimited hours in the work of the home, she has no legal power to enforce reasonable maintenance.

National progress requires that women should free themselves from views imposed by others, should learn to think and act for themselves, and should receive the power of impressing equally with men their ideals on the State.—Yours, &c.,

LILIAN HARRIS.

Kirkby Lonsdale,
January 27th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mrs. Harrison is evidently convinced of the worthlessness of the franchise as a weapon against oppression or a means of righting wrongs. Here we have the logical explanation of her opinion that the present agitation for Women's Suffrage is mere waste of energy. She takes a pessimistic view of the average elector, describes vote by ballot as a "mechanical fetish," and immediately proceeds to challenge Suffragists to issue a "Charter," which, without the power to realise it by means of this same "fetish," would simply remain a dead letter.

Further, while inviting women to strengthen their cause by imitating the Chartists, Mrs. Harrison cheerfully remarks that some of the Chartists' famous six points "are still on the Liberal programme, and others are relegated to the background of logical reforms which can wait."

How, then, would the cause of women benefit by a "Charter"?

If there is one lesson which Suffragists have been taught by past experience it is that of the necessity of avoiding distractions, and concentrating on one aim—the vote. Unenfranchised women can no longer dissipate their energies by working for debatable or vague reforms. First get your vote, then use it—for winning your Charter. No will-o'-the-wisp must now tempt women from the sure ground of their undeniably just and moderate demand for Women's Suffrage.—Yours, &c.,

EMILY ASHTON.

Brighton, January 28th, 1908.

Poetry.

AN IRISH MOTHER.

A WEE slip drawin' water,
Me ould man at the plough,
No grown-up son nor daughter,
That's the way we're farmin' now.
"No work and little pleasure"
Was the cry before they wint,
Now they're gettin' both full measure,
And I ought to be contint.

Great wages men is givin'
In that land beyond the say,
But it's lonely—lonely livin'
Whin the childher is away.
Oh, the baby in the cradle,
Blue eyes and curlin' hair,
God knows I'd give a gra'dle
To have little Pether there.

No doubt he'd find it funny,
Lying here upon me arm,
Him that's earnin' the good money
On a Californy farm.
Six pounds it was, or sivin,
He sent last quarter day,
But it's lonely—lonely livin'
When the childher is away.

God is good—no better
And the Divil might be worse,
Each month there comes a letter
Bringing somethin' for the purse.
And the old man's heart rejoices
Whin I read they're doin' fine,
But it's oh! to hear their voices
And to feel their hands in mine.

To see the cattle driven',
And the young ones makin' hay,
'Tis the lonely land to live in,
Whin the childher are away.
Whin the shaddas do be fallin'
On the ould man there an' me,
'Tis hard to keep from callin'—
"Come in, childher, to yer tea."

I can almost see them comin'—
Mary Kate, an' little Con,
Och! but I'm the foolish woman—
Sure they're all grown up an' gone.
That our sins may be forgivin,
An' not wan go astray—
I doubt I'd stay in Hivin,
If them childher was away.

PERCY FRENCH.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

MANY of Mr. J. M. Barrie's admirers regret that since "The Little White Bird" appeared some five years ago, he has given up fiction for drama. We understand that he has now almost completed a sequel to that book, to be called "When Wendy Grew Up." The title suggests the blend of humour and sentiment which is so marked a feature of Mr. Barrie's work.

* * *

MESSRS. CONSTABLE will issue this season "The Making of Canada, 1763—1814," by Mr. A. G. Bradley, a sequel to his previous volume, "The Fight with France in North America." Mr. Bradley traces the formation and solidifying of British rule in Canada to two main causes. The first of these was the successful defence of Quebec and the consequent integrity of the Colony during the American War of Independence, when there was a possibility that Canada might become "the fourteenth State of the Union." The second cause was the influx of loyalists, compulsory or voluntary refugees, from the old Colonies on the termination of the war. It was this movement that changed the character of the country from an almost purely French community into the condition of British predominance which laid the foundation of modern Canada. The book ends with an account of the war of 1812-14, when English and French fought side by side in defence of their common country, and thus put an end to any doubt that might exist concerning their ultimate political assimilation.

* * *

"THE Book: Its History and Development," by Mr. Cyril Davenport, the next volume to appear in the same publisher's excellent "Westminster Series" of technical works, and promises to be by far the fullest account of the evolution of the book in English. Practically no phase of its growth is left untouched, from the primitive rock inscriptions, through the papyrus and vellum rolls and the medieval manuscripts, down to the magnificently printed and illustrated éditions de luxe of our own day. There are separate chapters on such subjects as paper, printing, binding, and illustration, special attention being given to the curious work of the Persian binders, while even such obscure forms of binding as the ancient Irish "cumdachs," or book-boxes, are dealt with. A useful feature will be the very full bibliographies which are added to each chapter.

* * *

MR. CHARLES WHIBLEY has been chosen by the Duke of Rutland to write the biography of his father, the seventh duke, better known as Lord John Manners, the show figure of the young England group, to which Disraeli gave a kind of half distinction, and long a picturesque, but not powerful, figure in the House of Commons.

* * *

THE Fabian Society will shortly issue a pamphlet by Mr. Bernard Shaw, entitled "On Driving Capital Out of the Country," written as a reply to those critics who assert that the growth of Socialism will have the effect of forcing the exportation of capital. The pamphlet is based upon a series of articles which have recently appeared in "The New Age."

* * *

IT seems likely that the education question will be hotly debated in the near future. For those who do not take a partisan view of the subject, a book on "German Education, Past and Present," which is announced by Mr. Fisher Unwin, should prove of interest. It is by Professor Friedrich Paulsen, who occupies the chair of philosophy in the University of Berlin, and is known throughout Germany as a brilliant writer on educational theories. Some of the problems discussed, such as religious instruction and compulsory Greek, have an important bearing on our own controversies.

* * *

LONDONERS will hear with pleasure that Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons are preparing an illustrated volume dealing with London buildings and landmarks, which either have been destroyed in recent years or are now threatened with destruction. Its title is "London: Passed and Passing," and the illustrations are the work of Mr. Hanslip Fletcher, whose feeling for architecture and clever draughtsmanship are shown in the pictures which he contributed to Mr. A. H. Beaven's book on "Imperial London," published some years ago by Mr. Dent.

* * *

M. EMILE VERHAEREN, the famous Belgian poet, shares with his fellow-countryman Maeterlinck the distinction of being one of the very few writers born and living outside of France and employing the French language whose greatness is recognised by the foremost French critics. M. Verhaeren is at present engaged upon a tragedy in prose and verse called "Helen of Troy," which is said to be of marked originality and great dramatic force. There is a rumour that the piece will be produced at the Théâtre-Antoine. "The Dawn," a former play of M. Verhaeren, has been translated into English by Mr. Arthur Symonds.

* * *

WE warmly congratulate our contemporary, "The Bookseller," on its jubilee number, issued this week. The first appearance of "The Bookseller" in January, 1858, marked an epoch in trade journalism. Its editor, Mr. Joseph Whitaker, had, while conducting "The Gentleman's Magazine," been impressed by the many shortcomings of the publishers' trade lists then in existence, and he determined to produce an independent organ which would give full particulars of every book published. With this end in view he established "The Bookseller," which, it is hardly necessary to add, fully realised his ambition, and is now indispensable to all engaged in the trade as well as being of the highest value to librarians and others who wish to keep informed of the newest books.

* * *

THE "Società Internazionale Scientifico-religiosa," of Rome, is bringing out a fortnightly review under the name of "Nova et Vetera." Its lines are those of the well-known "Programma dei Modernisti," published last autumn by the society—an English translation of which, by Mr. A. L. Lilley, is announced. It is the organ of the Roman, as the "Rinnovamento" is of the Milanese, group of Modernists. The first number, which is one of considerable promise, was issued on January 21st. After a remarkable "Vorwort," liberal and, in the true sense of the word, evangelical, it contains an article by Father Tyrrell on the Spiritual, as opposed to the Coercive, Primacy of Rome; a discussion of the alleged Modernism of Cardinal Newman; reviews of M. Paul Bureau's "Crise Morale des Temps Nouveaux," and Signor Pio Molaioni's "Osservazioni di un Solitario"; and, finally, a significant comment on Roman affairs, "Echi Vaticani," by Signor Guglielmo Quadrotta, of the "Giornale d'Italia," which, it is hoped, will form a permanent feature of the review. The subscription, out of Italy, is 10 lire per annum; and the office of publication is 28, Via della Mercede, Rome. We shall be curious to see how soon the staff and readers of "Nova et Vetera" incur the excommunication which has fallen to the lot of the "Rinnovamento."

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Apologia Diffidentis." By W. Compton Leith. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

"Interludes and Poems." By Lascelles Abercrombie. (Lane. 5s. net.)

"The National Church: Essays on its History and Constitution and Criticisms of its Present Administration." By H. Hensley Henson, B.D. With an Introduction by the Rev. J. Llewelyn Davies, D.D. (Macmillan: 6s.)

"Bonapartism." Six Lectures delivered in the University of London. By H. A. L. Fisher. (Clarendon Press. 3s. 6d. net.)

"The Swiss Democracy." By H. D. Lloyd and J. A. Hobson. (Unwin. 6s. net.)

"The Collected Works of Henrik Ibsen." Copyright Edition. Vol. I. With Introductions by William Archer and C. H. Herford, Litt.D., M.A. (Heinemann. 4s.)

"Somehow Good." By William de Morgan. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"Etudes d'Histoire et de Psychologie du Mysticisme." Par H. Delacroix. (Paris: Alcan. 10fr.)

"Le Pacifisme." Par Emile Faguet. (Paris: Société française d'Imprimerie. 3fr. 50.)

"Dette Fatale." Roman. Par Lionel Delsace. (Paris: Perrin. 3fr. 50.)

"Geschichte von Florenz." II. Band. Guelfen und Ghibellinen. Von R. Davidsohn. (Berlin: Mittler. M.13.)

THE PROSPECT IN PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENT has opened very quietly. The atmosphere is appreciably different from that of a year ago. Fresh from the statement in the King's Speech challenging the action of the House of Lords, members then found themselves plunged into a violent debate, with the Leader of the Opposition readily accepting the challenge, in sarcasm, taunt and invective. Last Wednesday the Protectionists, fresh from the Mid Devon "sensational incident," undoubtedly expected some general attack "all along the line." Instead they were subjected to a rather rambling if amiable dissertation on foreign affairs, with only momentary and, as it seemed, stimulated indignation on the Irish cattle driving. Before Mr. Balfour had half finished, all the heart had vanished from the debate. The House of Commons, indeed, sees before it an immense programme of political and social reform. It knows that the harvesting of that programme will mean laborious nights and days. It is settling itself down doggedly to the task—the rather commonplace and not very exhilarating task—of attempting to do its duty. It regards (for the moment) outside discussion as irrelevant. It does not want rambling debates on Tariff Reform or the condition of Ireland or the status of British Indians in the Transvaal. It has been content to drop the constitutional issue between the Houses of Parliament. No one is talking to-day of an early dissolution. Indeed, perhaps the present ingenuous planning of programme for the next three or four years is being overdone. If the House of Lords is once firmly convinced—from the certificate of Ministerial assurances—that no action on their part for this or subsequent sessions will lead to their power being challenged before the electorate, they will probably be able to indulge in an exceedingly pleasant "hay-making" amongst the various items of the Government programme.

The majority to-day—in a word—is content to subordinate all the functions of Parliament to the legislative; and it is prepared to work the machine up to the breaking point. The new Committees will help undoubtedly in a task which would appear at first sight impossible. Everyone recognises that an Autumn Session is inevitable. But even with these two additions, if the Opposition decide to oppose, and no agreement can be formulated as to the allocation of time, the dismal expedients of compartmental closure, alternating with all night sittings, will probably still further justify those who declare that one legislative chamber is inadequate to the needs of four nations and a world Empire.

The Opposition can do nothing except with the co-operation of other parties, or fragments of parties, in the House. They may use the debates as a sounding-board through which to disperse criticism or confidence into the countryside. But with their tiny group of a hundred and fifty, who are not all in regular attendance, they can make no conspicuous impression upon the gigantic Government majority. Interest in this year's session—as a drama—is confined to the question of the cohesion or instability of that majority, and the relations which will prevail between it and the two parties of independence outside—the Irish and the Labour Parties.

The Irish have made one of their remarkable fusions, and once again offer to the House a united front. Mr. Healy, Mr. Dillen, and Mr. William O'Brien have agreed in a co-operation which a few months ago would have seemed a fantastic dream. They are determined to debate the question of Home Rule, and to obtain a definite decision on the subject—for or against—from the members of the Liberal majority. That debate is accepted by the Government, and the resolution will probably be carried by an enormous majority—with some abstentions but few resistances. Outside this vital consideration their attitude towards the Government, and especially towards the Chief Secretary, is one of extreme friendliness. No single member of that "shadow show" of phantoms which have wandered through the Chief Secretary's lodge during the past twenty years—engaged in the impossible work of alien administration in Ireland—has ever obtained the success which Mr. Birrell has obtained in winning the confidence of the Irish leaders.

His simple declaration that he will pass the Irish University Bill or resign is just that guarantee of sincerity which can appeal in that astonishing country more than any rhetoric or plausible promises. And although in Ireland itself hope of substantial benefit from this or any Parliament is well nigh dead, yet in the House itself we may expect to see a ready co-operation between the Irish Party and the Government in attempting solution of a problem which has baffled English statesmen for two generations.

The Labour Party has returned fresh from the sensational evidence of its growth at the bye-elections. It occupies a position of importance quite disproportionate to its numbers in the House of Commons. For most urban members are aware that even if they could not be replaced by Labour representatives in their own constituencies, the hostility of organised Labour might at least ensure that they were replaced—by others. The Labour Party, however, must oppose the Government in some degree—or diminish its prestige. Unless it can reveal itself as more concerned with the welfare of the people than the historic parties, as more advanced in social reform, as more definite in its scheme of social amelioration, it is unable on the platform to justify its position of independence. During the autumn it has been subject to severe criticism, by its allies and by rival aspirants for popular favour, for its docility during the debates of last session. Mr. Bernard Shaw accused it of permanent obedience to the command "On the knee," and Mr. Blatchford contrasted with regret its "correct" attitude with that of the "Suffragettes." It will be compelled, therefore, whether it would or no, to assert itself with some vigour during the session; and (especially on the questions of unemployment and old age pensions) it will probably maintain a simmering criticism of the Government proposals. In Mr. Arthur Henderson it has selected an admirable chairman; and, if the fusion takes place with the Trades Union group and the miners, the party will find itself in a position of considerable power, even in the counting of votes in the division lobbies.

What of the majority? So long as that is faithful to the Government, no possible combination can deprive it of its domination in the House. Certainly at the moment the possibilities of fissure seem remoter than ever before. The work of the Prime Minister for two years—accomplished with almost sensational success—has been to persuade and control this unprecedented instrument of Reform. To-day—if that unfortunate event became a practical necessity—he could hand over the reins to his successor with the consciousness that the work has been almost accomplished. Yet there are one or two difficult questions still to face. The first and most hazardous is the question of Retrenchment. The advocates of economy have hitherto made no kind of effective struggle in demand for reduction of naval and military expenditure. The old fight, which was led by a group of Tory members in the last Parliament, and supported by the whole Liberal minority, seems to have been forgotten. The gradual reduction of the Army expenses to something like the level of ten years ago has been relegated to the region of dreams. Yet it is not impossible that a situation—serious, if not critical—may arise on any direct determination of any large body of members to translate into action those promises of retrenchment, which they have made so freely on the political platform. The new Education Bill is another controversial subject. Members from Yorkshire, from the Eastern Counties, or from Wales, demand a drastic measure of reorganisation. On the other hand, muttered curses arise from members for Lancashire, for East London, or any other districts with a large Catholic population. The "contracting-out" which is anticipated as an integral part of the Bill is certain to be fought by educational experts. Meantime, the hope of the wisest rests in a rally upon Old-Age Pensions; demanding a large and far-reaching measure, which shall be felt as substantially operative in the lives of the poor. The greatest hope—and anxiety—concentrates around the question of finance. That hope demands that all the invective which is being scattered in the name of Income Tax payers, and the immensely vocal influences of great wealth, will not restrain Mr. Asquith from a courageous attempt to bring, by direct taxation, further superfluities of income into the service of a national need.

C. F. G. MASTERMAN.

Reviews.

JAMIE THE ROVER.*

"TO-DAY," wrote a literary causer in the "Pall Mall Gazette" of December 30th last, "was the death day in 1765 of the luckless and worthless Old Pretender, the last male Stuart who was born in Britain." The date was wrong, but no matter. "Luckless and worthless!" So history always argues, and it is a convenient habit in the end if we are to believe in progress. But it does not represent the truth in any strictly or scientifically accurate form, and, in the present case, it works out a little bit severely perhaps for the individual. The Old Pretender suffered for the sins of his fathers. He was by no means worthless. Two admirable monographs have been issued during the past six months to prove that "the king over the water" was, on the contrary, most worthy, too good rather than too bad for a throne, the best pretender that ever was—and they have succeeded. James III. was a throw-back from most of his immediate ascendants, for he was a conscientious, business-like, almost severely moral and respectable person, kind, industrious, and tolerant to a fault, the antipodes of his father and uncle; in short, a perfectly ideal constitutional monarch. There was no incompatibility between him and a British throne. The tragedy of the Old Pretender, we may fairly conclude, was not one of character at all, but a tragedy of a species generally regarded as inferior in intensity of interest or significance, though not certainly in pathos, namely, a tragedy of time and circumstance. The Theatre Royal had no longer a vacancy for an hereditary actor-manager. It was to be run henceforth by a syndicate. The syndicate, of course, was the Venetian oligarchy—a handful of English nobles of highly varied antecedents, who had engineered the revolution, the debt, the war, and the union. They represented a minority in 1688, but their energy reposed upon the important fact that malcontents and old Protestant sympathisers abounded in the land, while the country gentry as a whole put Protestantism (with Church property) and anti-foreign feeling above their loyalty. This explains the defection of the army officers. William's manners, appearance, and special vices were disagreeable to those Englishmen with whom he came into contact. But these were not many. To the multitude he represented an impersonal, scientific frontier against Popery and wooden shoes. James's mistakes, on the other hand, were intensely personal—and intensely human. Living in mortal sin with his ugly mistresses despite the crescendo of pietism that began in him after his second marriage, desiring above all things to propagandise his faith, yet mortally offending the Pope and terrifying the old English Catholics, James's intolerance, blindness, cruelty, and nervelessness have been grossly exaggerated. He was incoherent, no doubt, and luckless, but not wholly worthless. The luck of the Stuarts, commencing with Mr. James Misfortunate, was proverbial, as Killiecrankie, the Boyne, and La Hogue, no less than 1708 and 1715, attest. The explanation of all is to be found in those most effective of all native bogies, Romanism and French influence; and the adroit way in which the enemies of the Stuart House and policy managed to saddle the "pretenders" to their ancestral throne with these night-mares was masterly in the extreme.

And it was done for the most part instinctively. Hero worship itself has discovered no master mind among the Whig chieftains. But they knew what they wanted, and when 1715 came they recognised in George of Brunswick the Doge of their choice. A popular king would have been fatal to Venetian oligarchy. A protector of Protestantism who breathed fire and fury against the French, spoke no English, and never came to Cabinet Councils or made the slightest effort to ingratiate himself in this country, was just what they wanted. Marcus Aurelius himself would have striven in vain against such a combination. James III. was not a Marcus Aurelius, but he was the best man by far that the royal house of Stuart had produced since 1603. In religion and politics he had a good deal of the medieval strain characteristic of his race; but he was merciful and humane, fair-minded to a degree unusual in a monarch, and, for all his foreign training, an Englishman at heart, as he was by birth, though he lacked the peculiar English trait of political opportunism. Yet it is a mistake to say that, could James only have renounced his religion, he might have recovered the throne of his ancestors. So stupid were the tactics of the English Tories, so lukewarm the courage of his titular supporters in England (one-third timid sentimentalists, another third mere bottle-Jacobites), and, above all, so astute the manoeuvres of the Whig junta, that his only real chance of the sceptre was as the protégé of the French king.

The genius of Marlborough was fatal to success through the medium of a French army. The end of the Stuart drama hovers over us from the first rise of the curtain with a tragic irony. The story is one of a process rather than of a catastrophe. The "cause" was foredoomed. But the memory of it is none the less romantic because the ideas, many of them beautiful, which it symbolised are irrevocable. "Green as the unfading pines of the Highland glens, that memory lives for ever." As every night millions of eyes are raised to contemplate the brilliancy of those stars which, though they have been dead for years, still glitter so brightly in the heavens, so for lifetimes, and even for centuries, for good and evil, men see around them things that once were but are no more. The Jacobite episode will long remain one of the brightest constellations in the historic firmament, and will serve to remind us of the truth of George Sand's saying that "Remembrance is the perfume of the soul."

The departments of medieval romance were three: matters of France, matters of Britain, matters of Rome, this last including antiquity, the second Arthur, the first Charlemagne. In the modern world, too, there would seem to be a like number of themes upon which all romance is tending more and more to concentrate—Napoleon, the Stuarts, and Old Japan. There are other romantic matters no doubt; the conquests of Cortes and Pizarro, for instance, the Mohamedan and British conquests of Indostan, Garibaldi, the independence of Hungary and Bulgaria, the first triumphs of Islam, the Northmen in the Mediterranean, the relentless decay of the Romany, the Red Men and the coureurs de bois from the old and the new world. But these matters, however attractive, do not excite quite the same hunger and thirst for multiplication of detail; they tend to become smaller and smaller specks upon the bank and shoal of time. As old, unhappy, far-off things upon which we have no choice but to harp again and again with our stories and our rhymes, they cannot compete with the woes of the Arthurian cycle or the misfortunes of the Jacobites. The story of Mary Queen of Scots—does it not grow the fresher and the younger for the telling? Charles I., a shifty and commonplace man enough at the outset, encounters sorrows so great as to give his endurance an air of almost preternatural dignity; and then, after the Restoration, where shall we find a history so pregnant with the strange vicissitude and sadness of human sequels, and of the grandeurs and miseries of the great, or so suggestive of the formidable part which chance has to play in the current of human affairs as in the grievous and lamentable chronicle of the later Stuarts?

The wind blows east or west, Catharine of Aragon says "yes" or "no," Queen Anne over-eats herself, the Pretender has the measles, and the course of English history is changed "according." Suppose that France and England had not been at peace in 1766 when the Old Chevalier died, or that during the previous half century Berwick (whose defection at the critical moment is something of a mystery) or Saxe, had taken the helm of the Jacobite Party. History has always been such a sycophant. For it is certainly a foolish sycophancy which pretends that things must have always been for the best. See how the successful ones have ever trampled on the slain; the Tudors on the Yorkists, Elizabeth on Mary, William on James II., Orleans on D'Artois; and then how cynical the victors have been—the warming-pan fable and similar tales, kept up for just so long as they would prejudice the vulgar and ill-informed, then quietly dropped. And what an absurd travesty of James is that of Thackeray in "Esmond." Can one help a lurking suspicion that our hereditary distrust of the

* "James Francis Edward: The Old Chevalier." By Martin Haile, with eleven illustrations. Dent. 16s. net.

"The King Over the Water." By A. Shield and Andrew Lang, with nine illustrations. Longmans. 15s. net.

Stuarts was largely a pretext of a sneaking, interested, commercially protective kind—a sham quarrel, a pretence not to know, a snobbery!

One begins to see that the Jacobite cause was a mythus, a hollow affair; to invest it with reality would suppose the existence of a tribe of heroes, of demi-gods, such as did not exist—have never existed. De trop in England, the Stuarts and their misfortunes were welcome abroad as long as their sorrows were sufficiently notorious. Gradually they became a bore even to the Papal Court, for whom they had suffered so much, and then comes the “nasty bottle,” until George III. confers a pension upon the last of the race, a poor, aged, importunate beggar, and the “Times” solemnly applauds this act of princely munificence.

Has then their story lost its charm? These two elaborate monographs on the “Old Pretender” attest that it has not. In 1905 Martin Haile brought out a biography of Queen Mary of Modena. Like so many investigators in similar fields, this writer caught the Stuart fever, was compelled to go beyond the Regency, and to tell the full story of James Francis Edward. The task makes a considerably greater demand upon an author's powers, but Martin Haile has risen to the situation and has written a scholarly book, beautifully designed, beautifully illustrated, equipped with references so thorough as to supersede the need of a bibliography, and produced in such a way as to prepossess the reader strongly in its favour. The proverbial ill luck of “the family” which its last representatives came to worship with a kind of idolatry—so persistent that even the Electress Sophia wrote of “le pauvre prince de Galles”—but to which we get a clue now and again in James's strange, straightforward tactlessness with adherents, loses nothing in such hands. From internal evidence exclusively we cannot help suspecting that Martin Haile is a woman, so cognate is the work in many of its best qualities, and one or two that it lacks (more especially a far-reaching synthetic range of vision), with the excellent historical writing of Miss Eva Scott and Miss Foxcroft on this self-same period. Martin Haile's was by far the best book on its subject until that of Miss A. Shield and Mr. Andrew Lang appeared a month or two later. This last is a much bigger book; its scope is much wider, and it is fuller and more detailed. But it has less artistry and less relief. Mr. Lang knows his subject far too well. There is nothing of the ardour of the learner about his pages. The material has all become in a sense stale and outworn. The virtue has gone out of it. The detail is overdone. It is microscopic. To model figures with such material is like modelling with dust. The result would be pathetic, almost to tragedy, were it not so familiar. Compare Sanford's portraits of the characters in the Great Rebellion with those of Gardiner. The last-mentioned historian had come to know them all too well. He could explain and forgive everything; the graphic fervour which partisanship and partiality of view alone seem able to inspire had departed from him. So with Mr. Lang. No one knows the history of the decline and fall of the House of Stuart so minutely as he. He has written it out and written it over. He has inspired romances about it such as Mr. Mason's spirited “Clementina.” But the details of the history gradually assume proportions out of all keeping with the perspective, and he has become more and more unable to subordinate the parts to the whole. The results, already manifest in the fourth volume of his “History of Scotland” and in his book on the young Chevalier, are even more conspicuous here. The charm of the book, apart from a few minute percussions of novelty, is confined accordingly to a few beautifully written passages, in which the old haunting beauty of the theme as he first envisaged it, and before it was desupernaturalised by minute and over persistent research, seems to have returned at his bidding.

Lucretius and Modern Thought.*

WHEN, in or about 1417 A.D., Poggio sent back to Florence from a German monastery the manuscript of Lucretius, the newly discovered poet made an immediate and lasting impression on the scholars of the time: for, in his double aspect of poet and man of science, he seemed to strike the very keynote of the Renaissance itself. And so we find among the fruits of this popularity not merely the great work of Gassendi on Atomism, but, probably through the medium of the poems of Politian, the inspiration of two of the most famous pictures of Botticelli. Lucretius' appeal to the twentieth century is essentially the same, but it should be stronger: not merely has the revival of the atomic theory as the basis of all physical and chemical inquiry given a quite new interest to the scientific side of his work, and the modern feeling for nature deepened our appreciation of the poet, but the whole setting of the “De Rerum Natura,” with its tense struggle against the fictions of superstition and its strong undercurrent of really religious feeling—even despite the poet's will—must come home to the modern world with a force which would have been impossible at the time of the re-discovery. “The face of nature and its inner workings” (naturae species ratioque) are the objects of Lucretius' observation and research, and it would not be too much to say that in the correlation of these two interests—that of the artist and the man of science—and the establishment of their relation to religion lie the main problems for the thought of the twentieth century.

Dr. Masson, in putting together the results of many years' study of Lucretius and his master, Epicurus, using freely and thoughtfully the work of recent commentators—Munro, Brieger, Guyau, Martha, and the very brilliant essays of Giussani—and gathering passages of illustration from modern scientific writers, has given us a book which cannot fail to arouse a deep interest in many different classes of readers. Yet there is a good deal in it that, even with a strong appreciation of its value as a whole, one cannot help wishing had been otherwise. Dr. Masson writes as an enthusiast—sometimes (e.g., pp. xxiv. and 369) in a rather irritatingly ecstatic style—but his work is clearly intended as a scientific study. From that point of view one misses a good deal. In the first place, Epicureanism is treated far too much as an isolated phenomenon—it can only be really understood and estimated in its context, by returning not merely, as Dr. Masson has done in Chap. xiv., to Democritus and Leucippus, but to the problems and solutions of the earlier philosophers. Atomism was not a new and wholly independent theory of the world: it was in reality the culmination of the old dispute of the Ionian and Eleatic schools on the underlying question of all early Greek thought: “Is the world one or many; a single unity or a diverse plurality?”; and its value in the history of Greek thought is that, when the dialogue of philosophers had shown that plurality annihilates permanence, and monism motion, atomism—foreshadowed in the “seed-theory” of Anaxagoras—reconciled differences in the new notion that the permanent substratum, one and homogeneous in kind, is yet numerically “many.” This failure to take atomism in its place in the history of philosophy is responsible too for a want of cohesion in Dr. Masson's presentment of Epicureanism as a unity within itself. To take an illustration: one of the main questions debated among Democritus's immediate predecessors was whether reliance could be placed in the evidence of the senses. Democritus, with his usual love of refinement, held that whereas the “ordinary consciousness” was far from a sure criterion, sense-perception, stripped of the additions made by the mind, was a safe guide: of this doctrine there are some traces in Lucretius, but Epicurus, scorning over-subtlety, laid down, as the very basis of his system, that sense-perception was not only the safest but the only means of certain knowledge. Whenever it gave clear information, it must be followed: but in matters beyond its scope, argument must be from the evidence of the known to the unknown, all explanations not contradicted by sense being treated with equal respect. These principles Dr. Masson states in his account of the Epicurean Canonice on p. 252, but he does not, as Lucretius, the true Epicurean, was in duty bound, bear them in mind right through the system. For instance, the reason why Lucretius offers us alternative and conflicting accounts of astronomical phenomena is not that astronomy was “not yet a science” (p. 379), but because its phenomena are beyond the reach of sense-perception: Lucretius' beautiful illustrations, too, of which Dr.

* “Lucretius; Epicurean and Poet.” By John Masson, M.A., LL.D. John Murray. 12s. net.

Masson speaks (pp. 380 ff.) with strong poetic sympathy, were to him not merely illustrations but arguments according to the strictest canons of his master. With this principle in mind, Dr. Masson could hardly have complained so scornfully of Lucretius' "Epicurean logic" on p. 244, or, in speaking of the doctrine of the "least parts" of the atom, have stated on p. 107 that Lucretius "offers no proof of it": in both cases he is offering what his master had laid down as the only logical proof. In just the same way, the whole notion of the parts of the atom, with which Dr. Masson deals rather unsatisfactorily in pp. 92 ff., can only be properly understood if it is traced historically from the time when Leucippus first said that the atom "had no parts."

In his very interesting chapters on the relation of Lucretius to modern science, Dr. Masson gives us plenty of food for reflection, but again it is difficult to suppress a grumble. Much of Dr. Masson's work here is but a rechauffé of what he said in his "Atomic Theory of Lucretius," published in 1884, and things have changed a good deal since then. Surely the Tyndall-Martineau controversy, to which so much space is devoted in Chapter VIII., is rather out of date by now; and, on the other hand, the far-reaching speculations of Professor Haeckel, which are just glanced at in a footnote on p. 189, would now form a much more interesting parallel to the "free-will" of the atoms than W. K. Clifford's notion of "mind-stuff." Above all, the new theories of ions and electrons, which, in fact, constitute an advance from the diverse and heterogeneous atoms of chemistry to fundamental homogeneous particles, such as Lucretius believed in, are far too important for the very cavalier treatment in a couple of pages (104-106) which Dr. Masson accords them. But, to be frank, the whole of this section of the book is too much a matter of scissors-and-paste—casual extracts from various men of science to illustrate individual points: what was wanted—it is true it would be difficult to get—was an authoritative exposition of the present position of the atomic theory and a careful comparison, point by point, with the Epicurean system. Finally, many readers—though perhaps not all—will deprecate the tone of the modern religious apologist which runs through the whole book and comes out into great prominence in the last chapter: it is one thing to give an account of an ancient philosophy, another to refute it with modern arguments, and a third to maintain a theistic position against modern scientific writers. The confusion of these three aims cannot but detract from the interest and value of the book. But if Dr. Masson's work is robbed of finality by want of cohesion and breadth in treatment and inaccuracy of detail—a good deal might be said under that head—it is a book one is thoroughly glad to have read. It is full of suggestion for the student of Lucretius—we might select the chapters on the Birth of the World, on the Theory of Images, on the Epicurean gods, and on Epicurus' Ethics as specially attractive, and for the general reader it should be almost a revelation of the nearness of the ancient and modern worlds. It will probably achieve Dr. Masson's object best if it persuades some, as it certainly should, to take down Lucretius from their shelves and, even if they do not follow the intricacies of Epicurean argument, at least enjoy again the music of the most original and fearless of the Latin poets.

THE AWKWARD AGE.*

To write a book upon the Cause of Woman requires nowadays the possession of no common qualities; for what was novel and glorious to a Mary Wollstonecraft, is to an Annette Meakin a tedious and familiar duty. Like many another once-dazzling heresy, the Rights of Woman has sunk into respectability; its pioneers have retired prosperous, and its once blasphemous tenets have acquired all the honourable sanction due to platitude. Praise, therefore, and gratitude, must be given to the writer of the present volume. To be a martyr for one's cause is but vainglorious virtue; to be a bore for it requires a heroism more sublime.

What is womanhood? An irretrievable misfortune. So it has been felt and thought for centuries; the weaker have suffered and succumbed; the brave endured, and made the best of it. Never till of recent years has there been any determined effort to alter or improve. But the nineteenth century has witnessed many striking changes, and few have been more remarkable than the change that has taken place in the feminine soul. Science and democracy, though they may have dethroned divinity and sanctified revolution, have yet achieved two Christian graces: they have given to man a new humility, and to woman a new hope.

Woman, as Miss Meakin reminds us, is still in a stage of transition. Like the growing girl, all arms and legs, growing-pains and grievances, she is a problem to her elders and a perplexity to herself. It is an awkward age, but one of infinite promise and importance. All over the civilised world its manifestations may be studied. Woman is rubbing her eyes in dreamy Germany, stretching herself in England and France; she is wide awake in Finland, Norway, and Russia, and up and doing in the United States. Even in Egypt and Constantinople she is beginning to taste the troublous pleasures of education, to dream in secret of liberty. But if education is the corner-stone of freedom, it has yet to be securely laid. "There is not a single country in Europe," writes M. Novikoff, "where all the educational institutions are open to both sexes." Even the commonplace and simple expedient of co-education is still regarded by the average Briton as a mixture of paradox and impropriety. It is not for morality, however, that he has cause to tremble, but for sentiment: passion knows no deadlier enemy than propinquity. "It is very rarely, if ever, that a man in our country marries one of the girls with whom he has been educated," is the verdict of Denmark. That to educate women makes them unattractive is, therefore, the conclusion of the superficial. The woman of superior attainments is too abnormal to suit the healthy masculine fancy. Yet fashion is a mighty force, and who knows, if, the vogue once prominently established, the claims of intellect and character may not rival even the attractions of criminality?

Let faint hearts take courage. That mute tragedy, the old maid, is dying out. In her stead is the professional woman—active, contented, and revered.

"It is a sign of the way in which initiative has awakened in women of recent years (writes Miss Meakin) that we find them to-day engaged successfully in almost every calling on the face of the earth. They are earning their bread as civil-engineers, architects, surveyors, agriculturists, sea-captains, pilots, musical composers, band conductors, dramatists, poultry-raisers, bee-keepers, horticulturists, steeple-jacks, barristers, physicians, surgeons, and even house-painters. . . . In the United States there were, in 1904, more than three thousand women preachers, one thousand lawyers, more than seven thousand women doctors, some seven hundred women dentists, nearly a thousand women commercial travellers, five hundred female electricians, forty-five lady chauffeurs, and a fair sprinkling of female grooms, stone masons, tram conductors, firemen, butchers, and jockeys."

It seems idle nowadays, when she appears to succeed in so many, to raise the question of Woman's Rightful Sphere. Yet the problem is one over which mankind has continually wrangled, and probably will never solve. Temperament may incline us to the rational or sentimental view, the abstractly just or the expediently selfish. We may side indifferently with Plato or the Rev. Knox Little; history supports both. If the Christian despot gazes Eastwards to vindicate the antiquity of his claim, the Socialist has but to think of Sparta and is at once acquitted of all originality. Precedent proves nothing; and were freedom and equality as modern as the motor-car, their triumph would be no less inevitable. It cannot fairly be denied, however, that woman, in her transitional stage, is relinquishing much of her primordial poetry. Traditional romance, which longs for ringlets and caprice, sees small attraction in the logical faculty and a fountain-pen. The charms of coquetry are ill replaced by common sense, and woman (so it is said), in attaining self-control, has ceased to be dramatic. Worse still, in asserting her right to defend her own interests, she has given the death-blow to chivalry. Yet it was a courtier from the kingdom where women were past-mistresses in the science of heart-breaking who declared that "Une belle femme qui a les qualités d'un honnête homme, est-ce-qu'il y a au monde un commerce plus délicieux?"

Even were every anti-feminist allegation proved, woman's claims would still demand recognition. Sex plays, after all, but a transitory part in the drama of human life; men and women are individuals before they are partners. Love may scourge man into existence, but humanity has higher aims than mere perpetuation. The woman whose life is complete in itself is not disgraced if she leave no future behind her. Posterity has been her apology; let her existence seek its own justification.

* "Woman in Transition." By Annette M. B. Meakin. Methuen. 6s.

Miss Meakin conducts us valiantly over the well-worn paths. She has had much to contend with. The professors of Germany make their epigrams, biologists are not always faithful to the cause, and there is a good deal of disconcerting evidence to prove that feminine ability is distinct from genius. Practically everything that has been said for or against the question is repeated in the volume; its pages glitter with quotation; every authority on woman-kind, from Aristotle to President Roosevelt, is given a hearing. Miss Meakin, however, is to be congratulated on one remarkable piece of reticence. The word "vote" is mentioned but once; the word "suffragette" is entirely omitted.

NOVELS OF THE WEEK.*

THE saying that character is plot is one that the novelist disregards at his peril. It is a precept upon which our great novelists, from Fielding to Meredith, have acted, but in the hands of our third and fourth-rate story-tellers the imbroglío of plot has played the fatal rôle that the "anecdote" picture played in the British official school of painting, 1830-1900. "Get a good stirring plot, with wheels within wheels, and everything else will follow" Mr. James Payn was wont to advise young novelists in the 'seventies, and though the chief masters, Thackeray, George Eliot, Meredith, and Trollope, never put the cart before the horse in this fashion, the popular Victorian school, from Wilkie Collins to Walter Besant, sacrificed artistic truth to bustling stage manoeuvres. Even Thomas Hardy did not escape the prevailing infection, and, so far as his work rests upon feet of clay, it is the arbitrary happenings and accidental turns of the wheel in so many of his novels that impair the feeling of inevitability, which is the highest artistic achievement in a close scrutiny of human character. The alternative to a complicated artificial scheme of "plot," in which the characters are sucked to and fro in the vortex of the story, is, in fact, the situation between the characters in a given environment, with the march of events determined by their inner forces, only now and then affected by chance striking from without. In the great Russian novels, as in "War and Peace," for example, there is no "plot," and accident only appears as an inevitable recurring linking-up of the irregular rhythmical curves of human life, whether we are following the march of armies in the field, the growth and decline of family fortunes, or the contact of men and women with the decisive turn of fate on each significant encounter. Wherever, in short, "plot" is patently constructed, and is not a chain of situations springing inevitably from the natural relations of men, the artist calls in the aid of machinery and weakens the illusion. The weakest element in Shakespeare is due to the complications of many of the plots he took over, ready-made, from the old chronicles that he followed, though, on the other hand, no writer ever demonstrated better than he that "character is plot."

Of the two books before us, the first, "The History of Aythan Waring," is an instructive example of how an author who has both insight and imagination falls straightway into an inferior rank by succumbing to the cheap allurements of "plot." Aythan and Eustace, cousins, are the adopted children of Matthew Bridges, of Crishowell House, who, however, marries a woman of twenty-eight, Hester Corbett, when both young men are nearly of age. Matthew Bridges dies suddenly, leaving a will by which the Crishowell estate passes to Hester for her life, then reverting to Aythan, who also inherits a substantial legacy. Hester, after her husband's death, falls deeply in love with the graceful, idle, and smooth-tongued Eustace, who makes love to her partly to amuse himself and partly because he prefers the prospect of being the master of Crishowell to going out into the world and working for his living. But Eustace, while secretly engaged to Hester, whom he is already tiring of, pays furtive court to the beautiful Barbara Troup, a new neighbour, with whom Aythan is passionately in love. Now this situation, psychologically, is interesting, and the whole story ought to turn on this question: what are the laws that govern Hester's nature when she detects Eustace's double dealing? By keeping subtle, friendly relations with both Aythan and Barbara, Hester has it in her power to checkmate Eustace, and bring him back to her side, or else revenge herself upon him. The situation, in fact, should have been one arising from the play of the four characters upon one another, but Mrs. Jacobs has sacrificed both human interest and probability by her adherence to the lines of a melodramatic plot. In her reading of the situation we find Hester developing an intense hatred for Aythan, because the latter is to inherit Crishowell after her death and so dispossess Eustace and her (possible) children. Aythan accordingly leaves Crishowell, and becomes the agent of a certain Sir Helbert Bucknell, a neighbouring land owner. But Hester's hatred of him grows to such alarming proportions that when Aythan is falsely accused of a murderous assault on a villager, and of being implicated in the business of an illicit distillery carried on surreptitiously at the farm at which he is lodging, Hester actually bribes the wicked villager to swear Aythan's life away! A more unnaturally strained plot we have rarely come across, and if we cite it, it is only to deplore the false gods which so many talented English writers still childishly accept. One would think that Mrs. Jacobs was living in the days of James Payn, and that she had never heard of our great English realists, let alone the Continental masters, just as the authorities at Burlington House year after year are seen to perpetuate the terrible traditions of the "literary" picture, the sweet sugar-plum style in vogue from the days of Sir Thomas Lawrence to the days of Hook. It is a pity, this waste of talent and material on fifth-rate models, for the majority of these writers, as well as these artists, only need training. In the characters of Eustace Waring, Mr. Troup, and Sarah Ukyn the authoress shows that she can grasp the secrets of individuality, and why should they be wasted on the melodramatic void? In the last half of "The History of Aythan Waring" we believe, practically, in nothing that is told us, and the emotional agonies of the characters read as though they had been written in a blind adherence to certain perishable and stagey scenes in some of Thomas Hardy's works.

In "A Sheaf of Corn" Mrs. Mann shows no slackening of her remarkable creative energy. A score of novels already stands to her credit, and though she has not rivalled the late Mrs. Oliphant in mere fecundity, she is the superior, we judge, in craftsmanship as well as in independence of outlook. Many of the twenty stories brought together in "A Sheaf of Corn" show an imaginative intensity and a power of visualising scenes, by command of sharp realistic detail, that are quite uncommon. Her somewhat grim satisfaction in bringing her knaves and fools to judgment is balanced by a sympathy with the unsuccessful strugglers in adversity. The sketch of Car'line, the sickly, long-suffering wife of an agricultural labourer, Depper, who, after her death, comes whining to a neighbour's door, "'Taint a natural thing, I'm a-sayin', for me to du, Dinah, ter pass the night alone along o' my old missus's corp," is as good as a drawing by Brower; and equally unflinching is the story "When Deep Sleep Falleth," which describes the homecoming of a bride who is stepping into the shoes of the dead wife who hated her. In "The Cares of a Curate," Mrs. Mann avenges many men who have suffered cruelly from the pertinacious pursuit of the "ladies" of their parish. Perhaps the best story in the book is "Pink Carnations," a most cleverly written study of a wedding that never took place. It is the emotional range and the incisive realism shown in most of the stories that make Mrs. Mann so valuable a writer in these anæmic days. She does not turn her face away from the aspects of life that are conventionally called "ugly," and her strong spirit disdains the idealistic sentimental handling which is another name for feebleness.

*"The History of Aythan Waring." By Violet Jacobs. Heinemann. 6s.

"A Sheaf of Corn." By Mary E. Mann. Methuen. 6s.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

IN the "Social Fetish" (Smith, Elder, 5s. net) Lady Grove discusses, in various forms and with a light touch, that system of customs and conventions which is accepted as the right thing. She is not entirely on the side of the convention, though recognising as "wholesome" a due respect for the good governance of society. "The worship of convention," she declares, "is a fetish as hydra-headed and as disintegrating, both to the individual and the community, as any other sinister idolatry openly recognised in its ugly monstrosity." Here she sets herself "lightly to sketch the composition of this fetish." Three chapters deal with "Social Solecisms"—mispronunciation of words, the vagaries of the nouveau riche, the occasional eccentricities of "a Countess of irreproachable breeding eating cheese off the end of her knife, and a Marchioness drinking tea out of her saucer." Later papers consider "Tips" and "The Ethics of Motoring," the "Matinee Hat," and similar exhilarating subjects. The dislike of motoring to-day she ascribes largely to the "irresponsible chauffeur," with his misplaced sense of humour and his boast of the number of dogs he has killed in the year. She would be inclined, indeed, to endorse the verdict of a Colonial newspaper that there are only two classes of chauffeurs, "those who are in prison, and those who ought to be." These little papers are full of vivacity and pleasant illustration, and make a very readable volume.

* * *

"CHILE," by G. F. Scott Elliot (Fisher Unwin, 10s. 6d. net.) appears as the first volume of the South American series: a new historic story of the nations which designs to illuminate the dense ignorance of English readers concerning the romantic past and present progress of the countries of South America. That story of the past is one of the most astounding records that the world has ever seen; in its brutalities, in its heroisms, in the vicissitudes of its fortunes, in the frequent miracles of its success, it offers a picture to which the world has no parallel. The Conquests of Mexico and Peru, which Prescott has interpreted to the English-speaking world, are here paralleled by similar feats accomplished through generations. From the day that Almagro raised his standard at Cuzco in 1535 and started with 600 Europeans and 15,000 Indians to conquer the land of Chile, to the day when Balmaceda in 1891 shot himself, leaving the message, "Whenever you and the friends remember me, believe me that my spirit, full of the tenderest love, will be amongst you," the history is one of continuous fascination to "all adventurous and daring persons." Mr. Scott Elliot tells the story with strong sympathy for this people and some sense of the greatness of the narrative. Human life is counted—during most of these days—as a little thing, in comparison with honour, freedom, or the desire for fame and passionate experience. Mr. Martin Hume, who contributes an introduction, has strong faith in the future of the country, with its "almost Anglo-Saxon governing classes," the "steady laboriousness of its peasants," and its special position on the borders of that ocean which is coming to be the centre of the world's interest. "All that Chile needs is time and peace to become one of the great nations of the world, and the almost aggressive patriotism of its citizens, even those whose blood is alien to the soil, proves that they, at least, have faith in the future of their country." Special chapters at the end deal with the present natural resources of Chile, and the book is well illustrated.

* * *

"NOTES ON PLACES" is the subtitle of Vernon Lee's "The Sentimental Traveller" (John Lane, 5s. net). But the notes are less on places than on moods and emotions: the impression which certain names and buildings and natural scenery excite in a reflective and sensitive mind. These short papers on various town and countrysides in Germany, France, Switzerland, and Italy, all deal with the experience of the traveller as seen in the transfiguration of memory: where bodily discomfort and the stretches of dulness are forgotten, and form and colour acquire fresh value, and simple things—the yellowing limes, the smoke of the bonfires, the scent of autumn winds—become charged with significance and sadness and longing. This passion of the past combines in these pleasant sketches with a high sense of the human interest of it all: the arduous and endurances of the generations which have thronged through the streets of these little German towns, now so quiet and serene, the consciousness of the presence of the shadowy centuries that have gone. She leaves the beaten track of travel, to visit curious places, now stranded and in fact forgotten: such as Quedlinburg in the flat Brunswick country, with the old buildings of its Damenstifte: and "Goslar, once Imperial," whose first impression "is Christmas-treeish and fairy-bookish," later modified by "the great haggard figures of Christ, with streaming wounds and real matted hair and beard"; or Weimar, where she finds the house of Goethe, and his memorials creating "only a gritty sense of duty, as of the dust swallowed in that sanctuary." The Italian pilgrimage includes an impression of a bead-threader's funeral at the Friari at Venice; Curia in October storm; the mountains behind Portofino; Narni and Terni. Vernon Lee turns aside from travel picture to pay generous tribute to the memory of departed friends: Gaston Paris, Emile Duclaux. A paper of special eloquence and appeal describes the Children's Hospital at Berck, with the great paintings left there by M. Albert Bernard: of the Christ crucified in the heart of a polluted suburb of a modern industrial city: with the great cross standing before the outline of its factories, veiled in smoke, and the flame of its furnaces: and of the Christ glorified, in that new world of the future, in the City of the Just, which mankind will one day build out of its dreams.

* * *

SIR WALTER GILBEY'S "George Morland" (Black, 20s. net), which has been compiled with the help of Mr. E. D. Cuming, is the fourth biography of this artist that has been issued during the last twelve months. The book differs from its predecessors in being illustrated wholly in colour, and the account of Morland's life is the most circumstantial of all the modern ones. Although there is no indication that any fresh information has been obtained, the writings of Dawe, Hassell, and other contemporary and later biographers have been sifted and summarised to useful purpose, and the critical comment, while not markedly original, is based on first-hand knowledge. Unfortunately, when we leave the text for the "fifty full-page reproductions in colour of the artist's best work"—as the prospectus has it—we find cause for dissatisfaction. With the exception of the portrait of the artist from Rowlandson's water-colour in the British Museum, there is not a solitary example from the national collections. Even the Trafalgar Square "Inside of a Stable" is left out, though it is acknowledged by accredited critics to be Morland's masterpiece. The fifty "best works" are selected from private collections. These include Sir Walter Gilbey's own, which is an extensive one, and those of Mr. T. J. Barratt, which are very good and interesting, and Sir Edward Tennant. One well-known firm of picture dealers is represented by no less than five canvases. We cannot from the public standpoint consider this selection well judged, for although it is sometimes advisable to exclude a painter's works that have become hackneyed through frequent reproduction, the plan does not commend itself when it is carried out in the wholesale fashion adopted here. The absence of a picture like the National Gallery chef-d'œuvre robs the collection of its representative character, and one misses it the more because Sir Walter Gilbey—as one would expect from the author of "Animal Painters of England"—lays special stress on Morland's skill as a painter of horses, of which the "Inside of a Stable" is the crowning illustration. We are afraid that the pictures in this book are its weakness rather than its strength, in spite of the care with which they are reproduced.

* * *

THE two great disadvantages of a book of prose selections are that the passages chosen do not appear to their best advantage when detached from the contexts, and that every reader is sure to find some favourite passage omitted. Mr. John Masefield in "An English Prose Miscellany" (Methuen, 6s.) has aimed at including "a number of passages of English prose, all of them of some special beauty or vividness, which in their arrangement will show how English style has changed from century to century." The result is a most attractive book, for, if Mr. Masefield

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.Rambling Recollections

BY

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF.

With Photogravure and other Illustrations.

Two vols. 8vo., 30s. net.

Daily Graphic:—"Sir Henry Drummond Wolff, as an old diplomat and Parliamentary hand, could hardly fail to interest readers with his reminiscences. He has, indeed, succeeded admirably. His book is founded on no diary or record; yet it is a treasure-house of good stories and political sidelights, told frankly and without malice."

THE COMING STRUGGLE IN EASTERN ASIA.

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "Manchu and Muscovite," "The Re-Shaping of the Far East, &c. With numerous illustrations, and a Map. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT. By H. FIELDING HALL. Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. 10s. net.

The Daily Telegraph:—"Mr. Hall has placed us newly in his debt by giving us a further work of remarkable freshness and great literary charm, one which most sympathetic readers will find, as we have said, really fascinating."

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON.

Annotated by ALFRED. LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols. Vol. II. Poems. 4s. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES—New Volume.

APHORISMS AND REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF THOMAS HENRY HUXLEY. Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Also cloth elegant, 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.JAMES THOMSON. By G. C. MACAULAY. Crown 8vo, 2s. net. [English Men of Letters.IS MARS HABITABLE? A Critical Examination of Prof. Percival Lowell's book, "Mars and its Canals," with an Alternative Explanation. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S. With Map. Extra crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.SIXTY YEARS OF PROTECTION IN CANADA, 1846-1907. Where Industry Leans on the Politician. By EDWARD PORRITT. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Tribune:—"Mr. Edward Porritt's complete, detailed, and most instructive history of 'Protection in Canada.'"

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2. COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C., and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

Our Land

Edited by

George Radford, M.A.

C. The first, the February Number of "Our Land," is now ready at all Bookstalls, price 3d. net.

C. "Our Land" is a monthly journal devoted to the interests of Agriculture and Land in Britain. The central feature will be Co-operation, but Land Tenure, Housing, Taxation, Railway Freights and Local Traction, Sanitation, Purity of Food, Education, and other subjects will be discussed.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.The FEBRUARY "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net.*CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs; the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND! Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS! Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED! Some Book Pictures that we Know no More.

A LONDON LETTER. New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor.

ANNALS OF PRINT. Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES. The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topographer—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classical Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who, on application, will send a Specimen Copy free.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTEROffices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.*PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

Twopence. Each Friday.

Established 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read PUBLIC OPINION.

*Specimen post free on application.*Offices: 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

excludes passages which we should like to find, he more than compensates for this by introducing us, especially in his first and sixth sections, "Memoirs and Letters" and "Translations," to writers whom we are glad to meet. In his introduction Mr. Masefield divides our prose literature into three classes. "In the highest or 'best' class may be placed those writers who write informed with a burning energy (either of ecstasy or of contemplation), which gives their prose something of the rapture and beauty, if nothing of the rhythm and music, of poetry." Among these Mr. Masefield puts Jeremy Taylor, Donne, Sir Thomas Browne, Bishop Berkeley, Hooker, Robert Burton, and the great dramatic poets "who use prose seldom, but always with supreme effect." "In the second class may be placed the men whose personalities are charming rather than compelling: the writers of books of travel, of sport, of fiction, of miscellaneous works, the makers of translations, &c., &c. The bulk of our national literature belongs to this class." Finally, there are the writers of diaries, memoirs, letters, and gossip-mongers generally. "This class, always precious to the historian and to the student, contains comparatively few names; and very few of its members reveal themselves sufficiently (like Pepys, Horace Walpole, or either of the two Melvilles) to interest the reader in their characters apart from what they write." It seems to us that Swift deserves to be ranked in Mr. Masefield's first class, and that Gray, and possibly Cowper, might be added to the exceptions he makes to his criticism of those in his third.

* * *

"IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF MARCO POLO," by Major C. Dalrymple Bruce (Blackwood, 21s. net), is a soldierly narrative of a remarkable journey from Simla to Peking, through Tibet and Turkestan. To the geographer it will come as an accurate contribution to the exact knowledge of desert routes, which still are little known, despite the work of Sven Hedin. The historian will welcome it incidentally as a remarkable confirmation of the truthfulness of Marco Polo's narrative. Oddly enough, the human interest of the book varies in inverse ratio to the strangeness of its subject matter. Major Dalrymple Bruce's notes on the peoples of Turkestan are always worth reading, but it is when he enters the familiar soil of China that his observations on men and affairs acquire a value which even the general reader will appreciate. He notes the spread of the reform movement even in the remote regions to the west of Peking, talks with educated Chinese officials, and testifies to the sincerity of their zeal for education and political development. As a soldier, who has behind him the unique experience of commanding the Chinese regiment at Wei-Hai-Wei, his remarks on the military qualities of the Chinese are particularly valuable. He sees in the records of the past conquests of Chinese emperors the proofs of real military ability, even at a time when the profession of arms was despised. He is convinced that the rank and file of the Chinese would make a soldiery inferior to none in the world. But he doubts whether they would ever be formidable unless officered by Japanese or Europeans. His observation of the attempts which innovating viceroys are making at present to create a "new model" goes to show that despite the adoption of European uniforms and drill formations, the military value of the troops so trained must as yet be very slight indeed.

* * *

MR. A. F. CALVERT'S volume on "Toledo" (John Lane, 3s. 6d. net) is one of the bulkiest of the Spanish series which is being produced with such rapidity. It contains over 500 illustrations. The letterpress, condensed into 169 pages, summarises fairly completely what former historians have written on the history of the "city of generations" which was until 1560 the first city of Spain. The legendary origins of Toledo, its progress under the Visigoths, the Moors, and the Castilian monarchs, are duly narrated, and special chapters are devoted to the cathedral and to the painter, El Greco. The latter chapter, in which Mr. C. Gasquoine Hartley has collaborated, is not much more than a paraphrase of the remarks on this artist contributed by the authors to the volume on the Prado in the same series; but a whole book devoted to El Greco is promised for some future date. Studies as interesting as the position of the Jews in Toledo, and the influence of the Moors on the architecture of the city, naturally suffer from the space limitations imposed here. But we think that the author, by the exercise of a little more care in construction, might have made himself clearer, on the latter point at any rate, than he has done. On p. 43 he emphasises the contention that Toledo, during the 350 years of Mohammedan rule, never lost the "outward character" of a Christian town. This statement, however, seems to us to be considerably discounted by another on p. 97: "As in all other Spanish cities, after their re-acquisition by the Christians, in Toledo, for many, many years, Moorish architects and masons continued to be employed even in the construction of sacred edifices. This accounts for the mixed Christian and Saracenic style," &c. The photographic illustrations only rise above the level of the ordinary guide-book kind in respect of their variety.

* * *

THE "Essays on Art, by John Hoppner, R.A." (Francis Griffiths, 2s. 6d. net), which Mr. Frank Rutter has rescued from the graves of ancient periodicals, are not so much art-criticism as criticism of other people's art-writings. The most entertaining of the collection is the review of Hayley's "Life" of Romney. Of constructive criticism there are few traces. Hoppner, as Mr. Rutter indicates in his introduction, has lived as a portrait painter of the Reynolds school; but he had not the sensitiveness of Gainsborough or Romney, and his literary bludgeoning, while characteristic of the age in which he lived, proves his incapacity to understand their artistic endeavour. One may doubt whether the literary skill which Mr. Rutter claims for him was more than that which was common to educated persons of the period, who practised "letters" as Victorian young ladies practised the piano. Northcote said that Hoppner ought to have been a lawyer, and there is certainly a lawyer-like fastidiousness about his style; but of graceful or profound thought there is little.

* * *

EVERY book-lover ought to read "Books in the House," by Mr. Alfred W. Pollard (Humphreys, 3s. 6d. net). It consists of seven essays written in the graceful and lightly allusive style which seems to fall naturally from the pen of your real bookman when he writes of his treasures. But Mr. Pollard's gossip is as instructive as it is entertaining. He is an accomplished bibliographer, and his chapters on "Inherited Books and Their Value" and "Four Centuries of Book Prices," show that his enthusiasm for books is informed by knowledge. We hope that Mr. Pollard will give us more essays in this delightful vein.

* * *

THE five new volumes of "The World's Classics" series (Frowde, 1s. net each) include an excellent selection from Cowper's "Letters" made by Mr. E. V. Lucas. Mr. Lucas has followed the wise plan of retaining "everything, or nearly everything, which shows Cowper in the light of an agreeable philosophic correspondent," and of leaving out "nearly everything which bears upon his own unhappy spiritual state or upon local, family, or literary matters that either are of no intrinsic interest or that involve repetition." The result is a delightful choice of some of the best letters in the language. Mr. Lucas also edits Jane Austen's "Emma," which he thinks will be admitted by any collector of the opinions of the best critics as her best novel. "What 'David Copperfield' is to Dickens, and 'The Egoist' to Mr. Meredith, so is 'Emma' to Miss Austen: her ripest and her richest." The other additions are "The Discourses of Sir Joshua Reynolds," with an introduction by Mr. Austin Dobson, the fifth and sixth volumes of "The Works of Edmund Burke," with introductions by Mr. F. W. Rafferty, and the second volume of Browning's "Poems."

* * *

FROM the De la More Press we have received "Il Penseroso, L'Allegro, and Arcades," "The Sensitive Plant," and "Saul" (6d. each net), in the De la More Booklets Series. The little books are remarkable for the excellence of their type and production even in these days of cheap and dainty reprints. The same firm issues "Wit and Humour of the Physician" (1s. 6d. net), a collection of witty or pithy sayings bearing upon the relations between doctor and patient, collected from various sources and classified under subject headings.

Restful nights
and wakeful days when you use

Plasmon Cocoa.

CONTAINS NEARLY 70%
NOURISHMENT.

START USING NOW

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate (Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

The favourite household beverage

Rowntree's
ELECT COCOA

THE DEVELOPMENT OF HEBRAISM.*

THE literature of Old Testament religion is so abundant now, that one might suppose critical readers to be numerous. That were a rashly optimistic conclusion, it is to be feared; though, no doubt, there are signs of a spreading interest in comparative study, such as the New Theology movement now in progress. This work of Professor Marti's conforms more to the rigid scheme of summary classification in vogue among some of the Continental schools than to the sympathetic method employed by some other writers in this series—notably by Mr. Addis, in his "Hebrew Religion to the time of Ezra." His division into the Nomad stage, the Peasant stage, the Prophetic, and the Legal periods and characteristics, hardly serves to outline the course of Israelitish thought about the relation between the human and the divine, though it may help the beginner. The author calls his book "a short conspectus," and avows that he has had the general reader in view. It is just as well, for, while there is much picturesque delineation and effective illustration in his pages, the serious student will not regard these as equivalent to the fuller and more carefully modulated sections of Mr. Addis's volume. Professor Marti's main thesis will not be challenged by any but the most conservative critics; indeed, it is in the somewhat hasty exposition of particulars that the need for caution will be felt. "The Old Testament writings," we now know, "do not constitute the primary cause of Old Testament religion, but are the documents and monuments of its history." Also, "as regards the mode of their origin, they do not occupy any peculiar position among the books of antiquity as a whole." Yet, in the working out of this modern principle, there is much room for hesitation and careful weighing of evidence—which, perhaps, it is unreasonable to expect in a book which addresses a popular audience. The Rev. G. A. Bienemann's translation has some ragged edges, which the editor, Dr. W. D. Morrison, has done his best to smooth down. On the whole, the book is a useful compendium, and worth its cost.

The Week in the City.

THE happiest feature of the week has been the continued rise of Consols, which leapt $\frac{3}{4}$ of a point on Wednesday to 86 $\frac{1}{2}$ —some six points above the lowest of the year. The premier security has drawn all the other British Government stocks after it, and the premium on the new Indian loan has risen to over three. Nothing could be more satisfactory; and the market rightly attributes the movement entirely to important Government purchases on sinking fund account. Great Britain is the only Great Power which is in a position at the present time to cancel debt. Germany, Russia, the United States, and even France are all embarrassed by deficits. Evidently Russia is about to raise a new loan. The high bureaucrats of St. Petersburg want to finger some more French gold. Whether the loan will be for railways or battleships matters little; but the investor must be warned that, as the Russian debt grows, the security for the interest being paid steadily diminishes. A Cromer, if he were given financial control, could in a few years put Russian credit on a 4 or 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. basis. But there seems to be no prospect of honest or competent finance in St. Petersburg.

THE OUTLOOK IN THE STATES.

The misery of the city populations in the United States seems to increase, because, generally speaking, employment is still diminishing. On January 18th it was estimated that the Pennsylvania lines alone had 75,000 idle cars. A small line near Pittsburg recently dismissed forty-five engineers and seventy-eight firemen. Things are better in the South, which never really felt the full effects of the panic, but so far failures and suspensions in the Eastern States still exceed in importance the resumptions. It would be dangerous to anticipate any stable improvement in stocks merely because big cash reserves are accumulating in New York. It is to be hoped the banks there will not try to use them for the purpose of inflating new speculative bubbles. A good barometer of actual conditions may be found in the emigration returns. In the first seventeen days of January over 30,000 steerage passengers left the States, as against 7,138 arrivals. In the same period last year 12,000 arrived and 9,000 left. There are still, it seems, several New York banks on the verge of suspension and unable to liquidate their Clearing House certificates.

JEWELLERY FAILURES AND DIAMONDS.

Early in the month several large diamond houses in New York "put their assets in the hands of trustees in order to protect themselves and their creditors." These jewellery failures have attracted a good deal of notice; the jewellery trade has been called "dead," and a heavy drop of prices has been anticipated. This has roused Mr. T. E. Willson, the editor of the "Jewellers' Circular-Weekly," who declares on the strength of a cable from "the London Syndicate, which controls the entire output of the diamond mines of the world, that the Syndicate is as firm as ever before in continuing their policy of maintaining prices." This statement, he adds, is made with the consent and authority of the De Beers Consolidated Mines and the Premier Mining Company, "which produces over ninety per cent. of all the gems mined." From the tone and substance of Mr. Willson's letter it would seem that the diamond magnates and the trade generally are uneasy. The crisis in New York has thrown a lot of second-hand jewellery on the market, and in spite of Mr. Willson's protestations, we imagine that, whether diamonds are being sold or not, they do not fetch anything like what they did. However, as the subject is of wide interest, it may be worth while to give a portion of Mr. Willson's statement:—

"For more than fifteen years diamonds have been the one commodity that has never dropped in price—in fact, the tendency has been steadily upward. Even in the panic of 1893 there was not the slightest waver in the diamond market, the only change being a slight advance, and it was one of the few industries in which the failures of the importers or main handlers of the commodity were insignificant both in number and amount. During the present flurry and at the present time, though merchants in other lines of business are cutting prices—though stocks are being dumped on the market and sacrificed for cash, there is no instance in the entire diamond trade wherein gems have or can be bought under the market price.

"From the De Beers Syndicate in London, which controls the output of the diamond mines of the world, on every hand down to the smallest retailer, the gem market has been absolutely protected, and the fact that caused so many comments, namely, the drop in the importation during December, which amounted to nearly 3,800,000 dol. for the month, is an evidence of the strength and not of the weakness of the market, showing as it does that when the demand is not here the amount of stones in this market is not increased. However, taking the year 1907 as a whole, the total value of the importations was 31,713,000 dol., which, while below those of 1906 and 1905, is over 5,000,000 above 1904 or any calendar year previous to that date."

As regards the slump in December, the editor of the "Jewellers' Circular" claims that the falling off was only in "large and expensive pieces," and that the number of sales was as high as ever. This is ingenious; but cheap trinkets hardly count, and the diamond market depends on the sale of "large and expensive pieces." One wonders if there is any chance of wealthy people abandoning the diamond craze altogether. That so many thousands of workmen and traders are employed in humouring this whim is a strange comment on distributive justice.

LUCELLUM.

Investors who wish to be equipped with indispensable information and to possess the most accurate and varied price list of securities in existence, should purchase the DOUBLE NUMBER of the Investor's Monthly Manual.

Just Published. Price 1/6. Post Free, 1/9.

Apply to the publisher—

3, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.

* "The Religion of the Old Testament." By Karl Marti. Crown Theological Library. Williams & Norgate. 5s.

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK OF ENGLAND Ltd.

CAPITAL—Paid Up	£3,000,000
Uncalled	2,300,000
Reserve Liability	10,600,000
Subscribed Capital	£15,900,000

RESERVE FUND (invested in English Government Securities), £2,350,000.

Number of Shareholders, 16,632.

Directors :

COLIN FREDERICK CAMPBELL, Esq.	SIR JAMES LYLE MACKAY, G.C.M.G, K.C.I.E.
MAURICE OTHO FITZGERALD, Esq.	GEORGE FORBES MALCOLMSON, Esq.
WILLIAM HENRY NEVILLE GOSCHEN, Esq.	WILLIAM ROBERT MOBERLY, Esq.
CLAUDE VILLIERS EMILIUS LAURIE, Esq.	SELWYN ROBERT PRYOR, Esq.
FRANCIS CHARLES LE MARCHANT, Esq.	THOMAS GEORGE ROBINSON, Esq.
THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF LICHFIELD.	ROBERT WIGRAM, Esq.

Joint General Managers :

ROBERT T. HAINES, Esq.,	THOMAS ESTALL, Esq.,	D. J. H. CUNNICK, Esq.
-------------------------	----------------------	------------------------

Solicitors :

ERNEST JAMES WILDE, Esq.,	WALTER EDWARD MOORE, Esq.
---------------------------	---------------------------

The Directors have the pleasure to submit the Balance Sheet for the year 1907, and to report that after making provision for all bad and doubtful debts, and for the rebate of discount on current bills, the profit, including £91,017 13s. 8d. brought forward, amounts to £751,839 8s. 9d., which has been appropriated as follows:—

Interim Dividend of 8 per cent. paid in August last	£	s.	d.
A further Dividend of 9 per cent. (making 17 per cent. for the year, free of Income Tax), payable 7th proximo	240,000	0	0
Applied to Writing down Investments	270,000	0	0
Balance carried forward to 1908	160,000	0	0
	81,839	8	9
	£751,839	8	9

The Directors retiring by rotation are Claude Villiers Emilius Laurie, William Robert Moberly, and Robert Wigram, Esquires, all of whom, being eligible, offer themselves for re-election.
Premises have been acquired and arrangements completed, for opening a branch at Paignton, Devon, on January 1st, 1908.
In conformity with the Act of Parliament, the Shareholders are required to elect the Auditors and fix their remuneration. Mr. Edwin Waterhouse and Mr. William Barclay Peat (of Messrs. W. B. Peat & Co.), the retiring Auditors, offer themselves for re-election.

BALANCE SHEET, 31st December, 1907.

LIABILITIES.				ASSETS.
CAPITAL—				CASH—
40,000 Shares of £75 each, £10 10s. paid	At Bank of England and at Head Office and Branches	...	£	s. d.
215,000 „ „ £60 „ „ £12 „ „ „	„ Call and Short Notice	...	9,250,591	15 3
	3,280,211	3 1

	12,530,802	18 4
RESERVE FUND...	INVESTMENTS—	...	£2,618,074	17 8
CURRENT, DEPOSIT, and other ACCOUNTS, including rebate on	English Government Securities	...	(Of which £75,500 is lodged for public Bills not due, provision for bad and doubtful debts, con-	accounts)	...
tingencies, &c...	Indian and Colonial Government	...
ACCEPTANCES and ENDORSEMENTS of FOREIGN BILLS, on	Securities; Debenture, Guaranteed, and	...
Account of Customers	Preference Stocks of British Railways;	...
PROFIT AND LOSS ACCOUNT—	British Corporation and Water Works	...
Balance of Profit and Loss Account, in-	Stocks	...	4,758,563	18 6
cluding £91,017 13s. 8d. brought from	Canal, Dock, River Conservancy, and	...
year 1906	other Investments	...	362,513	0 5
Less Interim Dividend, 8 per cent. paid in August last...	£240,000	0	0	LIABILITY of CUSTOMERS for ACCEPTANCES, &c., as per	...	13,739,151	16 7
„ Dividend of 9 per cent.	270,000	0	0	Contra	...	639,189	3 8
„ payable 7th February next	160,000	0	0	BILLS DISCOUNTED, LOANS, &c.	...	33,441,228	10 3
„ Applied to writing down	BANK PREMISES in London and Country	...	6258,029	0 0
Investments...
	670,000	0	0		...

		81,839	8 9		...
		£60,975,401	8 10		...	£60,975,401	8 10

M. O. FITZGERALD, }
G. F. MALCOLMSON, } Directors.
ROBERT WIGRAM, }

R. T. HAINES, }
T. ESTALL, } Joint General Managers.
D. J. H. CUNNICK, }

In accordance with the provisions of the Companies Act, 1900, we certify that all our requirements as Auditors have been complied with; and we report that we have ascertained the correctness of the Cash Balances and the Money at Call and Short Notice at the Head Office, and the securities representing the investments of the Bank; and having examined the Balance Sheet in detail with the books at the Head Office and with the certified returns from each Branch, we are of opinion that such Balance Sheet is full and fair and properly drawn up so as to exhibit a true and correct view of the state of the Bank's affairs, as shown by such books and returns.

20th January, 1908.

EDWIN WATERHOUSE, }
WILLIAM BARCLAY PEAT, } Auditors.
Chartered Accountants.

At the Annual Meeting (Robert Wigram, Esq., in the Chair), the above report was adopted. The retiring directors, Claude Villiers Emilius Laurie, Esq., William Robert Moberly, Esq., and Robert Wigram, Esq., were re-elected. Mr. Edwin Waterhouse and Mr. William Barclay Peat were re-appointed Auditors for the current year.

The best thanks of the proprietors were given to the Directors, General Managers, Branch Managers, and other officers of the Bank for their efficient services and to the Chairman for his able conduct in the chair.

The National Provincial Bank of England, Limited, having numerous Branches in England and Wales, as well as Agents and Correspondents at home and abroad, affords great facilities to its customers, who may have money transmitted to the credit of their accounts through any of the Branches, free of charge.
At Head Office and Metropolitan Branches, Deposits are received and interest allowed thereon at the rates advertised by the Bank in the London newspapers from time to time, and Current Accounts are conducted on the usual terms.
At the Country Branches, Current Accounts are opened, Deposits received, and all other Banking business conducted.
The Bank undertakes the Agency of Private and Joint-Stock Banks, also the Purchase and Sale of all British and Foreign Stocks and Shares, and the collection of Dividends, Annuities, &c.
Circular Notes and Letters of Credit, payable at the principal towns abroad, are issued for the use of Travellers.
The Officers of the Bank are bound to secrecy as regards the transactions of its Customers.
Copies of the Annual Report of the Bank, Lists of Branches, Agents, and Correspondents may be had on application at the Head Office, and at any of the Bank's Branches.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curple. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and Other Bibles and Prayer Books from 6d. to £10.

I
B
L
E
S

Illustrated, Wide Margin, Interleaved, Teachers', Interlinear, Revised, and other Editions.

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C. Telephone Central 329

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE.UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

(And at READING.)

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindlay at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

To secure FRIENDS AND FRIENDSHIPS, join the CORRESPONDENCE CLUB, 10/6, and the ENGLISH-SPEAKERS' LINK, 2/6, of 350, Mansion House Chambers, E.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: *Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C. Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery. Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"

PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER, B.A., Camb.ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

EDUCATIONAL.

SHREWSBURY SCHOOL.—The Examination for House Scholarships, including the Old Salopian Scholarship of £70 a year, tenable for 5 years, will be held on Tuesday, March 10th, and Wednesday, March 11th. Apply to the Headmaster.CO-EDUCATION.*ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

Principal—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters." Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co. Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

ONE & ALL SEEDSTHE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ESTABLISHED 1867.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz.,

Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisell Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.*One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.*One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.*One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.ONE & ALL FERTILISERS*NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

CHATTO & WINDUS.

THE RHINE. By H. J. MACKINDER, sometime Reader in Geography in the University of Oxford; Director of the London School of Economics, &c. Fully illustrated after Water Colours by Mrs. JAMES JARDINE, with two Folding Maps in colour, and Index. Large fcap. 4to (9 by 6½ inches), Gilt Top. 20s. net.

Mr. Mackinder has made a life-long study of the Rhine Valley and its history. No such authoritative or readable work has hitherto appeared upon the great River; the course of which—whether as "Priest Street," the great European trans-continental trade route, or as the determining factor in many an international struggle—has more deeply and more consistently influenced European history than any other force, natural or human. [February 23.]

THE BOOK OF ELIZABETHAN VERSE. Chosen and Edited, with Notes, Index of Authors, Biographical Index of Authors, and Index of first lines, by WILLIAM STANLEY BRAITHWAITE. The Title with Vignette Woodcut Reproduction of a View of Whitehall Palace in 1590; the Frontispiece a photogravure reproduction after the charming plate "Cupid Seated on Clouds," engraved by W. S. REYNOLDS after W. OWEN. Pp. 850, small crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net. Also in whole vellum, with Indian proof of frontispiece 12s. 6d. net.

The binding design has been specially reproduced from one of the finest examples of the period, sometime in the Old Royal Collection, now preserved in the British Museum. Among the many anthologies now before the public, few, if any, have been prepared with more competence or scholarly care. Exclusive of the seventy-five anonymous items, the work of 108 Elizabethan authors is here collected in their finest pieces, many of which appear in no other anthology. With scarcely an exception, the 675 items have been gathered direct from the pages of the authors quoted. The few exceptions to this are fully acknowledged in the introduction.

CAIRO, JERUSALEM, AND DAMASCUS:

Three Chief Cities of the Egyptian Sultans. By D. S. MAR-GOLIOUTH, D.Litt., Laudian Professor of Arabic in the University of Oxford. Fully illustrated in Colour by W. S. S. TYR-WHITE, R.E.A., and REGINALD BARRATT, A.R.W.S., 20s. net. Glasgow Herald.—"One of those comparatively few works that are both learned and readable. . . . The colour treatment is particularly masterly. . . . This reproduction of the very atmosphere of the East is a very distinct artistic triumph."

LISBON AND CINTRA.

With some Account of Other Cities and Historic Sites in Portugal. By A. C. INCH-BOLD. With 30 Illustrations in Colour by STANLEY INCHBOLD. 16s. 6d. net.

Times.—"The writer is an intelligent and careful guide who does not waste space with rhetoric or with personalia."

Outlook.—"Mr. Stanley Inchbold has caught the light of the Southern sun."

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

WITHYFORD: A Sporting Romance of Exmoor. By ARTHUR O. FISHER. [Now Ready.]
With Coloured Frontispiece by G. D. ARMOUR, four Illustrations in Sepia, and one in Black and White by R. H. BUXTON.

THE MARQUIS AND PAMELA. By E. H. COOPER, Author of "Mr. Blake of Newmarket." [February 6]

ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY. New Volumes.

Post 8vo, Cloth, Gilt Top, 2s. net; Leather, Gilt Edges, 3s. net per volume.

JERUSALEM. By SIR WALTER BESANT and E. H. PALMER.

THE SHADOW OF THE SWORD. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

AN INLAND VOYAGE. By R. L. STEVENSON.

WESTMINSTER. By SIR WALTER BESANT.

THE CHARM OF LONDON: Selections in Prose and Verse, made by ALFRED H. HYATT.

THE KING'S CLASSICS. New Volumes.

16mo Gilt Top, Quarter bound, Antique Grey Boards or Red Cloth, 1s. 6d. net; Quarter Vellum, Grey Cloth Sides, 2s. 6d. net.

THE POETS ROYAL OF ENGLAND AND SCOTLAND. Edited by W. BAILEY-KEMPLING.

CHAUCER'S PARLIAMENT OF BIRDS, AND HOUSE OF FAME. In Modern English. By Prof. SKEAT.

CHAUCER'S PROLOGUE AND MINOR POEMS. In Modern English. By Prof. SKEAT.

CHAUCER'S LEGEND OF GOOD WOMEN. In Modern English. By Prof. SKEAT.

SIR WILLIAM TEMPLE UPON THE GARDENS OF EPICURUS, with other XVIIth Century Essays on Gardens. Edited by A. FORBES-SIEVEKING, F.S.A.

WALPOLE'S CASTLE OF OTRANTO. Edited by Miss SPURGEON.

[Now Ready.]

THE PRINCE AND THE PAUPER. By MARK TWAIN. 6d.

THE STRONGER CLAIM. By ALICE PERRIN. 6d.

THE LIFE OF THE FIELDS (including the PAGEANT OF SUMMER). By RICHARD JEFFERIES. With 12 Reproductions after Water-colours by M. U. CLARKE, and Picture End papers. Crown 8vo. 5s. net. [Published.]

THE COURT OF THE TUILERIES, 1852-1870. Its Ceremonial Splendour, Follies, Lapses, and Downfall; with Impressions of its Chief Personages. By LE PETIT HOMME ROUGE. Demy 8vo., cloth. 7s. 6d. net. [Second Impression.]
Athenaeum.—"The writer is so accurate and so well-informed that his book makes serious claim to be treated as history. It undoubtedly contains almost the first accurate collected statement on many of the most important international events of the period between 1852 and 1870."

THE SULTAN AND HIS SUBJECTS. By RICHARD DAVEY. New and Revised Edition. With Photogravure Portrait, demy 8vo., demy cloth, 7s. 6d. net.
Punch.—"Did I want to visit the East," quoth the Baron, "I would take my Davey—I mean I should take my Richard Davey with me, represented by 'The Sultan and his Subjects,' the Sultan now having become one of Mr. Davey's subjects."

JULIE DE LESPINASSE. By the MARQUIS DE SÉGUR. Authorised English Version. With Photogravure Frontispiece, from the only authentic Portrait of MADEMOISELLE DE LESPINASSE, by CARMONTELLE. Demy 8vo. art linen, gilt top, 7s. 6d. net.
"One of the most enthralling and touching books that have been published of late years."—Spectator.

BRIDGE CATECHISM. By R. H. BRYDGES, Author of "Scientific Whist Cards." 2s. 6d. net.
Queen.—"Every point from Alpha to Omega is taken up and dealt with carefully. Our author follows the Euclidian method, 'line upon line, precept upon precept.'"
Scotsman.—"Sound advice and direction given in the most lucid form."
Daily Chronicle.—"Fortified by this book no one will have any excuse in the future for pleading ignorance of the 'laws' as settled by the Portland and Turf Clubs."
Glasgow Herald.—"The form in which the instruction in cast makes the book entertaining as well as instructive."

Prospectuses of any or all of the following Series will be sent post free on application:—

The New Medieval Library.

The King's Classics.

Bibliotheca Romanica.

The Shakespeare Library (including The Shakespeare Classics).

The St. Martin's Library.

Authors for the Pocket.

Books for Children.

The Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters.

CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, London, W.C.

"THE NATION," with which is incorporated "The Speaker," printed for the Proprietors by the NATIONAL PRESS AGENCY LIMITED, Whitefriars House, London, E.C.4 and Published by THE SPEAKER PUBLISHING COMPANY, LIMITED, at the Offices, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C. Registered at the General Post Office as a Newspaper.—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1908.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 19.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage : U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 657	The Revival of Home Rule. By A. M. Sullivan ... 676
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Simple Bible Teaching. By J. Allanson Picton ... 677
The Liberal Intervention ... 660	The Church and the Liberal Party. By Lt. Col. D. C. Pedder and A. J. B. ... 677
The Future of Portugal ... 661	The Historians' History. By Aylmer Maude ... 678
The Real Danger in Ireland ... 662	Mid Devon and the Small Holdings and Allotments Act. By the Rev. J. Frome Wilkinson ... 678
The Policy of the South African Dominion ... 663	The Best Children's Books. By M. J. ... 679
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	"A Woman's Charter." By Mrs. Frederic Harrison and E. L. C. Watson ... 679
The Ethics of Violence ... 665	POETRY:—
The Re-appearance of Asia ... 666	Hope and Despair. By Lancelles Abercrombie ... 679
The Russian Priest ... 667	REVIEWS:—
The Winter Iris ... 668	The Spirit of the Age ... 680
England and Mr. Meredith. By G. M. Trevelyan ... 669	Ghosts of Poetry ... 681
THE DRAMA:—	Elizabeth Gunning ... 682
A Licensed Play. By M. ... 670	NOVELS OF THE WEEK ... 683
MUSIC:—	SOME THEOLOGICAL BOOKS ... 684
Opera in England ... 671	BOOKS IN BRIEF ... 686
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 672	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 688
Books to be Read ... 672
OPEN QUESTIONS:—
"The Right to Labour." By J. A. H. ... 673
CONTEMPORARIES:—
Governor Hughes ... 674
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
"Waste" and the Censor. By G. Bernard Shaw ... 675

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

On Saturday evening the King of Portugal and his heir, the Duke of Braganza, a youth of twenty, were shot dead while driving from the Lisbon landing-stage on their return from Villa Vicosa. The murders were extraordinarily brutal. The Queen and the Infante Manuel, the new King, a boy of eighteen, were in the same carriage, but the Queen escaped without hurt, and the Infante, who, like his mother, showed great courage received only slight wounds. The assassination was carefully organised, and was carried out by a number of men, who had concealed carbines and revolvers under their cloaks; three of them were killed in the attempt, all of them Portuguese. It is not yet known whether they were Anarchists, or members of an orthodox political party. An armed attack is said to have been made on Senhor Franco's house the same evening. Most rulers and parliaments, including our own, have expressed strong sympathy with the Portuguese House, but the Press in some countries, in particular the Italian Press, has not hesitated to criticise the late King with great freedom. The murder came as a surprise to the outside world, owing to the stringent censorship in Portugal. Senhor Franco, the Dictator, had during the last few weeks treated his opponents with reckless severity. Hundreds had been imprisoned, including distinguished party leaders, and on the day of the regicide a decree was published suspending parliamentary immunity and deporting many persons to Africa.

* * *

SENHOR FRANCO, who was Premier from May, 1906, and, from April, 1907, Dictator without a parliament, but with the full confidence of King Carlos, whom he had granted a large increase of the Civil List, resigned office on Monday, and has left the country. A Cabinet of Monarchical concentration has been formed, Conservatives and Liberals uniting under Vice-Admiral Ferreira do Amaral, whose policy is unknown. The censorship prevents any reliable news as to the state of the country being obtained. It is therefore impossible to say whether a serious Republican movement is afoot in which army and navy are involved. But the character of the new ministry, and the unsuccessful attempt to take Senhor Alpoim, leader of the advanced Liberals, and one of Senhor Franco's opponents, out of gaol into the Cabinet, suggest that those who know best have grave misapprehensions. Two British warships have been dispatched to Lisbon, presumably to safeguard British subjects, and without any idea of influencing Portuguese domestic politics. The two Houses of Parliament passed unanimous resolutions of sympathy with the surviving members of the Portuguese Royal Family, and the human side of the tragedy was emphasised with simple and sincere feeling in the Prime Minister's speech.

* * *

MR. MURRAY MACDONALD's important amendment to the Address, regretting that the Government had failed to announce an intention to reduce armaments, was withdrawn on Wednesday in consideration of a specific pledge, tendered by the Prime Minister, that a day should be given for the discussion of the motion before any vote was taken on the Army or the Navy Estimates, and before the Speaker left the chair and Committee of Supply was set up. Then, he said, there would be a full opportunity of discussing "increases or decreases" in the votes and the reasons for them. This pledge was the result of an interview with Mr. Asquith, in which representatives of the majority informed the Chancellor that many of them would be compelled to vote against the Government. This firm communication was made known to the Prime Minister. An urgent whip was sent out by Mr. Whiteley, pointing out that the Macdonald motion amounted to a vote of censure, and hinting at resignation. But this language did not shake the party, seriously disturbed by the prospect of the diversion of the fund for social reform to the needs of a large programme of new naval construction in 1909, unaccompanied by any serious reduction in the cost of the Army. A strong movement, hostile to such a policy, is now being organised in Parliament and the constituencies. We hope the Free Church Council, which is shortly to meet, will powerfully contribute to it.

* * *

FOREIGN and Imperial affairs have been much in evidence during the week. On Thursday Lord Curzon criticised brilliantly and with small reserves the Anglo-Russian agreement. He attacked it mainly on the side for which the strongest case can be made out—that, namely, which concerns the Indian frontiers. Here however, it conflicts with Lord Curzon's policy in Afghanistan, and more conspicuously, in Thibet. He approved the new British policy of seeking alliances and understandings, in place of the old isolation or independence. But he thought the specific bargain with Russia a bad one. In Persia the Russian sphere had been carried too far south, and he thought Russia would permeate the country with railways, while our position in the South was not strengthened, and our interests in the Persian Gulf were left unmentioned and unsecured. In Afghanistan we had tied our own hands and those of the Ameer, and in Thibet had thrown British "predominance" away. Lord Curzon's view was almost directly countered by Lord Cromer, who is beginning to play an interesting part in our politics as an exponent of the "cross-bench mind." He thought that the Convention powerfully aided the general treatment of Eastern problems by Western Powers, especially in view of the increasing unrest in Asia, and of the rise of the spirit of nationality. Lord Fitzmaurice said that the new instrument marked the end of a long and useless struggle with Russia, and that our hold on important trade routes in Persia was maintained. Furthermore, our position on the Persian Gulf question was well defined, and could only have been weakened by a specific reference in the Convention.

* * *

WE wish that it were possible to avoid the practice of treating all amendments to the Address as votes of "no confidence" in the Government, and that at least some such debates could be made academic. Then the real opinion of the House could be disclosed without infringing on party territory. These considerations apply to two of Thursday's debates—the first on Sir William Holland's proposal to raise the status of the President of the Board of Trade to that of a Secretary of State. The motion was supported from the Tory side by Mr. Long and Mr. Bonar Law, and would doubtless have been carried on its merits. Mr. Asquith, however, suggested the reasonable course of a much-needed general inquiry into the status of the various departments of government, and the allocation of duties. This is especially necessary in the case of the Board of Trade, the Local Government Board, and the Home Office, whose functions are hopelessly confused. But the urgent case is that of the Board of Trade, and we hope, in the interests of British trade, that the Government will not hesitate to raise its status.

* * *

THE other important debate on Thursday was on Mr. F. E. Smith's amendment regretting that the Government had failed to support at The Hague the principle of the immunity of an enemy's merchant vessels not carrying contraband. Mr. Smith's argument was close and brilliant, and had behind it what he described as the "strong and unanimous opinion" of the Chambers of Commerce. Mr. Smith's chief point was an amplification of the argument that we have the most to lose by the exposure of commerce owing to the enormous preponderance of our carrying trade, and of our marine insurance. Sir Edward Grey, speaking with great ability, maintained his hostility. He denied that the British refusal to grant immunity from capture at sea affected the question of disarmament, which was entirely separate. If our enemy's private property at sea was to be immune, our power of bringing a naval war to a reasonably quick end would be gravely reduced. Thus there would be a temptation on the part of hostile Powers to "speculate" in war, which for them would, under the rule of immunity, be almost a war without risk. This would lead to an increase, not a decrease, of armaments. This argument ignores the point that our risk under the law of capture is the greatest of all. The official Opposition supported Sir Edward Grey, and Mr. Smith's amendment was withdrawn.

* * *

MR. LONG'S Amendment to the Address, denouncing the Government for failing to repress intimidation and lawlessness in Ireland, was rejected on Tuesday by a majority of 229, 414 voting for it, 115 against. The attack, in Mr. Balfour's absence, was conducted at once weakly and violently on the lines of Lord Lansdowne's earlier charge that the state of Ireland resembled that of Macedonia, where in four years 10,000 people had been done to death. The Liberal answer, brilliantly sustained by Mr. Birrell and Mr. Cherry, was that there was less crime at the end of 1907 than under Conservative rule in 1902, when boycotting was allowed to take its course. In 1902 there were 39 cases of murder, in 1907 there were seven, of which none were agrarian, whilst cattle-driving was almost at an end. Asked to resort to coercion, Mr. Birrell replied with a blow on the box, "I won't." Cattle-driving, he said, did not terrify him, but he was alarmed at the low price of land stock, the prospect of bad seasons, and the fear of disappointing the land hunger. To Sir Edward Carson's complaint that out of 532 persons prosecuted by the Government during the last twelve months not a dozen had been convicted under the ordinary law, the reply was that the Government had succeeded in their real object of putting down cattle-driving, even if they had failed in their second object of punishing cattle-drivers. The voting showed no defection from the Liberal majority.

* * *

MUCH the most salient feature of the Irish debate was the speech of Lord Dudley, who specifically joined himself with the late Lord Carnarvon and the long series of Unionist officials whose Irish experience has led them a long way or all the way to Home Rule. He thought cattle-driving was largely a political movement, due to the disappointment at the failure of the Councils Bill. Coercion was inconsistent with Unionism, which implied three conditions; a united and sympathetic Imperial Parliament, similarity of Irish and British institutions, and the adherence and support of the majority of the Irish people. Coercion only made fulfilment of those conditions impossible. The government of Ireland by Irish ideas was elementary, and represented the one chance for Unionism. If it broke down, and there was a perpetual see-saw between conciliation and coercion, he preferred an amendment in the system of Irish Government to a policy of extreme force. No deeper saying about Ireland has been spoken since the Gladstonian orations.

* * *

SOUTH Herefordshire has followed Mid Devon, and a seat held, or rather captured, by a Liberal at the General Election, has returned to the Opposition. The late Colonel Gardner only carried the seat in 1906 by a majority of 312. On Friday week his successor, Mr. Whitley Thomson, lost it by a majority of 1,019, the Liberal vote decreasing by 569, and the Unionist vote increasing by 762. Captain Clive, like Captain Morrison-Bell, was a strong if qualified Protectionist, and had old local associations. Furthermore, the dishonest but short-sighted course of using the high price of bread both as a weapon against a Liberal Free Trade Government and as an argument for a Protectionist candidate, was adopted in both constituencies. There, however, the parallel with Mid Devon ends. The Ross Division has only been in Liberal hands since Home Rule days, and its capture two years ago represented the violent swinging of the electoral pendulum rather than its normal course. Meanwhile two other vacancies, that of St. Austell in Cornwall, and of Mid Glamorgan, where the new Solicitor-General, Sir S. T. Evans, sought election, have been kept by the Liberals without a fight.

* * *

DR. JAMESON has resigned the Premiership of Cape Colony, and, as we anticipated, has been succeeded in the Premiership by Mr. Merriman, with Mr. Sauer as Minister of Public Works, and Mr. Malan, the chief representative of the Bond, as Minister of Agriculture. The other four posts in the new Cabinet are equally divided between Dutchmen and Englishmen, the two latter Ministers, Mr. Burton and Mr. Currey, being men of high character and moderate views. It is suggested that the new Government may drop the preference of 25 per cent. on English imported goods. If this be so the responsibility must largely rest with Lord Milner, who engineered the preferential policy by bureaucratic rather than by popular methods.

* * *

It is understood that Baron von Stengel, who has been German Imperial Finance Minister since August, 1903, will shortly retire. The five years of his tenure of office have been full of financial difficulty. The reversion to Protection, which Bismarck brought about in 1878, already in 1897 began to fail to provide a revenue adequate to the increased expenditure, especially the expenditure on the navy, and for years the Empire has met a chronic deficit by means of loans. In 1906 Baron von Stengel introduced some new taxes; these changes were too slight, and some ill-advised. He has this year been trying to persuade the party leaders to accept a partial Imperial monopoly of the spirit trade, and an excise duty on tobacco. The Left section of the Bloc disapproved the scheme; it prefers direct to indirect taxation—an increase, for instance, of the Imperial death duties, and a revision of the State contributions, to be based upon wealth, as well as upon population. Prince Bülow is not prepared for anything so Radical. It is significant that the successor to Baron von Stengel is expected to be a bank director, like Herr Dernburg, the Colonial Secretary; the alliance between the German squirarchy and the German plutocracy is no longer disguised. Meanwhile, the financial difficulty greatly affects the German naval programme. The very anti-German Berlin correspondent of the "Times," though he deprecates "waving" on the part of "Radical and Labour members" here, says that it is probable that many of the German experiments in naval construction will prove to be as unsatisfactory as their predecessors, that "anything (on our part) in the nature of the hurry and haste which is being displayed in Germany would doubtless be unwise," and that we should aim at avoiding, "by the most careful consideration of new developments in construction," the errors which she has made.

* * *

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT has replied vigorously to his critics in a special message to Congress, in which his familiar views are expressed with vehement and unsparing eloquence. He urges labour legislation imposing liability upon employers, especially upon the State, and restricting the scandalously free issue of judicial injunctions in strikes. He wants the Commerce Commission to have power to review railway rates, to control the running of railways, and to value their property so as to prevent the "watering" of stock. He wants the Sherman anti-Trust Act amended so as to apply only against noxious combinations, and he would have the Federal Government attack Stock Exchange gambling by withdrawing from it the use of the mails, the telephones, and the telegraph. In conclusion, he hotly assails the Standard Oil Trust and Mr. Harriman, and scornfully denies all responsibility for the financial panic.

* * *

THE message, synchronising with a recurrence of bank collapse in New York, has found a warmer welcome among the Democrats than the Republicans. Mr. Roosevelt's prestige has declined, and his message is generally treated as a personal defence, without compelling effect upon legislation. From the point of view of statesmanship it errs by being the expression of feeling rather than of a policy, but its moral daring may touch the emotional side of American public life, and its strong language and tone are already echoed and even augmented by Mr. Bryan. The difficulty of reform legislation is illustrated by a Supreme Court decision that the Employers' Liability Law is unconstitutional, a decision which has been followed by another to the same effect as our own Taff Vale decision, which may possibly produce a corresponding effect upon American politics. Mr. Hughes, Governor of New York, has entered into open competition with Mr. Taft for the Republican presidential nomination, but among the Democrats Mr. Bryan has still no serious rival.

* * *

ON Tuesday, Lord Robert Cecil moved an amendment to the Address, in which he asked the House to censure Mr. McKenna for having violated "the traditional principles of administration in this country." He described the action of the Swansea Education Authority in refusing to pay in Church schools salaries equivalent to those paid in Council schools as "a chicanery that would disgrace a County Court." Mr. McKenna had given an undue share of the grant of £100,000 to his own Monmouthshire constituency, and, like an ex-poacher, had acted "under the influence of the blackmail of his former associates." Mr. McKenna's reply disposed of all these charges. In the Swansea difficulty he had acted in conformity with the practice of his predecessor, he had no power to enforce the payment of equal salaries in all schools, and no part of the building grant obtained last Session had been allocated to that part of Monmouthshire with which he was specially connected. On the question of the training colleges, Mr. McKenna declared he had put no duty upon the trustees to have their trust-deeds altered. But if these trustees took public money they must conform to public conditions.

* * *

SIR ARTHUR VICARS has been removed from his position as Ulster King of Arms, and the Vice-Regal Commission has issued a report on the loss of the Crown jewels, which seems on the face of it to justify that step. The evidence showed that the jewels were not kept in a strong room, but in a very accessible library at the Office of Arms, that seven latchkeys gave admittance to the office, that the office cleaner twice reported to Sir Arthur Vicars that she had found the outer doors unlocked, within a few days or hours of the theft, and that he took no notice of the incident. On these facts the Commission founded its conclusion that he failed properly to discharge his task of guardianship. Sir Arthur Vicars, in a letter to the Under-Secretary, qualifies one or two of these statements, but hardly disputes their general bearing.

* * *

WE have received, too late for insertion in our correspondence columns, the following important letter from Mr. Montagu Harris, the secretary of the County Councils Association, in answer to the criticisms by Mr. Impey of the action and disposition of County Councils towards the Small Holdings Act. It runs as follows:—

To the Editor of THE NATION.

While Mr. Impey is naturally, and properly, proud of the action which his own County Council has taken in the matter of small holdings, may I venture to suggest that he does rather less than justice to other County Councils in his letter to THE NATION last week? No doubt many members of County Councils in every part of the country expressed strong objections to the Bill during its passage through Parliament, and objections were also raised by the County Councils Association, but these latter objections were satisfactorily met, and, now that the Bill has become law, the County Councils, on their part have eliminated all party feeling in the matter, and show a general readiness to carry out their duties under the Act. I feel sure that the Board of Agriculture would endorse this assertion, which is borne out by a return set out in the official circular of the County Councils Association, giving a short statement of the preliminary proceedings of each County Council under the Act. If it be said that this merely shows formal official compliance with the terms of the Act and of the circulars of the Board of Agriculture without being any evidence of good will, I would urge that local authorities can only be judged by their actions, that they have done all they could be expected to do in the time which has elapsed since the passing of the Act, and that to create or foster an element of distrust in the County Councils before any neglect of their duties under the Act has been proved against them would be more likely to hinder than to forward the extension of small holdings.—Yours, &c.

G. MONTAGU HARRIS.

Politics and Affairs.

THE LIBERAL INTERVENTION.

"Sir Robert Peel had anticipated him (Cobden) in pressing upon Parliament the danger to European order arising from military expenditure. Heavy military expenditure, he said, meant heavy taxation, and heavy taxation meant discontent and revolution. That wise statesman had courageously repudiated the old maxim, Bellum para si pacem velis. A maxim that admits of more contradiction, he said, or one that should be received with greater reserve, never fell from the lips of man. What is always still more important, Peel was not afraid to say that it is impossible to secure a country against all conceivable risks. If in time of peace you insist on having all the colonial garrisons up to the standard of complete efficiency, and if every fortification is to be kept in a state of perfect repair, then no amount of annual expenditure can ever be sufficient. If you accept the opinions of military men, who tell a Minister that they would throw upon him the whole responsibility in the event of a war breaking out, and predict the loss of this or the other valuable possession, then the country must be overwhelmed by taxation. It is inevitable that risks should be run. Peel's declaration was, and must at all times remain, the language of common sense, and it furnishes the key to Cobden's characteristic attitude towards a whole class of political questions where his counsels have been most persistently disregarded."—Morley's Life of Cobden.

THE dramatic intervention of the Liberal Party in Parliament has, we hope, secured an arrest of the policy of a heavy and permanent increase in armaments. On the first steps of such a policy the Government, there is only too much reason to fear, have been invited to embark. They are now seized of the prevailing opinion of their supporters, and they have properly decided to avert an imminent and perilous breach with it. Mr. Murray Macdonald's motion is to be held over, and the House and the majority are to discuss the naval and military plans of the Government with full knowledge, and in freedom. The Macdonald motion is withdrawn as an amendment to the Address, but it will reappear, if necessary, as an amendment to the Naval and the Army Estimates, or both. It is freely stated that both the Prime Minister and the Chancellor of the Exchequer regard the action of the majority with not unfriendly eyes, and that they may have before them no harder task than the forcing of a half-open door. This is a reasonable proposition. No two members of the Government are more deeply pledged to take what Mr. Asquith called in April, 1906, "speedy and substantial steps" in the direction of reducing the "permanent fighting force" of the army, and "contracting the shipbuilding programme." None can be more clearly aware that the two policies of heavy warlike expenditure and social reform meet each other not as friends, but as enemies, and that the victory of the one implies the suppression of the other. The same confrontation faced the late Government, as it faces all Governments. They decided against social reform. They were beaten at the polls by men who carried with them, even at the period of the fall of the Unionist Party, and from a warlike Parliament, an almost universal, and in the case of the army a definite and tangible, movement for the reduction of armaments. This movement was rational, for much of the after-war expenditure on the Navy was in the nature of a special effort. But special efforts tend to become normal standards when the war services are concerned, and to-day, after the remission of about one-sixth of the war taxation, the Government, we are warned, may have to announce the virtual cessation of the policy of reduction, and may meet next year's Parliament with a demand for a sensational resumption of the race of armaments.

This is a grave situation, not relieved by the fact that Liberal journals like the "Westminster Gazette" deny, with some assurance, the validity of the plea for a reduction either of the army or of the navy estimates, and pretend that at some unknown conjuncture "at Akabah" the party assented, "as an agreed case," to let the Government take the risk of war with Turkey, and thus committed itself to support the existing standards of army expenditure. We are afraid we do not quite recognise "Akabah," and we may even suggest a certain want of candour in the argument that something that Sir Edward Grey would not have been allowed to do there, and, we hope, would not have wanted to do there, involved the Liberal Party in any kind of responsibility whatever. If, however, such a responsibility was really incurred at that mystic moment, and we have further declared ourselves pledged to a great policy of "Dreadnought" building—as the "Westminster" also implies—we would suggest that the execution of this interesting programme should be left to a body which can do the work in unity and with gusto. The Liberal Party has neither the men nor the taste for it.

Let us turn for a moment to the material of this controversy. The new situation, as we have explained, arises in part from the revised German programme of shipbuilding. That programme is not an act, it is a project. Even if it and its financial scheme pass the Reichstag, it will not even begin to materialise in floating ships till 1910. Before that time, we, excluding the entire bulk of fighting strength on which Admiral von Tirpitz reported to the Kaiser that the power of the German fleet was about a fourth of our own, shall have twelve new, huge vessels of the "Dreadnought" class, or near it, at sea. More than this, there is no period of Germany's programme, extending as it does to 1920, with a weakening force all through its later phase, when she can claim other than a striking inferiority to our own freshly organised, freshly built fleet. That fleet possesses a new and sound organisation, an unrivalled prestige, a wealth of experience, tried ability, and genius for seamanship, as well as of resources and appliances for rapid and skilful shipbuilding, which Germany cannot pretend to command. The nation has a right to ask that these moral considerations shall have sway, in addition to the material advantages we have enumerated. But beyond this, we have to ask whether the calculations of the Government or of the Admiralty exclude the classes of great new vessels, the "King Edwards," the "Formidables," the "Duncans," and the rest—which gave us overwhelming supremacy at sea before the unfortunate experiment in "Dreadnoughts" began. If they are included, the question of serious rivalry on the part of Germany is at an end. If they are excluded, if only "Dreadnoughts" count, and it is necessary to concentrate on them, let us at once begin saving the money and the men we devote to keeping the older ships in commission. The Admiralty cannot have it both ways. They cannot call these splendid ships worthless, or nearly worthless, in comparison with the "Dreadnoughts" and keep them in being. They cannot say that they are effective, and declare that for purposes of comparison with Germany they will not count them in. Or to put the point in practical form, if we are to compete on the new type, we can call for saving on the old.

We have one other remark to make, which is of consequence when we embark on a policy that must one day lead us to the brink of war with Germany, or push us over the brink. Who rules the foreign and naval policy of this country? The Cabinet or the "experts"? In the consideration of offensive power is it the Cabinet, with its special knowledge of our relations to foreign Powers, and the warlike or diplomatic engagements which modify those relations, which really rules, or do the "experts" dictate to the Cabinet, enforcing their demands with threats of resignation, and basing those demands on a narrow set of technical considerations? The answer to the question is important for two reasons. The first is that we are beginning to drag our "experts" to the front, and to look to their utterances to soothe or to whip up our fears. In this case their response happens to have been singularly cheering, judging by Sir John Fisher's historic utterance at the Guildhall. But to make such a use of the "expert" is to destroy the responsibility of Ministers, and particularly to place Liberal Ministers almost as much at the mercy of their technical advisers as they are at the mercy of the House of Lords. There is another consideration. Experts are only human. If they are drawn into the sphere of policy, they become subject to a set of influences which are naturally disturbing to them. Sir John Fisher has been subject to gross attack from officers on active service. There have been threats that those attacks would be transferred to the benches of the House of Commons. Thus menaced, a naval officer is under a peculiar temptation to avoid the suspicion of having asked too little for the service of the fleet. And it is with this position, at this grave juncture of policy, that Sir John Fisher and his colleagues have been faced.

For these reasons we hope that the Government and the party between them will stand firm when they are invited, as they are being invited even by their own newspapers, to write their principles out of their policy, as soon as those principles have done their work of popular attraction on the platform and at the polls. A Liberal Government without Liberal ideas will not go far. We are told that it cannot touch Home Rule. We know that it will not handle the suffrage. It has avoided the Disestablishment of the Church. If it is now disabled from contributing to the cause of international peace, or from abating the inflated volume of our warlike expenditure, where lies the ground of its appeal to the democracy save in those few projects of social reform which can escape rigorous abridgment at the hands of the House of Lords? We take no fanatical ground on the fleet. We believe it should be much the best and strongest fleet. But we have high naval authority for the theory, which is the best working theory of our naval construction, that with our superior power of rapid shipbuilding, we should act after and not before such sensational developments as the paper German programme—a bad and unnecessary programme—presents. There is ample time to pause, to consider, to survey the new and grave emergency which has arisen in the direction of the world's affairs. The latest news from Germany speaks of the breakdown of the financial scheme on which the new Naval Estimates were built, and of the withdrawal of the Minister responsible for it. A huge British programme, rapidly produced in answer to the German instrument, will make not for peace but for war. That war will never be waged by Liberal statesmen. But its inevitability may, in a fatal hour, be decreed by them.

THE FUTURE OF PORTUGAL.

ASSASSINATION belongs to the pathology of politics—a subject which we treat at length elsewhere—and the brutal crime which had King Carlos and Prince Luis of Portugal for its victims is no exception to the rule. Within our own times it has never happened that a really cruel sovereign has been murdered by his people. Nicholas I. and Alexander III. of Russia were never in serious danger; it was the romantic and sensitive Alexander II. who fell, with the draft of a Constitution in his pocket. Alexander of Servia was a bad and erratic King, but he was not a cruel and worthless man, like his father Milan. The Bombas and the Abdul Hamids are rarely in grave danger; it is the Humberts, the Carnots, and the Garfields who have perished. There were the Kings of Portugal in the last century, whose reigns were a nightmare of bloodshed. But King Carlos, with all his faults, had confined himself to the sort of repression which the French call a "dry" terror. The crime which removed him was, moreover, as stupid as it was savage. Of all the forms of murder the one which is most certain to stir the pity of mankind is that which assails a man when his wife and children are around him. Every circumstance of the tragedy was designed to make us forget the King in the man, and the functionary in the father. The result is what might have been predicted. On Saturday morning the Republicans were combating an unpopular and discredited King, with a past of error and failure behind him. On Saturday night he was succeeded by an attractive lad and an admirable woman, whose best shield is the natural chivalry which their helplessness and their innocence evoke.

It is no easy task to form a fair and objective opinion upon the crisis which has ended in this crime. Observers, who seem to start from the same premises, arrive at the most opposite conclusions in judging the dictatorship which King Carlos and Senhor Franco established. The "Times" gave them its warm approval, while the "Temps," arguing from the same standpoint of constitutional conservatism, was contemptuous and hostile. The semi-official Italian "Tribuna" has virtually justified the assassination, and the Spanish press, though more decent and restrained, sympathises with the Opposition. The Italian attitude is probably an expression of resentment against the extreme clericalism of the Portuguese Court, which had found expression on one occasion in an act of gross discourtesy towards Italy. Our own Imperialists remembered the many links, dynastic, financial, and colonial, which bind Lisbon to London. It was part of the Republican case against King Carlos, from the days of the Serpa Pinto affair onward, that, as one of their exiled leaders put it the other day in a violent phrase, he had "sold his country to England." Censored news and the bias of national interest make it difficult to reach a conclusion, but certain facts at least are fairly clear. It is common ground to the critics and defenders of the Dictatorship that Portuguese politics towards the year 1906 had reached the nadir of degradation. Commerce languished, agriculture was in decay, large tracts of the sparsely peopled interior lay untilled, and the peasantry looked to Brazil for their future. Burdened with a colossal debt, and just emerging from national bankruptcy, the country had mortgaged its revenues to its external creditors, loaded the masses with food taxes, and leased important monopolies to foreign financiers. Politics were the game of a small upper class, for the peasantry is as illiterate as that of Russia and much less intelligent. Regenerators (Conservatives) and Progressives (Liberals) came and went in an atmosphere of scandal, "making" the elections without an attempt at disguise. No ideas divided them; they were rival but mutually complaisant syndicates for the distribution of the spoils of office. Sinecures abounded, and one reads of a prominent Cabinet Minister who drew in Lisbon year after year his salary as titular Ambassador to China. The King was an item in the system. A man of unusual powers of mind and body, full of the joy of life, a sportsman, a bon vivant, a translator of Shakespeare, and an artist of some talent, he lived much beyond the limits of his relatively ample civil List. His gaiety, popular as it was in Paris, was onerous for the Portuguese taxpayer. "Reduced to expedients," as an official document put it, he used to levy toll upon the accommodating ministries as they came and went, receiving clandestine "loans" from the Treasury, and on occasion selling to the nation a palace which the nation had built. Save in the conduct of foreign affairs, where he was consistently Anglophil, he meddled, until recently, but little in politics.

The crash came in 1906, when each of the Royalist parties in turn became involved in unsavoury financial scandals concerning the tobacco monopoly. Republicanism was active in the background; it was necessary to find a new man. Senhor Joao Franco became Premier, at the head of a minute group, dependent on Liberal support. He was young, energetic, and self-confident, too wealthy to be suspected of receiving bribes, an opportunist who had already held office in a Conservative Government. From the first the Peers opposed him, and in May, 1907, the Liberals in the elective House withdrew their support. He stood alone, with only the King to back him, and since he did not choose to resign, he suspended the sittings of Parliament, and governed by administrative decree. Others before him have done the same thing in Portugal; his position differed from theirs, however, in one vital particular. Previous "dictators" had been party chiefs, who had on their side one section or the other of the ruling class; Senhor Franco was simply the King's man. He proposed to clean out "the Augean stables," and to inaugurate an epoch of retrenchment and reform. Of his "reforms" little has been heard, save of an alteration in the constitution of the Upper House, which had foiled him. But he suppressed the sinecures held by his opponents, and was himself, by all accounts, inaccessible to bribes. On the other hand, his financial measures, whatever else might be said for them, had this in common, that they all tended to secure his own position. He increased the King's Civil List, by his mere autocratic decree, and regularised all the "loans" of his predecessors by converting them into grants. He raised the pay of the officers of the army (while suppressing some ornamental generals), and won popularity among civilian officials by a like device. His friends argue that avowed grants to the King were less objectionable than secret loans, and that the officers and officials were really underpaid. His critics see in these "reforms" only a colossal system of open corruption, by which Senhor Franco bribed the King, the army, and the bureaucracy, to acquiesce in his usurpation.

Whatever view we take of these proceedings, it is clear enough that no real reform of Portuguese politics was possible by such methods. The only reform worth having is a reform of public opinion. Efficiency and honesty are comparatively worthless and unlikely to be permanent, unless a nation demands them and watches over them. Politics are primarily the art of persuasion. Senhor Franco did not persuade; he coerced. As month by month went by, and the King declared that he meant to keep his Dictator in power for two years at least, the discontent and the repression kept pace one with the other. Newspapers, public meetings, and municipal councils were suppressed all over the kingdom; judicial guarantees were suspended, and politicians were exiled or imprisoned by the hundred. Some of the Opposition was interested, and we need not assume that the voteless and illiterate peasants, always Catholic and therefore Conservative, were much perturbed. The active discontent came less from the venal professional politicians, who rarely cared to face the risks involved in the extremer forms of protest, than from the "intellectuals," who rallied round the Republicans and the Radicals ("Dissident Progressives"). The logic of Senhor Franco's experiment made directly for Republicanism. He told the country that the constitutional monarchy was morally bankrupt, that its two ruling parties were hopelessly corrupt, and that only his own dictatorship could save the country from ruin. Unfortunately, no one in Portugal felt able to take the view which commended itself to Mr. Pearson's newspapers—that King Carlos and Senhor Franco were its most natural saviours. To the unchecked rule of these two men, the better elements of Portuguese society were coming to feel that a Republic might be preferable. In the absence of uncensored news it is quite impossible for us to know how serious were the efforts made between Wednesday and Sunday to bring about a change of régime. Senhor Franco has fallen, and that is well. But the coalition which has replaced him is drawn from the two discredited official parties. In due time they will "make" fresh elections and compose a new Cortes. The more virile elements which would have tried a new experiment will be carefully excluded from power or influence. From the standpoint of our Imperial interests, any Portuguese Government which respects these interests is as good as another, and no Portuguese Government could in practice do otherwise. British intervention from the days of General Beresford's armies down to Palmerston's intrigues, has been a potent factor in the shaping of Portuguese destinies. The results in the past were far from happy, and few of us would wish to see Downing Street attempt once more to play providence to Lisbon.

THE REAL DANGER IN IRELAND.

THE atmosphere of misrepresentation which has accumulated round the Irish question during the recess was roughly dissipated in the debates of this week in the House of Commons. Rarely has an impeachment, marshalled with some parade of circumstance, collapsed so signally in contact with reality. Mr. Birrell, entombed in the dusty machinery of Irish government in Dublin Castle, was subjected to a concerted attack, carefully worked up in the Unionist Press, which pictured Ireland as simmering in a savage revolution, with a vacillating Minister afraid to offer elemental protection to life and property. There were cries of horror at the prevalence of "cattle driving." There was an exaggeration of every violation of the law, with whatever motive, in any village or town of the country. If similar attention had been devoted to crime in England or Scotland, the respectable Press of this country would have been converted into a replica of those Sunday journals which, with their stuffed columns of murder, outrage, and indecency, read like monstrous dreams. And there were demands, becoming ever more imperious in their emphasis, for the resort once more to the special tribunals and methods of coercion as a means of breaking the spirit of the Irish people. The thing went with a swing and confidence, until it was compelled to justify its affirmations in open Parliamentary debate. Then it crumbled to pieces. Mr. Birrell, in his passionate and eloquent speech of last Monday, had no difficulty in showing that Ireland, in comparison with England and Scotland, had a sheet almost clean of serious crime. He was compelled to acknowledge sporadic cattle driving, sporadic boycotting, sporadic attempts at intimidation. These are always with us in Ireland: will always be with us in that conflict between two races which is a legacy from the past. But he could demonstrate, as Lord Salisbury once demonstrated, the impossibility of destroying such random and complex outbreaks by any large process of Government repression. You may protect—it is essential that you should protect—the man in the village to whom his neighbours will not speak; but no law can compel his neighbours to speak to him. An organised boycotting conspiracy can be assailed; you cannot bring an impeachment against the public opinion of a countryside.

The Chief Secretary could show also a limitation of these minor offences and a complete absence of the major offences, of murder and cattle maiming, which make the situation different, not only in degree, but in kind, from the situation when coercion was first placed permanently on the statute book. He could reveal a Conservative Government seven years ago turning contemptuously and impatiently away from similar demands, made under similar circumstances by the Irish Unionist Association, for a vendetta against the common people of Ireland. He deplored cattle driving, but he could exhibit it as a symptom of disease, not (as is the accepted version) an outbreak of lawlessness under a Liberal regime. No sane man would devote his nights to cattle driving if "lawlessness" was what he desired. Cattle driving is a symptom of the failure of the promises of the Wyndham Act to divide up the untenanted land of the West, at a fair rent, amongst the uneconomic holdings. He repudiated with some anger the widespread calumny that he had offered the Roman Catholic hierarchy in Ireland a clerical university in return for their promise to suppress cattle driving. And he pleaded for his two Bills—the Land Bill with its compulsory purchase clauses, and the University Bill—as means not of forcing down discontent by suppression into illegitimate channels, but as attempts—even if interim attempts—to deal with the discontents in their origins.

This vindication of a Liberal policy in Ireland—of the only possible Liberal policy in Ireland—was very greatly assisted by two elements in the debate. These were the failure of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and the sensational intervention of Lord Dudley in the House of Lords. In the Commons, where the indispensable services of Mr. Arthur Balfour on the Front Opposition Bench are only realised when these services are for some reason dispensed with, there was no attempt at the suggestion of a practicable alternative. The responsible leaders, when the moment came, flinched from demanding the application of the Crimes Act. Yet the only alternative to the present policy is the application of the Crimes Act. Without such alternative, the attack merely became a nagging, either at the Liberal Government or at the Irish people. And no sane man doubts that if the Crimes Act had been put into force, so many counties proclaimed, so many prisons stuffed with cattle-drivers, on the conviction of resident magistrates, without trial by jury, the whole of Ireland to-day, instead of being peaceful, would have been in turmoil. The very elements which now are exercising influences for law and order, would have been swept over into furious opposition to the Administration. Tories may exercise some pleasurable ingenuity in devising accusations depending not upon any particular Liberal policy, but upon the fundamental and deplorable realities of Irish life and its relations with its dominant neighbour. But the users of them should realise that on this particular subject they are playing with fire. Certainly that was the warning addressed to them in no uncertain accents by a Conservative ex-Viceroy in the House of Lords. Lord Dudley, in a speech which was marked by moderation, dignity, and some real sense of the gravity of the questions at issue, protested in the name of Unionism against policies which had made Unionism utterly repugnant to the whole people. The habitual recourse to Coercion—most attractive of present remedies, most impossible of permanent cures—is as the habitual recourse of prison warder or schoolmaster to the rod or the lash in order to suppress disturbances. It has merely made the British rule more hated, the resolution of the masses of the people more implacable, that they will never reconcile themselves to its continuance. It is the clumsy and brutal weapon of a national despair. There are only two ultimate alternatives, the Lord Chancellor declared—Crown Colony Government and Home Rule. The Crown Colony Government would be that of the Transvaal under Lord Milner, full of the elements of secret resentment and aspiration after ultimate freedom. The Home Rule Government would be that of the Transvaal under the new constitution, with the British and Dutch flags flying together over the Parliament House, and those who were once the most formidable of our enemies in the time of warfare now the most trustworthy of our allies in the work of reconciliation. There is a danger in the future of Ireland to-day. That danger does not lie in the fear of the continued indignation of the English people against the Irish. It lies in a far more fatal indifference. The House of Commons this week was profoundly bored with these Irish questions. The people, as a whole, can neither be roused to fury by the tale of Irish outrage, nor excited to enthusiasm by the programme of Irish reform. Exceedingly anxious to study its own social diseases and find remedy for them, England should be very content to let Ireland go its own way, to work out its own salvation in any scheme of self-government compatible with the safety of the Empire.

THE POLICY OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN DOMINION.

THE resignation of Dr. Jameson and the formation of a Government in Cape Colony, resting on the South African Party which sprang up after the war, complete the cycle of State Governments in the sub-Continent drawing their main but not their sole strength from the Dutch element. Dr. Jameson is an amiable personality, but we cannot say that we are sorry to see the chief actor in the Raid dissociated from the service of the Crown. South Africa now swings back into her natural orbit, from which a vain attempt was made to deflect her. All who knew her history and realised what was the most powerful factor in her white population, and where the most natural gift for politics resided, foresaw this inevitable event. The grant of self-government simply hastened it. Nothing could have averted the return to power of the party which knows and loves South Africa best, which is most united in itself, and most rapidly assimilates diverse strains in the white population. Nothing is more difficult for a sojourner in Cape Colony to differentiate at sight, or after brief intercourse, the Boer from the British nationality. The Eastern province farmer talks English like a Dutchman, and his character, ideas, and outlook are strikingly similar to those of the older settlers. Ties of affinity both in national type and in religious feeling and belief have always united the Scottish with the Dutch and Huguenot inhabitants. The town populations are indeed largely English, though the Dutch have had a tolerable share of the banking and commercial activities, and the special business aptitudes of men of our race, joined to our control of the over-sea traffic, may maintain their present dominance in centres like Cape Town, Durban, Bloemfontein, and Johannesburg. But the vast interior is, and must remain, largely Dutch. The modern Englishman, impatient and highly strung, will never greatly people those grey-brown solitudes, scourged by the harsher visitations of nature, and blessed by few of her richer gifts. So far, indeed, as the mere gratification of race pride is concerned, the imposing apparatus of conquest and ascendancy set up by Lord Milner has already disappeared. All the elaborate bureaucratic machinery of Inter-State Councils, which aimed at shutting out the people of the conquered territories from control of two of the things which most concern them, tariffs and the railway system, has gone by the board. Within six years of the conclusion of the war, four of the chief political opponents of Lord Milner—Mr. Merriman, Mr. Sauer, Mr. Fischer, and Mr. Smuts—control the Governments of Cape Colony, the Orange Colony, and the Transvaal. Time has rarely brought about a more dramatic reversal. "Afrikanderdom" was supposed to be beaten to the earth in 1902. In 1908 it stands for nearly all white South Africa that counts.

Is that a conclusion to vex the soul of rational Imperialists, who have seen without dismay the development of great communities like Australia and Canada, in their earlier career unpromising or even half rebellious, and now dowered with the most complete power of independent decision on all their vital political interests? On the contrary, we should be inclined to say that the present disposition of parties in South Africa represents a great political triumph, contrasting with a very doubtful and qualified military success—the most conspicuous example within the Empire of the worth of the Anglo-Saxon principle of self-government. The war, and the settlement which immediately followed the war, produced no kind of popular assent to the new Government on the part of the men and women who were best able to assure its permanence. The Dutch stood sullenly and determinedly aside. Assent has only been yielded in return for the grant of autonomy to the northern States, and would have been withheld just so long as Lord Milner's system, or Mr. Lyttelton's slight modification of it, prevailed. The organ of the Dutch Reformed Church, speaking of the present political situation, recently declared that though the Dutch had lost independence, no Government but that of England would have yielded them complete self-government, and that the fact must never be forgotten, and represented a real compensation. We may indicate another gain to South African progress. Krugerism has disappeared with Milnerism. So far as we know, nearly every conspicuous member of the Anglo-Dutch administrations which hold sway from Capetown to the Limpopo was a political opponent of Mr. Kruger, and at one time or another withstood him on specially separatist or obscurantist phases of his policy. A third feature of the new rule in South Africa is that it is not exclusively racial. The winning political organisations in the three leading States, though predominantly Dutch in character, admitted British as well as Dutch candidates, and the resulting governments are mixed in race, while they exclude the mining element. That in itself is not an evil, even from the point of view of the constitutional Britisher, for the owners of the Rand had lost the confidence of their own workers and associates, and could not have assured the King's peace.

What is likely to be the policy of the three Governments which, in presence of the political feebleness of Natal, practically direct the affairs of South Africa? Economically, it will probably represent the general colonial tendency to Protection, for it will rest on the country party, anxious to develop the small productive capacities of the sub-Continent. But South Africa is an uncompromising field for manufactures, and thus lacks the Australian or Canadian motive for constructing a "scientific" tariff, aimed, with a thin veil of preferences to the Mother country, at the foreign importer. Internal development, however, will be the main business of the two highly practical peoples, no longer divided on lines of acute racial dislike, which must shape South African destinies. The Cape, in particular, unable to rely on her old command of the railway traffic to the North, must concentrate her resources on her own vast and still sparsely peopled territories.

But all issues in South Africa hang on the problem of unification. A million of white men, largely posted on the stopping places of two or three long thin threads of railway, running through desert, furnish no sufficient constituency for five separate and costly Governments. South Africa wants unity in the three great interests—the native question, the railway question, and the tariff question—which form the cockpit of her inter-State politics. But unity raises formidable difficulties. Where will the South African capital lie? Cape Town, as the centre and ancient and beautiful seat of the early white colonisation, has long resented the loss of the High Commissionership, and with the exploitation of the Rand, the claim of the Transvaal to retain it tends to recede. Probably a compromise will be necessary, and Bloemfontein may be chosen as lying midway between the industrial north and the more fertile and settled south. More vexed and even disuniting is the colour problem. Hitherto South Africa has refused to follow the lead of Cape Colony, which has at least answered the old demand of subject populations for rights in the only way in which it can be answered without slavery or a state of suppressed civil war. South Africa has a native population outnumbering the whites by more than four to one and rising rapidly from savagery and the restraints of the tribal system. What will she do with it? She cannot work it and tax it, laying on the broad and not unwilling shoulders of the Bantu races the burden of her agricultural and mining services, and practically all her rougher manual labour, without returning to them some of the boons and securities that civilised communities enjoy. Yet that is practically the proposition of the northerly white communities, united on this question in a stubbornness closely allied to fear. From the coloured man everything, to him nothing, neither the white man's faith, nor his learning, nor his vote, nor his social privileges and ambitions. The Imperial Power, barely reserving to herself such isolated bits of administration as the ruling of the able Basuto race, must one day deal with the massed opinion of white South Africa on the native question. She must be prepared to find her "Yea" answered with an emphatic and even passionate "No." And then will arise one of the most acute confrontations of policy and feeling that the British Empire can present.

Life and Letters.

THE ETHICS OF VIOLENCE.

AN anarchist draws a revolver on a king or president as titular representative of law and order. A revolutionist throws a bomb under the Tsar's carriage. The Tsar's agents shut up a young woman in a cell and torture her till they obtain confessions, true or false. Both sides appeal to moral principles. On the one side, liberty, justice, even human brotherhood—with a brother or two eliminated—are to be ushered in by a necessary act of preliminary violence. On the other, order, authority and religion are to be maintained by hanging students, flogging peasants, or torturing a schoolgirl. The worst things of all are done in the name of good causes. The world is shocked by the Terrorist, while it takes Abdul Hamid, Leopold, and the Tsar in a different spirit. It regards those in authority as licensed to kill. The very fact that their bloodshed is on the wholesale scale seems to paralyse the imagination. One realises the horror of an individual murder. It has all the elements of a drama. The personal touches are well worked up by skilled reporters. When we learn that 3,000 Armenians have perished in a massacre it is a piece of statistical information—a part of the necessary machinery of the Turkish Empire—something that conscientious clerks compile in Blue-books and put away in pigeon holes. Try to realise the guilt and misery that the figures cover, and the imagination falls back baffled. There is no murderer to concentrate wrath upon. The agents do not count, and far away is Abdul Hamid exchanging courtly compliments with ambassadors, without the faintest reek of the slaughter-house about him. On the whole, we acquiesce with a sigh, just holding up a finger to Abdul and saying "If you do this again we shall have to reconsider our position. Meanwhile, what about markets and railway concessions?" If an escaped Armenian should stab Abdul, what vials of indignation are ready to be poured out!

As a preliminary to a discussion of the ethics of violence we should like to see the scales held evenly between the Revolution and the party of Order. Taking history through, it may safely be said that, where Liberty has slain its thousands, Order has slain its tens of thousands. It has worked in the gross and in detail, in Bartholomew massacres, through its Balthazar Gérards, in its Congolese slaughters, Armenian butcheries, restorations of order in Baltic provinces, and—let us not be Pharisaical—in its Denshawai hangings. There is just this to be said in favour of the violence of Order, however, as against the violence of Liberty, that it does not necessarily stultify itself except when it is associated with religion. Order, it must reluctantly be admitted, can be established by an unsparing use of cruelty. Coercion does not always goad men to rebellion. It may take the manhood out of them, and for this the tyrant may care little enough. It is otherwise with the violence of religion and of liberty. The devotees of the guillotine held that the end justified the means, and that the tree of liberty could only grow if watered with the blood of aristocrats. They landed themselves in the hands of the young artillery officer from Toulon, and they stamped on the minds of half Europe an association between liberty and bloodshed which a century has not expunged. The humanitarian has a noble end in view, but he destroys it in the means he uses to achieve it. The despot has an ignoble end, and his means are in keeping therewith.

But what, it may be asked, is the humanitarian to do? Is he to content himself with a silent protest? In a land of free speech he may make himself heard, but even there do people listen to words unenforced by deeds? and suppose there is no free speech, no law to appeal to, no fair trial? Is rebellion never justified? and if rebellion on the large scale, why not the execution of a criminal? Was not the killing of Plehve substantially an execution, tacitly if not avowedly justified by the opinion of Russia and of the whole civilised world? It is difficult to deny that there are, or may be, cases in which violence has the immediate justification of success. But in the first place the distinction drawn in the popular mind between concerted rebellion and individual assassination has its ground in reason. The rebel leader must appeal to the people. He is not accuser, judge, and executioner all in one. Assassination is a game which two can play at, and not two only, but as many as there are who choose to risk their lives. The death of Plehve, just in itself as ever a death sentence was, leads by the rapidly moving logic of facts to the formation of the Black Hundreds. Violence provokes violence, and inclines the Middle Party, who always hold the scales, to the side of Order. The Buddhist maxim is true of history:—

"For never in this world does hatred cease by hatred; Hatred ceases by love; this is always its nature."

This, says the practical man, is all very well for a copy-book heading. It would make the text of an eloquent discourse in a fashionable pulpit. But look at the hard facts. The world is made of sterner stuff. Well, let us look at the hard facts, remembering only that our question is not what cause will gain the outward victory, but what forces will move the world in the direction of certain definite ideals, in the name of which violence is justified, ideals of freedom and social justice. From this point of view it may fairly be asked whether any body of men has made so deep an impression on the modern world in proportion to its numbers as the Society of Friends. Whether we look at the reform of the criminal law, at the cause of peace, the abolition of slavery, or in our own time the removal of industrial oppression, we find Quakers taking a leading part and impressing the world by self-restraint, by calm assertion of principle, and by quiet persistence in maintaining it. Violence is puzzled in dealing with such men. Non-resistance when manifestly the result not of cowardice but self-control is the most baffling of all weapons, and the most persuasive of all arguments. The ancient Stoic, confronted by an irresistible despotism, took in essentials the same line. "You can take from me," he said, "everything but my will," and Stoicism had not to wait long before it found itself upon the throne, and its maxims permeating the Roman jurisprudence. Revolutionists are too apt to forget that kings, nobles, and bureaucrats themselves are human, and have minds finally accessible to ideas. They forget that a challenge provokes them and makes them fear to concede to reason what they might be suspected of yielding to terror. In the tangle of motives which have produced democratic reform in Europe, who shall say what emotions have predominated? There has always been enough show of force to give the cynic pretext for maintaining that each concession has been due to fear. Yet when we look at the ease with which armed risings are almost invariably suppressed by organised power, we may infer with safety that no governing class has abdicated its power until it was honeycombed by a moral doubt of its authority—a doubt which swept its more enlightened members over into the camp of the attack, and paralysed and distracted the resolution of all but a very few of those who remained.

The partisans of violence are apt to confuse two very different things. Men are not impressed by words. They are influenced when they see evidence of strong and genuine feeling. Outbreaks that give proof of such feeling pent up in great masses owe nine-tenths of their psychological effect to this cause. But it does not follow that fear is the motive to which they appeal, nor therefore that an act of horror is the only method of impressing the dull minds of the comfortable. "The woman conquers the man," said Lao Tsze, "by continual quietness." The woman of the present day adopts a different method. She maintains that her quietness had been misunderstood, and it is true that if she wants her rights she must make men understand that she feels and feels intensely. But when in order to do this she appeals to physical force, she resorts to the principle on which man justifies the reservation of political power for the stronger sex. Accepting her logic he will destroy her conclusion. It is the same with the weaker nation and the oppressed class. By persistence they convince the sceptical of the reality of their grievances. By violence they enable the stronger to assert the necessity of maintaining order. Force in the hands of the minority is a double-edged weapon, and nine times out of ten it cuts the hands by which it is wielded. It may succeed, but at best it breeds mischief on the way. The passive method is infinitely more difficult for man, and its triumph is necessarily doubtful. But the good that it does is not dependent on success. It is inherent in the nature of the thing, pure and unmingled.

THE RE-APPEARANCE OF ASIA.

UNTIL Charles Pearson's book "National Life and Character" appeared fifteen years ago, Asia was to most Europeans a geographical expression for a vast distant area of spell-bound civilisations and barbarisms, interesting for trade and the romance of travel, but negligible for all purposes of initiative in world-politics. Even for our nation, with its huge Indian dependency and its commercial dominance in the China Seas, Asia remained a purely plastic body to be moulded in obedience to the will of Western Powers. Mr. Pearson's brilliant assault upon the self-confidence of Europe, with his prediction of an Eastern renaissance and expansion, which by steady unyielding pressure would force back the white invaders, contributing to a new partition of the world destined to confine the white races to the temperate zones, did not seriously disturb our self-complacency. It was too "speculative." Within the last fifteen years so much has happened that the bare chronicle of events staggers the mind. The Japanese wars with China and with Russia, the Boxer rising with the 1901 Settlement, the treaty of Japan on "equal" terms with two great European nations, the seizure of the Philippines by America, the completion of the Siberian railway and the commencement of the Panama Canal—any one of these events is big enough to compel a reassessment of the situation in the Far East.

At present, indeed, Asia, thus realised, stands more as a menace to the intellect than as a challenge to immediate policy. Its incalculability is largely responsible for the blind opportunism which seems to prevail in the foreign policy of every Western nation. Only one thing seems certain—the grand disillusionment about the passivity of the East. Now that Japan has set about the work of disenchantment, every "fossilised" or backward people throughout the length of Asia seems astir with new vigour, a sense of nationality, an overturning of ancient political and religious authorities, commercial and industrial development, appear in each "buried" country. The writer of the striking article, under the title "Asia Contra Mundum," in this month's "Fortnightly Review," marshals a variety of evidence in support of the view that events are shaping towards a solidarity of Asiatic interests, which, possibly under Japanese hegemony, may verify in large part the prediction of Mr. Pearson. He lays great stress upon a recent factor which, though its direct significance has had much attention, has been neglected in its reactions upon Asia. We allude to the practical insistence of North America, Australasia, and South Africa that they will exclude all Asiatics from settlement in their dominions, making no distinction between Indians, who are in many instances their fellow-subjects, Japanese and Chinese.

Now, if Asiatics, without distinction, are to be permanently excluded from Europe, America, Australasia, and from such parts of Africa as seem most desirable to them for immigration, will they not be impelled to assert a monopoly, racial, commercial, and political, over Asia? For a century or so their millennial isolation has been modified. Large blocks of Asia have fallen under European rule; the beginnings of European industry have fastened themselves here and there; new facilities of travel have seduced congested masses of population to seek relief in immigration to distant continents. But what is a century in the life of Asia? How much does all this political and commercial contrast with the West amount to in the life and character of the teeming millions, nearly half the population of the world, who occupy Asia? It is not a mere question of the wounded self-esteem of our Indian subjects and our Japanese allies denied the elementary liberties of travel and settlement for which every European people would go to war. This aspect, especially as regards Japan, is, of course, important. So far as Europe can claim to have had a Far Eastern policy, it has been directed to separate Japan from Asia and set her up among the European Powers. But all the paper treaties which express this wooing by the West, whether addressed to Japan or to China, are, as Mr. Putnam Weale shows in his new and important work,* trivial instruments for such a purpose. The statesmen of Japan and China know very well what European nations want, and as Mr. Weale, by a mass of recent illustrations indicates, they have not materially altered their attitude even towards their temporary allies, or departed from their policy of masterly procrastination.

In a word, the chief net effect of the recent happenings is to create an Asia which did not exist before, to give her common grievances, common fears, and, therefore, a common policy, so far as the racial elements contained in her are capable of thinking and of acting together. The "penning in" policy must indeed, in time, by sheer dint of economic pressure, drive the rising nationalities of Asia into this common demand of "Asia for the Asiatics," as a necessary counteraction to their exclusion from the other continents. By such a medley of different races and civilisations as occupy Asia a fully-conscious organised policy of this kind may never be formulated. But the attempt to confine Asiatics inside Asia, even if modified by admission to East Africa and certain islands of the sea, must produce a natural counteraction such as we describe. Much would depend, as regards the pace and early efficacy of such a movement, upon the success of the new nationalist aspirations which are astir in India, Persia, and elsewhere. Nor is it necessary to predict some vast military or political consolidation, brained by Japan, and directed, according to the well-worn formula, "to sweep the foreign devils into the sea." India and China have quite recently shown samples of a far more deadly policy in the commercial boycott—Swadeshi. That is one of two industrial weapons which Asia may use for defence or offence. The boycott, or organised refusal to trade with foreigners, was the time-honoured defence of China against intrusion. Should she revert to it, and should its efficacy give it vogue throughout "new Asia," the shock to Western nations competing ever more voraciously for markets and areas of investment would be great. The serious threat of it directed against a strong trading nation might break up the halcyon calm which just now broods over the Far East. But the efficacy of a continuous widespread passive resistance in commercial policy implies a refusal of the Asiatic peoples, who have been inoculated with Western industrial methods, to develop their natural resources with the aid of Western science. If the example of Japan counts for anything, this view is untenable. This brings to the fore the alternative policy which has been long paraded as the commercial aspect of the Yellow peril, the possibility of great hordes of "economic men" in China and elsewhere being trained to a "factory system," with a development of railways and mines, which shall ultimately enable them to swamp the world markets with wares cheaper and not necessarily inferior to those of their Western competitors. This aggressive policy must, of course, imply a period of financial tutelage, for the rapid application of capitalistic industry in Asia is impossible without recourse to Western credit. But, though this competition of cheap Asiatic labour is sometimes scouted as a vain imagination by Western theorists, open-eyed, far-seeing business men treat it with more respect: for they recognise that, in the present disordered condition of fluctuating markets liable to long periods of glut and depression, the advent of such new colossal competitors might play havoc with what we call our industrial system, and engender antagonisms profound enough to tear up our society by the roots.

* "The Coming Struggle in Eastern Asia." Macmillan & Co.

THE RUSSIAN PRIEST.

IN the rural districts of Russia you see from time to time a man passing along the highway clothed in grey or brown garments, with a full beard, long flowing hair, a cross on his breast, and a look of simplicity on his face—that is a Russian priest. In former times he was chosen for his sacred office without any other preparation than perhaps a little more common sense or a rather higher standard of morality than his neighbours. But this primitive custom has passed away, and the future priest now receives a rudimentary training in one of the episcopal seminaries established in each Russian diocese for the education of his class. Before his ordination he is obliged to marry. One of the great distinctions between the Roman and the Eastern Orthodox Church is that in the latter no celibate can be admitted to the cure of souls. It is a very curious and interesting fact that the obligation of marriage occupies very much the same place among the secular priesthood in the ancient churches of the East as the obligation of celibacy occupies in the Catholic Church of the West. In Catholic communities a married priesthood is looked upon as a profanation of all that is sacred; a married priest excites a shudder of repugnance. In the holy Eastern Church this attitude of mind is reversed; the village priest must enter into the bonds of matrimony before he can be permitted to exercise his functions in the house of God. It is unnecessary for us to enter into the historic conditions which have produced these diametrically opposite points of view. But the existence of a glaring antithesis such as this shows how custom in religious matters can be raised to the status of conscientious repugnance, and that, in religious communities, the line between sacred and profane is in many cases not an ethical line at all, but a mere product of ecclesiastical convention. But ecclesiasticism all the world over tends to raise conventions into dogmas instead of basing itself and its teachings on the eternal laws of right and wrong.

The Russian village priest, says M. Wilbois in his instructive book on the Russian Church ("L'Avenir de l'Eglise Russe." Paris: Bloud & Co.) does not trouble himself much about his parochial duties as these duties are understood in the West. He says mass on Sundays, but, unlike his Catholic brethren, not on week-days. It is only on Sundays that the faithful go to church, and he considers it futile to go through the offices of the Church when no one is there to listen to them. The daily services which so many of our Anglican bishops of the neo-Catholic type are so keen upon, find no favour in the Russian village church. In some of the large city churches there is a daily service, but in most of the town churches there is no service if there is no congregation. To the Russian, according to M. Wilbois, God only manifests Himself to the congregation gathered together for the pageantry of public worship. He does not speak to the individual soul. Although the Russian Church holds very high views of the Eucharist, it allows a wide latitude to the faithful on the matter of participating in it. Even the most zealous believers do not partake of the Lord's Supper more than six times in the year. In the Russian Church the grace of the sacrament is not confined to the person who receives it, and this belief has given rise to a peculiar and touching custom among the Russian peasantry. When the heads of the family do not consider themselves worthy to participate in the holy mysteries, they take one of their little children to church and he communicates in their stead. The mother leads the little one up to the altar; there he receives the sacred elements from the priest; he is then led back again to where the father is sitting, and the mother places the child in his arms. The father takes hold of him; embraces and kisses him with peculiar tenderness and reverence. By this kiss the blessings which the child is believed to have received descend upon the father, and he enters into the favour of God through this mystic communion with his child.

The Russian married priesthood is practically a caste, and the career of the priest is an isolated one. Although living among the peasantry and sharing their lives, the priest is not one of them. Yet his influence among them is great. He is under no obligation to visit his parishioners; he goes among them when the spirit moves him. Whatever he does in his parish is done as a spontaneous act and not as a duty. The conception of doing things as a duty or by compulsion is alien to the mind of the Russian priest: whatever is done must be done spontaneously; the element of obligation must not enter into it. In this respect he resembles the Russian people as a whole. In the village schools of Russia, under the control of the Zemstvos, the priest is admitted to teach the children the Catechism; but over the parish schools he has complete control. Most of the schools are miserable little sheds, and the instruction, whether sacred or secular, is of the most rudimentary kind. The simple duties of his office leave the priest ample time to cultivate his fields. In recent years the rural priest has in certain cases received a small salary, but many of them have nothing to live upon except the parish glebe, and this is a miserable resource unless his neighbours help him to cultivate it. The proceeds of the glebe must be supplemented by the kopeks which the priest is accustomed to receive on the occasion of marriages, deaths, births, and confessions. Sometimes the revolutionaries, who are more or less active throughout the whole of Russia, succeed in persuading the moujiks that the priest is robbing them; that he makes them, as the phrase goes, "buy the sacraments." But these impressions do not last long. The peasant understands the economic condition of the priest quite well; he sees that he must live, and he can only live if he receives from time to time the alms of the parishioners for the duties he performs. In Russia, many of the parochial cures are hereditary, and a young priest often marries the daughter of an aged one, and receives the cure as her dowry. It is the custom for the children of priests to marry each other, and the complicated rites of the Russian Church render it almost necessary that a priest should be the son of a priest.

A curious characteristic of the Russian Church is that though the priests must be married, the bishops must be celibates. It is often said by writers on the Russian Church that the bishops are selected from the monastic orders. This is not by any means the case. The future bishop, as a rule, is a man who has distinguished himself at the diocesan seminaries for the training of priests. On leaving the seminary he proceeds to one of the high schools of theology to complete his theological education. When his clerical education is over he takes a vow of celibacy, and immediately becomes a teacher or professor at one of the diocesan seminaries or academies. Although a celibate, he is not in the strict sense a monk. His position somewhat resembles that of the old Oxford don before the statutes were abolished which forbade him to marry. Monasticism, it is true, exists in the Russian Church. But monks and nuns are not numerous; in all they do not amount to more than ten thousand men and twenty thousand women. France, with a fourth of the population of Russia, has ten times as many men and women devoted to a monastic life.

Perhaps no Church in Christendom is so singularly barren in great men as the Church of holy Russia. The Churches of France, Germany, England, Italy, and Spain have all in their time produced ecclesiastical figures of outstanding genius. But it would be difficult to single out an example of genius or even high ability in the ranks of the Russian priesthood. We cannot read Tolstoy's "Village Tales" without realising that the Russian Church has produced a deep influence on the national mind. It has had a message to the multitude of self-sacrifice, of sympathy, of fraternity. But its priesthood has been without intellectual light. Routine ceremony and external observances have absorbed its energies. It is the representative of ancient Greek paganism in a Christian dress. It upholds a bygone stage in the religious development of the race. The renovation of Russian religion, whenever it takes place, will have to begin with a renovation of the Russian priesthood. It must first of all be liberated from the trammels of a caste; it must draw its energies from the nation as a whole. But Russian life tends to be stagnant and inert, and it is difficult to see what future for the Russian priesthood can arise out of such immobility.

THE BEAUTY OF THE WINTER IRIS.

THE earliest writers on mythology represent Iris as a virgin goddess, and as such, rather than as the wife of Zephyrus, and the mother of Eros, we will think of her, when, on winter days, we seek for flowers of her name-sake among the snow.

There is an iris cult nowadays. Its followers are not so numerous as those of the rose, the dahlia, or the sweet pea. They have not banded themselves into a special society, and drawn up a standard of merit for the flower. But if they are weak numerically, they are strong in enthusiasm and artistic perceptions.

The summer flowering irises, particularly the "English" and "Spanish," are plants for all classes. They will grow nearly anywhere in the garden, they are not very particular as to soil, they will thrive in town yards, and—not least—they are about as cheap as roasted chestnuts. One can buy a hundred bulbs of Spanish irises for a shilling. Does the gentleman who sits over a street brazier, with the tropics playing on the outer shell of his stomach, and the arctic circle in the small of his back, dispense his wares at a lower rate than this? It could be wished that the irises of winter and early spring, with their exquisitely painted and, in some cases, fragrant flowers, were as easy to manage, and as cheap, as the Spanish. But they need something in the way of protection and special treatment, and, not less serious, they cost much more.

Of course, cheapness and dearness are relative. The newest of the new irises costs no more than a new dahlia or rose, and far, far less than a new sort of the lordly daffodil, which may be listed at £20 a bulb. To a plain flower gardener who had only bought irises at about the same rate as crocuses a charge of three or four shillings for one bulb would seem extortionate, but to a specialist it is moderate.

We do not look to the winter irises for the stately beauty of the "Flags." We do not expect clumps covering several square yards of ground, with stems as thick as pokers and as long as walking sticks, and with flowers of the size of flagons. They are nearly all lowly plants, and some of the most beautiful scarcely lift their charming blossoms clear of the ground. We do not think of them as forming colour groups in mixed borders, as we do tulips and crown imperials; they are too delicate for these robust enterprises. We do not look on them as material for forming harmonies with other plants, in the way that Major Shuttleworth associates white English irises and roses at Old Warden Park; in the first place because they are not plentiful enough, and in the second because there are no other flowers suitable for grouping with them in their season. No, we specialise them. We make a collection of them, as we might make a collection of old ware, or of paintings, or of prints, or of any other of the things that attract the virtuoso. But their appeal is more humanising than the appeal of rare editions. They have even something of the moving influences of small children, for they live, and grow, and change from day to day, and assume fresh and beautiful forms and colours.

We cannot put these little plants in drawing-room cabinets, or in albums, or in presses, still less (imitating a friend of the writer's who has four thousand pounds' worth of stamps) stuff them into an old tin box under a bed, thence to withdraw them for critical inspection when another connoisseur comes. We have to make a nursery for them—to construct a crèche in a sheltered corner of the rock garden, or cradle them in a frame. Indeed, the refinements of the little winter irises insure them the constant affection of the grower. Here is one with a flower rising a bare four inches above the ground. The bloom is relatively large, and of unsullied gold. The sight of it revives the recollection of a winter tramp in old Holland in a bygone year, which terminated in a ramble round a nursery garden with a portly bulb merchant. Memory recalls his elephantine plunging through the snow; his wheezings; his spluttering gutturals; above all, a secret exultation that shone through him, illuminating his broad countenance as with a light divine, as he drew aside a hurdle packed with straw (a shelter such as the Kentish shepherds make for the lambing ewes) and revealed a clump of this little golden iris. It shone, it sparkled, it glittered; and Hollander and Englander were instantly on their knees beside it, for all the world as though they could warm their hands and change the colour of their blue noses at it. The botanist classes this with the bulbous irises, and calls it danfordiae. Its price is only fivepence per bulb.

And here is another, catalogued, if you please, at a modest twopence. Imagine such beauty as this delightful plant gives available for less than the price of the "Times." Note its slender, graceful leaves, and its beautifully marked flowers. The "standards," as florists call the upright petals, are deep lilac with a suffusion of purple; the "falls" (drooping petals) are also lilac, dotted with yellow. At a distance we should call it blue. This is iris alata. It is not hardy enough to throw up its beautiful flowers in exposed, unsheltered places, and so it is sometimes put in a pot, and grown in a frame.

We come to an exquisite little species, only six inches high, with flowers so beautifully painted that we can only appreciate its true charm after long, repeated surveys, as of a great picture. The standards are blue—the rich, unsullied blue of serene Italian skies. The "falls" are white, with blades and belts of violet. It grows upon us as we gaze, assuming new beauties with each delightful moment. And, as if the colour combination were not enough in itself to win our affection, the flower is scented. This lovely iris is called Bakeriana. It costs three shillings per bulb. Well, that special edition of the "Rubáiyát" which we had contemplated buying can be left awhile.

"And this delightful Herb whose tender green Hedges the river's lip on which we lean"— can be ours instead.

We pass to a new scene in the story of the winter garden, and we find the Actor iris, which florists call histrio. This came from the Jehel-el-Gharbi, the "White Mountains" of the Arabs—from Lebanon, now robbed of most of its famous cedars. The Actor iris is blue, marked with yellow and purple. It grows about a foot high. One of the first of the year, it is also very hardy. The cost is that of a cheap cigar—fourpence. The same modest sum gives us a beautiful blue and white iris called histrioides, which is classed by some botanists as a variety of reticulata, and which we shall grow in a pot in the frame.

The Persian iris, persica, and its forms give us exquisite winter bloom. The type is a tiny, modest plant, of dainty coloration. The ground colour is lilac, blotched with purple and pencilled with yellow. The flowers are pleasantly perfumed. There is a variety of the Persian called Heldreichi, which many prefer, owing to its richer colouring and larger flowers.

With these, and other less important irises of the winter season, we get some foretaste of the joys which the garden will bring when Spring shall come again.

ENGLAND AND MR. MEREDITH.

THAT the eightieth anniversary of Mr. Meredith's birth should be regarded as an event, is in itself a fact of some significance. That a writer so "difficult," so long neglected, so contemptuous of "little people and of fools," should be able to sell his novels in cheap editions (caviare demanded by the general), that even the small numbers who admire his poetry should be on the increase, that he should be regarded as the head of English letters, all this is a credit to modern England. The "materialist" and "sentimentalist" who alike stand within the wide range of Mr. Meredith's antipathy, cannot be the only component parts of the world that thus does him honour.

But the world that so honours him is the English world alone. A slight interest in his works and personality recently visible in French literary circles is merely the reflex of his English reputation. Mr. Meredith may make what boast he will of his Welsh-Irish origin (and it is one important fact in his genius), he may express his distaste for many of our English ways, he may praise foreign nations for this or that, but foreign nations could no more have produced him than we could have produced Molière. The very eccentricities of his style and genius, much as they have impeded his popularity in England, would have cut him off from any recognition in the more academical environment of French literature. More than this, he and the inhabitants of his novels live and move and have their being in English life, and if he were not always encompassed by this responsive atmosphere, his words would echo back to him off the deaf vault of the universe. "It is England nourishing, England protecting him, England clothing him in the honour he wears." Nothing in fact is more highly significant of what England stands for in the nobler aspects of modern civilisation than her production of this man and his work, and her final acceptance of him still alive into the ample Pantheon of her great men.

Our relation to this child of the Celts is typical of the assimilative power of the rich, deep, various life of our country, that is so largely hospitable and tolerant because it has no fear of losing its fundamental character. Mr. Meredith's wild Celtic imagination, the basal fact of his literary power, has been turned to the uses of the English, to show us our follies and to glorify our most distinctive virtues; to gibbet for us our own Wiloughby; to exhibit in all their worth our Vernons, our Roses, our Janets, and our Beauchamps; to teach our raw Wilfreds and Evans the true choice of the path between duty and egoism, love and sentimentality; to make our English landscape glow with a redoubled glory and to people it with our Richards and Lucies; to make our English days and nights, dewy fields and nightingale-haunted thickets, breathe, as of old, into our English hearts our own fighting faith in the goodness of the world and the value of life. Such are the uses to which this Celtic poet has turned his gifts of wild vision and of winged words. All this magnificent Walpurgis night of the intellect and imagination to show us plain Vernon Whitford! All the wonder and wealth of the Hall of Aklis to turn a conceited young barber's nephew into a true man! Surely none but we English, to whom "conduct is three-fourths of life," would hold such a conclusion to be anything but lame and impotent. But this Celtic Englishman has made us feel the poetic beauty of life, not only on the solitary hills of Wales or Ireland, but yet more in the heart of modern civilised life—where there is any effort being made, however blindly, to live it aright. Celtic poetry, in its uncontaminated essence, such as in our generation we get it from the adherents of the Gaelic League, is a pure rushing stream, straight from the mountain—yet it turns no wheel. But the great flood that Mr. Meredith has guided turns for the English the mills of the gods.

Thus with an imagination so brilliant as to verge sometimes on the insane, he preaches truest sanity. And it is partly for this reason that he has established so great a hold upon so many of the English. At bottom, they say, this man stands for illuminated common sense, for all his wit, his odd style and his flights of fancy; so too, in spite of some wild notions, he stands for morality and the serious study of conduct, for the social order, and for the social spirit. The need of such a man, among the great men of our day, is a felt want. Our typical modern writers, when not antinomian and frankly individualist, are more interested in analysis, like Mr. Henry James, or in new ideas and plenty of them, like Mr. Wells and Mr. Shaw, than in character and the conduct of life as we find it. The problem of character—what it is and how it is to be obtained—is the primary interest of Mr. Meredith, and he is great enough, witty enough, poet enough to be able to deal with the problem of conduct without fear of being set down as a prig, in a generation of writers nervously sensitive to the charge of being "too serious." Above all, he has more light to throw on the problem of conduct than had Carlyle, than has Tolstoy. There is an immense force in "Sartor" which renders it an inspiration for youth in trouble, for all ages to come; but there is in it not more than a limited amount of guidance as to direction. Tolstoy again, at least in his old age, seems to consider conduct in its narrowest sense as four parts of life, and proposes to sacrifice at its shrine literature, art, and innocent pleasures. But Mr. Meredith knows well the essential place in any true scheme of morality of those

"Pleasures that through blood run sane, Quickening spirit from the brain."

Thus Mr. Meredith links up the old Puritan in us with the modern moralist of a broader and more hard-thinking school.

Of course, Mr. Meredith's particular judgments are not always right. Carinthia Jane's final choice takes away from the attractiveness of her character as drawn in the earlier parts of the book, and seems a hard-hearted perversion of the author's own laws of right and wrong. Instances might be multiplied. But on the whole his novels perform in the highest degree that function of "criticism of life" for which Matthew Arnold absurdly looked in the "Ode to the West Wind," and absurdly found in "Childe Harold." Of course, Mr. Meredith's moral does not hang like a tail from the dog, but is immanent in the psychological analysis and the poetic charm of the book. His novels are not ethical tracts like "Resurrection." But none the less one reason why they have caught so strong a hold on many people in England is that they are a natural development in the straight line of English literary tradition, which in poetry and fiction alike has always been profoundly "serious."

Unless Mr. Meredith's novels were great literature, the views of life and conduct implied in them would count for nothing. But the world has acclaimed them as great literature. On what is that judgment based? Judged by the standard of ordinary novels, they fail in many respects. The plot is sometimes rather absurd, and sometimes it is rather dull. The structure is inferior to that of many writers who would readily acknowledge themselves his inferiors. Novels like "Vittoria," that begin in splendour, lose themselves in the last part of the volume in wearisome shallows and miseries. The psychological probability, often so illuminating and convincing, yields no less often to the dictates of an exuberant fancy; in the art of sustaining psychological probability throughout the book, Tolstoy is immeasurably his superior. Of the frequent obscurities of style it is unnecessary to speak. Against these plain defects, which are all that the purblind can see, what are the literary qualities which have carried the novels to triumph?

In the first place his style, whenever it is not ruined by its crabbedness, is a new discovery in the power and beauty of words. It is and must remain unique. It can found no school. There are good reasons why it should never be imitated—except in spirit. But at its best it is, like the best Carlylese and the best of Browning, a joy for ever. In the second place, his psychological insight, when it is not misled by his imagination, is original and true in a very high degree. Next, we must take account of his Celtic fancy, now drolly humorous, now luxuriantly imaginative, playing round the well-known scenes and figures and doings of English life, delighting us at least as often and as much as it detracts from our sense of the probability of the tale. But the chief quality of all is poetry; the Celtic fancy in its less capricious, more serious and more exalted moments. The two great themes of English poetical tradition—love and nature-worship—receive continual adornment throughout the novels of the man who wrote "Love in the Valley." Chapters XV., XIX., and XLII. of "Richard Feverel" would alone entitle Mr. Meredith to a place among the great prose-poets of our race. And this element is a constant factor throughout his novels. Poetry is always lying in ambush and springing out upon the reader, sometime at most unexpected moments. More than this, the general spirit of his whole work, as he tells his stories of men and women in town and country, by day and by night, fills us with the sense of the glory and beauty of life. To a race or a generation of men who had lost that sense, what use were there in art, in psychology, or in literature itself?

G. M. TREVELYAN.

The Drama.

A LICENSED PLAY.

"Enormously droll—Mr. Hawtrey kept the house in roars of laughter."—"The Times."—"A triumph."—"Daily Telegraph."—"Unusually rich in ingenious incidents and bright lines, and a general intellectual vivacity."—"Morning Post."—"A roaring farce—an ideal Hawtrey character—a blithe evening."—"Daily Chronicle."—"Audience shouted with mirth."—"The Observer."—"Mad and merry farce. The house shrieking with delight."—"Daily Graphic."—"An excellent evening's amusement."—"Morning Advertiser."—"Laughter attended Mr. Hawtrey from start to finish."—"Referee."—"Mr. Hawtrey quite delightful."—"The Tribune."—"Splendid part for Mr. Hawtrey."—"Daily News."—"Impossible not to explode over the absurdity of the dialogue and the situations. Mr. Hawtrey is unequalled."—"The Star."—"Rollicking complications."—"Lloyd's News."—"A naughty little piece."—"Sporting Life."—"Audience convulsed with laughter."—"The People."—"Mr. Hawtrey at his best."—"Evening Standard."—"The most popular 'Charlie' on the stage scored a great success."—"Daily Mirror."—"The audience chuckled the evening through."—"Standard."—"A screaming farce."—"Weekly Times."—"A sparkling comedy."—"News of the World."—"Mr. Hawtrey is a comedian born in the secret of perennial youth."—"Sunday Times."—"Convulsed the house."—"Sportsman."—"Everybody seemed to enjoy 'Dear Old Charlie.'"—"Daily Mail."—"Irresistibly funny."—"Daily Express."—"Provoked loud laughter."—"Morning Leader."—"Very lively and amusing farce."—"Pall Mall Gazette."—"Received with hearty applause and laughter."—"The Globe."—"The Press on 'Dear Old Charlie,' as quoted on the Vaudeville programme.

THERE are two kinds of worlds with which the dramatic or the literary artist may concern himself. There is the world where thought and feeling are alive, where men, in Goethe's phrase, "err" and "strive," where they desire the better things and do the worse, where they sink, rise, and maybe fall again, where the spiritual fabric is unmade and renewed as the tissues of the body itself suffer change. This we call the moral world. It need not be, and often is not, the world of conventional morals; but it is always and necessarily a sphere where moral judgments have sway.

Beyond this is another kind of existence, imagined by light-minded people with a gift for representation. It is not the real world, or anything like the real world, but it pleases a type of novelist and playwright to pretend that it is. Its chief feature is that it takes the attitude, and, indeed, assumes the defence, of the ordinary man of pleasure. It paints his experience as a highly successful, agreeable, amusing, and brilliant affair. It shows him, like Tam O'Shanter in his cups, victorious over the ills of mortality. It sets up one kind of self-indulgence as the most vicious and charming of all, that of the almost professional "conqueror" of women and deceiver of men. It strips this exciting world of all trouble, save casual and laughable mischance, and presents the man who chooses it as a kind of Jupiter-Scapin, clever and beautiful, gaily outwitting gods and men, but particularly husbands. In the history of the English stage this kind of drama flourished greatly in the time of the Restoration. A singularly close revival of it is to be seen at this moment at the Vaudeville Theatre, in Mr. Brookfield's free adaptation of Labiche's comedy, "Célimare, le Bien-aimé," or "Dear Old Charlie." There, fully licensed and approved by the Censor, you may see the theme and the method of such plays as "The Country Wife," and "The Plain Dealer," less gross in dialogue but hardly less suggestive. Nay, you hear the English adaptor challenging comparison with such a play as "Waste" by making one of his characters refer to it as "Sewage." If "Waste" is "Sewage," what kind of a chemical product can "Dear Old Charlie" be? For "Waste" be its faults of execution what they may, is concerned with the tragic confusion that light conduct brings into a man's life; "Dear Old Charlie" sets itself to show that this kind of action is not only delightful in itself, but that there is no difficulty in escaping from its consequences by tricks, jokes, innuendoes, and especially lies. One work belongs, in a word, to the world of morals and moral law; the other to the world of Mephisto, where nothing is sacred and only callous laughter reigns—the stage world which Wycherley and Congreve invented and described.

The theme of "Dear Old Charlie" is an old one, and Labiche and his English adaptor have treated it with a sufficient audacity of wit and invention. Moreover, Mr. Charles Hawtrey devotes to it all the resources of his accomplished and cynical art. He has for years excelled especially in playing characters who lie not merely to shake themselves free of a web of intrigue, but because they love a lie for its own sake. It is impossible not to laugh when Mr. Hawtrey is engaged in this kind of stage-deception because he has all the accessories of such a theatrical gift—a handsome, unmoved face, demure but lit up with sparkling eyes, a rapid, eager flow of seemingly candid speech when, found out in one lie, he invents on the spot half-a-dozen more to cover it, and a droll habit of taking his audience into his confidence and making them his accomplices. Dozens of plays have been written to illustrate this talent of Mr. Hawtrey, which is indeed one of the chief assets of our stage. The consequence is that Célimare, the French "hero" in Labiche's play, is nothing like so persistent and orchidaceous a liar as Charlie Ingleton. Indeed, the play is perceptibly coarsened as compared even with the original, for in the French, the young wife is gradually enlightened as to her husband's character, and Célimare has even a moment or two of comparative candour. In "Dear Old Charlie," the lies are mountainous. And the French dramatist spares us the revolting touch in which this mere girl reconciles herself to him by using the device that Ingleton had imagined to keep up his secret correspondence with one of his mistresses.

The scheme of the play is of a piece with this setting. Ingleton, a well-preserved rake, is about to marry a young girl. He has had two mistresses, both married. One is dead, the other alive. He is the intimate of both their husbands. He has spent his evenings in playing absurd games of cards at their homes, games such as "Funny Families." He has kept their letters, and jests equally about the authors—the dead woman and the live one—before he proceeds to burn the epistles so that they may not compromise him with his wife. The dramatic idea of the piece is obviously to exhibit this rake as a fascinating creature, the husbands as a pair of vain and childish doddies, and to evolve the most sparkling and entertaining incidents out of the comedy of two butts, whom the actors know how to make as ridiculous in appearance as they are meant to be in character. So on their heads every kind of indignity is heaped, short of the physical drubbings meted out to the absurdities in the Aristophanic comedy. They are made to laugh at each other and expose each other. Each handles his wife's letters—only to give them back unopened to Ingleton. Each unconsciously recounts his own shame to the other, and each winks and guffaws to the delighted audience at his companion's folly. Ingleton himself is no more human than they, for he is made to present his wife with the bangle that belonged to one of his mistresses. Finally the pair, hustled and bewildered, are driven out of Ingleton's home arm in arm, like the clowns in the circus, whom everybody flouts and maltreats; and after a minute's whimpering on the sofa the girl-wife, to whom not one word of truth has been told from the beginning of the play till within a few speeches of its end, sinks—to slow music—satisfied into her husband's arms!

This is "Dear Old Charlie." Its matter is treated with remorseless irony by Maupassant in the similarly named "Bel Ami"; it is treated by Labiche and Mr. Brookfield entirely for purposes of amusement. And in this aim it is entirely successful, for the humour of the French is brisk and recklessly gay, and Mr. Brookfield has wit of his own and has also preserved the Gallic touch. So the audience laughed and laughed again. Husbands laughed at the stage husbands, wives at the stage wife and the wives in the background, just as their forbears of the seventeenth century laughed at Horner and Mrs. Pinchwife. Both seemed oblivious of the trifling fact that the aim of Labiche's mockery was marriage and the family, and that these institutions were being battered down by raillery and lies, and by the setting up of the stage convention of the enjoyment and prestige that belong to a false and secret life, which at any moment the man who pursues it may exchange for ideal domesticity. Such a play, clever as it is, can only be called frivolous and immoral. But what shall be said of a Censorship which lets it pass into its present brilliant notoriety, and stops the way to the serious English drama?

M.

Music.

OPERA IN ENGLAND.

THOSE with the interests of English musical life at heart may well congratulate themselves on the events of the last couple of weeks at Covent Garden—first of all that "The Ring of Niblung" has at last been given on an English stage in the English language; secondly, that the artists have mostly been English or of English-speaking races; and, thirdly, that the performances, in spite of the newness of some of the singers to stage work, were always good and sometimes first-rate. In several cases no one could have suspected that the artists who were doing so well were making practically their first appearances on the stage in grand opera. Mr. Walter Hyde, for example, has hitherto been known only in connection with musical comedies of the type of "The Vicar of Wakefield" and "Miss Hook of Holland." Those who saw him in "The Valkyrie" in the first cycle were surprised to find him one of the best Siegmunds one has heard for some time. His voice, though it has probably not yet attained to its full power, was a sheer joy to the ear; and if he can act with such ease and intelligence on his first appearance in so onerous a part as that of Siegmund, there is every reason to believe that he will develop into an operatic artist of unusual competence. Miss Agnes Nicholls has sung in opera before, but no one was prepared for quite so good a piece of stage-work from her as her Sieglinda in "The Valkyrie" or her Brynhilde in "Siegfried." Mr. Frederic Austin, again, whose singing on the concert platform has shown him to be an artist of unusual intelligence, left no doubt, by his singularly able study of Gunther in "The Twilight of the Gods," of his complete fitness for the stage. Great promise was shown by some other members of the company, particularly Miss Borghild Bryhn—a young Danish lady whose English is excellent—Miss Edith Evans, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Mr. Peter Cornelius, the Siegfried, and Mr. Hans Bechstein, the Mime, are more experienced artists, who, however, were on this occasion singing their parts for the first time in English—if Mr. Bechstein's rather queer pronunciation deserves that name. Mr. Thomas Meux, the Alberich, was another native artist who showed himself to be fully at home on the stage. The minor parts were all done capably, and sometimes excellently. The only singer who seemed palpably ill at ease in the theatre was Miss Perceval Allen, the Brynhilde of "The Twilight of the Gods"; but she made amends for her stage awkwardness by singing her music in splendid style. The orchestra was superb throughout. Dr. Richter, who conducted, evidently felt the responsibility of having so many young and untried artists under his care, and he gave them an amount of assistance that he does not generally accord to singers. The finest performance was that of "The Valkyrie," Miss Nicholls, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Whitehill, Miss Bryhn, and Miss Santley making a quintette of singers that could not easily be surpassed.

All through the cycle, indeed, one was greatly struck by the excellence of the singing. It has gradually become the fashion in many German theatres to declaim Wagner rather than to sing him, although it is certain that Wagner himself wanted his music sung as beautifully as Mozart's can be. There were some traces of the German style in Mr. Cornelius's work, but on the whole he accommodated himself very well to our English notion that a melody set to words and sung by a human voice should have the same sensuous beauty of tone and the same accuracy of musical intonation as a phrase played by a piano or a violin. Nothing is more irritating than a constant insistence on the speaking value of the words at the expense of the musical value of the notes. The charm of the performance of "The Valkyrie" was just that the music was beautifully sung throughout; one got all the honey out of the phrases at the same time that one lost nothing of the dramatic force of the words or of the scene.

The total impression carried away was that English singers, given the proper environment, have a capacity for opera at least equal to that of any other race; and the question was always presenting itself whether better use could not be made of the talent the country undoubtedly possesses, and whether something could not be done to bring more of it into the light of day. The artists are there; all that is required are the stages for them to appear upon. And the problem is: How are those stages to be provided? We may reasonably hope in time for a regular English season of opera at Covent Garden, along with the German and the Italian seasons. But those who have not fallen into the general error of assuming that, in music, London is equivalent to England, feel that something more is needed than a new entertainment to be added to the many that Londoners already possess. There is in the provinces just now a strong demand for better music of every class, especially orchestral and choral music. What is particularly wanted at the moment is a practical demonstration to the provincial music-lover of what opera really is. Unless he has travelled he has no idea of this. The touring operatic companies do their best, but under no circumstances, as things are at present, can they rise above the second-rate. Their orchestras alone are enough to damn them in the eyes of everyone who knows what an orchestra is. Their reply is that, so long as music-lovers support them as badly as they do at present, it is impossible for them to do things on a larger scale. The rejoinder to that is that, so long as things are done on their present petty scale, real music-lovers will have nothing to do with the performances. In towns like Manchester, Liverpool, and Birmingham the audiences at the opera are invariably composed of the less-instructed lovers of music; the cultivated and travelled musicians give it the cold shoulder, not because they do not like opera, but because they like it too well to be content with the second-rate. There is only one way out of this deadlock—to create such an appetite for first-rate opera in the provinces as to force the touring companies to provide something better than they usually provide.

This appetite can only be stimulated, as we know from the parallel case of orchestral music, by bringing the first-rate into the provinces and killing the second-rate by the force of comparison. The amateur becomes enthusiastic over the present provincial performances of opera because he has never seen anything better; even in the largest towns, the untravelled amateur has still no notion, for example, of the real Wagner. The proper thing, then, must be brought to his door, and there seems no doubt that this could easily be done. A couple of years ago, Mr. Charles Manners broached a quite workable scheme for producing "The Ring" in the provinces. He undertook, if ten towns would each get up a guarantee fund of £2,000, to give the cycle on a proper scale, with English artists, with the Queen's Hall orchestra, and with Mr. Wood as conductor. The scheme fell through because of the apathy of some of the large towns. But after the recent performances in London one asks why the whole Covent Garden production should not, some time or other, be taken round the provinces? If £2,000 would cover the expense under Mr. Manners' scheme, surely a smaller guarantee fund would suffice for the other plan, for a great many of the expenses of rehearsal and of stage material would be avoided. The present writer has repeatedly urged the formation, in ten of the largest towns, of some kind of organisation for this purpose, each committee acting in concert with the rest. No one town could afford to bring down the Covent Garden troupe; but a tour arranged on business-like lines could, one thinks, be made a success. Only in this way can provincial opera be lifted out of its present state of mediocrity.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

AFTER a period of comparative silence, the Abbé Loisy is again coming before the public with a criticism of the recent Papal pronouncements. His latest volume, which is just about to be issued, is entitled "Simplex Reflexions sur le Décret du Saint Office et sur l'Encyclique." Hitherto the Vatican has hesitated to excommunicate M. Loisy, but the appearance of this volume, combined with his new commentary of the synoptic Gospels, may prove too much for the obscurantist officials who now pull the strings at Rome; and, indeed, our information is that his excommunication may be declared at any moment. It seems as if sound learning and Catholicism as represented by the Roman curia were finally parting company, and that official Catholicism can no longer be regarded as the religion of educated men.

* * *

THE news that Mr. John Long is to issue a volume containing a number of letters by Edward Fitzgerald not hitherto published is certain to stir curiosity. There are those who regard Fitzgerald as the greatest of English letter-writers, and he is certainly among the first half-dozen. As Mr. Herbert Paul observes, he did not write from a sense of duty, or to get an answer, or to discharge a debt, but, as he once confessed, because he had a "very young lady-like partiality" for writing to his friends. His style is almost perfect, and corresponds exactly to his own definition, "the saying in the most perspicuous and succinct way what one thoroughly understands, and saying it so naturally that no effort is apparent."

* * *

MR. C. F. G. MASTERMAN, M.P., is engaged upon a book dealing with the present condition of England, which he hopes to have finished by the end of the year. It will take the form of an examination of the forces—political, social, and religious—now making their influence felt, a discussion of such problems as sweating and the unemployed, together with an appreciation of the most hopeful of the remedial measures. Coming as it does from a writer who combines sympathy for the workers with an unusual gift for generalisation and a style of singular power and richness of colouring, the book is sure to be of value as a contribution to literature as well as to sociology.

* * *

MONSIEUR CLAUDE, who was chief of police under Napoleon III., left behind him ten volumes of memoirs written with great frankness and detail, and containing some curious revelations about the inner history of the period. A selection from these journals has been translated into English by Miss Katherine Wormeley, and will be issued this month by Messrs. Constable, under the title, "Memoirs of Monsieur Claude, Chief of the Police under the Second Empire." Claude was in his way a remarkable man. Though politically he was a Legitimist and later an Orleanist, he won the favour of Napoleon III., and served the Empire faithfully, though he always hated its chief. The Emperor wished him to become head of the political police, but he declined, taking charge of the regular police instead. His office involved him in several political intrigues, and some of the most interesting parts of his narrative are those in which he speaks of his efforts to bring to justice criminals of position whom the Emperor's secret agents tried to save. His deep-rooted prejudice against Napoleon III. prevents him from being an impartial chronicler, but his book is rich in anecdotes, and the accounts he gives of the mysterious and remarkable crimes which he investigated make excellent reading.

* * *

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH, of whom we give an appreciation on another page of this issue, forms the subject of a brilliant article by M. Firmin Roz in the current number of the "Revue des Deux Mondes." M. Roz cites Meredith as a typical example of English individualism in letters. "Meredith practised, in his own way," says M. Roz, "the 'splendid isolation' which was once the political device of his country. Such an attitude is possible only in England, a country so complacent to individualism. We in France can scarcely conceive harmony as existing outside of 'conformity.' The English accept and love non-conformity in everything." "Meredith's imagination is constructive. It has not the transparency that reflects the world, but the activity that reconstitutes it. The author is a sort of demiurge who, in the process of creation, is prodigal of explanations and commentaries. And yet little by little the illusion of life insinuates itself into our minds—little by little, in spite of the activity which the author displays before our eyes, we gain the sensation of reality; for he is a realist in his own manner which differs from all others." "Poetry comes from the very heart of things, and George Meredith, artist as well as psychologist, goes to its very sources. His divination presses to the roots of the life which he transplants into his artistic garden. We are astonished at the marvellous growth of blossom which the eternal freshness of his world displays before our eyes. Everything is rejuvenated: nature, love, suffering, and joy, our feelings and our instincts. For this penetrating and intuitive mind there is nothing insignificant or commonplace; every stir of our blood, every manifestation of our intelligence, every aspiration of our soul—blood, brain, spirit—assume a meaning and an ultimate beauty. The world takes light and colour in us and outside us. George Meredith's novels overflow with poetry."

* * *

It is seldom the lot of a copyright work to be issued by three different publishers. In a few weeks this distinction will belong to Mr. Morley's "Life of Cobden." Originally published by Messrs. Chapman & Hall, it passed from them to Mr. Fisher Unwin, who includes it in his half-crown "Library of History and Biography." Now Messrs. Macmillan announce that it is to appear with Mr. Morley's collected works in their admirable "Eversley Series." We are also to have soon from Mr. Fisher Unwin a re-issue of the edition by John Bright and Thorold Rogers of Cobden's "Speeches on Questions of Public Policy."

* * *

A book of an advanced type which will soon be published by Mr. Fifield is Mr. Steven Byrrington's translation of Dr. Paul Eltzbacher's "The Anarchists." It is made up of ten studies of the foremost exponents of philosophic anarchism, among them Tolstoy, Nietzsche, Kropotkin, Max Stirner, and Benjamin R. Tucker.

* * *

A NEW and very drastically revised edition of Mr. John Galsworthy's novel, "The Island Pharisees," containing a preface by the author, will be issued in a few weeks by Mr. Heinemann. The book originally appeared in the spring of 1904.

* * *

BJÖRNSTJERNE BJÖRNSON, who is spending the winter in Italy, is writing a new historical novel, which will deal with the severance of the union between Norway and Sweden. It was thought that the work would take the form of a drama, but this has now been denied by Björnson's son. Björnson has already written a drama dealing with modern politics, "Paul Lange and Thora Parsberg," which caused some sensation and no little ill-feeling. Paul Lange was Björnson's old friend Richter, Minister of State in Stockholm.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"The Programme of Modernism." With an Introduction by the Rev. A. Leslie Lilley. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

"A Critical Examination of Socialism." By W. H. Mallock. (Murray. 6s.)

"Decadence." The Henry Sidgwick Memorial Lecture. By the Right Hon. A. J. Balfour, M.P. (Cambridge University Press. 1s. 6d. net.)

"The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte." By S. Baring-Gould. Second Edition (abridged). (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Aspects of George Meredith." By Richard P. Curle. (Routledge. 6s.)

"Work and Wages. Part II. Wages and Employment." By Sydney J. Chapman. With an Introduction by Lord Brassey. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

"Caroline." By Clementina Black. (Murray. 6s.)

"Vie de Jeanne d'Arc." Par Anatole France. Tome Premier. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 7 fr. 50.)

"Les Evangiles Synoptiques." Par A. Loisy. (Paris: Nourry. 30 fr.)

"L'Age du Toc." Roman. Par Gyp. (Paris: Flammarion. 3 fr. 50.)

"Der Impressionismus in Leben und Kunst." Von Richard Hamann. (Cologne. M.7.)

Open Questions.

"THE RIGHT TO LABOUR."

It is sometimes argued that the "right to labour" does not imply the right to have employment found for one by the State. But such a contention trifles with the facts of the matter. Modern labour power in order to be productive requires the co-operation of capital and land; most labourers have no capital and land of their own; they must therefore succeed in making a bargain with the owners of these factors of production if they are to work and so earn a living. If they are unable to effect a regular continuous sale of their labour-power to employers who command the other factors of production, upon terms which enable them to support themselves and their families, what are they to do?

Nearly four centuries ago our Government recognised the reality and urgency of such a case, and threw upon each parish the obligation to furnish work and sustenance. The modern development of our Poor-law system has, however, proceeded upon lines which have incapacitated it for dealing seriously with the main issue of unemployment. It has not the powers to furnish adequate and suitable employment to out-of-works, and if it had, the attitude of mind towards poor relief which the administration of the law has succeeded in implanting in the working classes would preclude it from efficient service as a social remedy.

In the Unemployed Act of 1904 the late Conservative Government clearly committed itself to the acceptance of the "right to labour," though devising a machinery which could not work effectively because no public finance was furnished for its operation. The sum of money placed by the present Government at the disposal of the Local Government Board for the purpose would of course be utterly inadequate to meet the demand for public employment in a period of deep trade depression.

The present position in which, as a nation, we find ourselves is this: We have accepted the principle of the right to public employment, but we are not prepared to find the means of making our acceptance valid. In this situation we cannot long remain; we must make up our minds either to "go back" upon the principle, or to be prepared to make it good in practice by adequate organisation and finance. Many Liberals would like to take the former alternative; they rightly hold that the principle was inconsiderately converted into policy for vote-catching purposes by the late Government, the members of which are now charging their successors with Socialism. But the abandonment of the half-implied, half-expressed obligation of the municipalities to furnish wage labour to unemployed workmen is politically impracticable. It is therefore important that the full legitimacy of the principle should be recognised, so that the necessity of realising it in the administration of local government may receive full and thoughtful consideration. It is often said by persons who ought to know better that with rare exceptions the "unemployed" are "unemployable," and that as such they should be taken rigorously in hand by a reformed poor-law with penal settlements, the "rare" cases of "deserving" unfortunates being relegated to private charity. This view shows a lamentable ignorance of the facts of our industrial system. In 1899 when trade was good only 2·4 per cent. of the trade unionists of this country were out of work; in 1893 when it was bad the percentage was 7·5. What meaning is there in the suggestion that the 5·1 per cent. that mark this fluctuation of trade were unemployable, when in a good year they are found actually employed? Inefficiency or other point of character may be held to be some sort of explanation of "unemployment" in a period of boom, though even then it is reasonable to regard the inefficiency of technique and character as largely the wreckage wrought by earlier periods of depression and poverty. But the great mass alike of seasonal and of periodic unemployment by trade depression is not explained by any element of personal efficiency, and cannot be obviated by raising that efficiency.

If a change in the American tariff or a failure in some staple crop so damages the trade of one of our industrial centres that a number of the mills contract their output, dismissing ten per cent. of their employees, how does personal efficiency come in? It is quite true that the "unemployed" thus created will be composed of workers who from age, feebleness, slowness, or lack of skill are somewhat less efficient than those still kept on, but this inefficiency was not the cause of ten per cent. being unemployed; it only determined the personnel of the ten per cent.

As Mr. Charles Booth has put it, "Our modern system of industry will not work without some unemployed margin, some reserve of labour." When trade is good these men are workers, when it is bad it seems they must be idlers. The out-and-out Socialist says, "Away with such a system!" What does the Liberal say who is not prepared for such revolutionary work? What is he prepared to do for this margin of involuntary idlers who are said to be as necessary to the operation of our "system" as the workers? They cannot seriously be expected to stand the cost of this sacrifice out of their own pockets and characters. There are those who seem to think that season workers ought to make provision out of their wages while in work against the winter slackness which they know will come. Most season workers are, of course, in no position to exact a wage permitting such provision to be made. But if they were, no one can suggest that workers in general are competent to do what the skilled business men and financiers are incompetent to do, viz., to forecast the great tidal movements of trades in the national and the world markets, or even to calculate the probability of new machinery or changed processes displacing their labour and throwing them on the street. Neither individual worker nor trade union can make any adequate provision against these greater and incalculable trade emergencies. The forces which bring them are social forces, and the injuries they cause require social remedies. If they are in very truth essential to our "system," a part of the cost of industrial and social progress, organised society should make provision for those who incur these losses in its service. They have a clear claim upon the State, as representative of society, to be kept, and not in idleness, which obviously impairs their efficiency and corrupts their character, but in work.

Emigration is no solution; it only shifts our burden on to others' shoulders, for our Colonies have their own depressions and unemployment, as the recent history of Australia and South Africa testifies. Besides, our Colonies want the best and not the worst of our workers. Finally, we have no right to exile persons who are willing to live and work in their native country.

These considerations fasten a plain moral obligation upon our State to find employment for workers who cannot find it for themselves, and give these workers a "right" to such employment. No State is able to afford to ignore this duty and to permit the social system to be poisoned by the rotting refuse of the labour markets, men and women who, not by their own fault, are condemned to live in idleness, a permanent burden upon the working classes which are least capable of bearing it.

We have no intention here to discuss even the outlines of the large scheme of public works required to meet this periodic demand. For when once the necessity of the task is firmly faced, the practical statesman must deal with the difficulties and the dangers which beset this as every other attempt to grapple with an organic malady. When he realises he has got to find a way, he will be less dismayed by vague allusions to the Paris municipal relief works of the Commune.

The chief conditions of the practical problem which he has to solve are these:—

(1) The public works undertaken by unemployed workers must not produce goods for the outside market. If any agricultural or manufactured goods are produced by colonies or workshops, they must be consumed inside the "protected area." Otherwise the subsidised public products undersell the free products, or, by their mere addition to the free supply, bring down the price, in either way damaging the outside trade and creating more "unemployment." Public works must be for public use, the improvement of public lands and such forms of cultivation, for instance, afforestation, as are not remunerative employments for private enterprise, the making of roads, canals, harbours, and other improvements of the material fabric of the State or municipality, or the production of ordinary goods exclusively for exchange inside the protected area.

(2) The wages, or the net conditions of employment, for unemployed workers in public works, must be somewhat below the level in the outside trades from which they have been displaced. The motive for this rule is not financial economy, but the avoidance of a sort of Socialism which is fatal to the task of organic reconstruction. If trade union conditions, with added security of employment, are procurable in public works, men actually employed in outside trade will throw up their jobs in order by unemployment to qualify for this preferential subsidised employment by the State. Some Socialists appear to welcome what they regard as a triumphant achievement of their cause. In fact, it would be their ruin. The only possible progress of State Socialism is through the assumption by the State of those highly organised industries from which genuine competition has disappeared or is disappearing, and the operation of them by the most efficient labour procurable. Relief works which should proceed to socialise the most disorganised trades by employing first the least efficient labour in those trades would sin against the laws of evolution and of common sense. Unemployed relief works must be treated as a palliative for a specific industrial disease, not as a mode of organic reconstruction.

(3) On the other hand, the wages and the work provided for the unemployed must be adequate to keep them and their families from deteriorating in industrial or social efficiency, otherwise it fails of its main purpose. For this the bare subsistence wage of an unskilled labourer, and a setting of all unemployed alike to some raw manual toil, will not suffice. Some discrimination in wage, if only to pay the differing rents for different grades of workers and to make allowance for the food of different sized families, must be accorded; the delicacy of hand and health in the case of those displaced from skilled manual or non-manual occupations must have consideration. Yet such discrimination either of wage or of work cannot be carried very far; it is not feasible to set each man to work at his own trade, or to furnish him a wage closely adjusted to his normal standard of comfort.

Provided that public wage-work is offered upon terms which are neither degrading to self-respect nor injurious to efficiency, the obligation of securing the higher standard of comfort which obtains in the better remunerated occupations may fairly be thrown upon the individual wage-earners, who can afford to subscribe to a trade union, and to supplement the wage they would receive for relief work by the unemployed benefit of their union.

One word in conclusion. No pretence must be entertained that relief works undertaken by the public with labour, which is ex hypothesi less efficient than that which remains employed, cannot be made even approximately self-supporting. The entire scheme must be primarily regarded as an outlay of public money in helping workers to tide over periods of unemployment which they cannot foresee or prevent, and against which most of them cannot provide, and in saving society from the injury and waste attending these industrial dislocations.

J. A. H.

Contemporaries.

GOVERNOR HUGHES.

MR. HUGHES, the Governor of New York State, is now definitely in the running for the Presidential nomination. Inside the Republican Party he is, or appears to be, Mr. Taft's most formidable competitor. Both are men of very high character and capacities, and either would make a good candidate and a better President. The initial advantages in what will prove a keen but friendly contest seem to rest with Mr. Taft. He has been much longer before the public; he is more closely identified with the Roosevelt policies; and as the handy man of the Administration he has been pitchforked from one thankless and troublesome task to another, from the Philippines to the Vatican, from the Vatican to the Panama Canal, from the Panama Canal to the War Office, from the War Office to Cuba, and from Cuba to Tokio, solving problem after problem with that peculiar kind of lubricating sagacity which is his special gift. Mr. Hughes, on the other hand, is a man of far narrower experience. Five years ago not one American in a hundred thousand even knew him by name. In politics and the daily business of administration he is still serving his novitiate; it is less than eighteen months since the Republicans of New York State nominated and elected him to the Governorship. Their action was anything but voluntary. They did not want Mr. Hughes—professional politicians hate nothing so much as the necessity of admitting a detached, independent, and somewhat scornful outsider—but they could not win without him. Their own record was unsavoury, and his was not only clean but shone brilliantly. Mr. Hughes had just concluded his investigations into some New York insurance companies. He had uncovered one of the greatest and most intricate scandals of which even the prolific annals of American finance held any record. He had shown as counsel for the prosecution a grasp of his subject that bewildered actuaries of forty years' standing. He was not spectacular or deliberately dazzling, but his patient, pertinent cross-examinations, his quiet unravelling of the whole wretched tangle, his single-mindedness of aim and motive, constituted not only a display of the highest forensic finish, but a public service that could hardly be exaggerated. It was Mr. Hughes who drew up the report of the committee of inquiry; it was he who drafted the Bills that have helped to revolutionise the conduct of American insurance. The people felt that in him they had found a man they could trust. The logical sequence of this discovery was to elect him to office. It happened that the biennial election for the Governorship of the State fell due just when popular gratitude for Mr. Hughes' services was at its height. He became at once "the people's" candidate. But he might not have been forced upon the Republican politicians had the Democrats nominated anyone but Mr. Hearst. The contrast between the character and personalities of the two men was too valuable an electioneering asset to be thrown away. The Republicans did as politicians even in America are obliged to do at times. They bowed to the popular wishes. They pandered to the moral sentiment of the community. Mr. Hughes was nominated, and alone among his colleagues on the Republican ticket was elected.

Walter Bagehot was distinctly right in describing the American system as government by an unknown quantity. Here was a lawyer of whom the masses really knew nothing except that he had twice appeared as counsel in the interests of the State—once in 1904 to investigate the gas companies of New York City, and again a year later to probe the insurance scandals—and that he had done his duty faithfully and with conspicuous ability. Without further inquiry they promptly chose him as the executive head of a commonwealth of eight million inhabitants, next to the Presidency itself perhaps the most exacting post in the whole range of American officialdom. It did not take very long to justify their choice. Mr. Hughes has made an admirably capable, bold, and unconventional Governor. No man, not even Mr. Roosevelt, has held more aloof from the squalid manoeuvres that Americans exalt by the name of politics. He has governed absolutely in the open, without any kitchen Cabinet, or back-stairs conferences, or a bodyguard of private-ear bosses, or any other of the familiar aids to American administration. The politicians naturally do not love him. He is not one of them; instinctively their guard goes up when he steps into the arena. But every month has seen him add something to his claims upon the confidence of the people. More than once he has thrown himself upon their support and coerced the Assembly by the power of an aroused public conscience. It was in this way that he forced the passage of the Public Utilities Bill, probably the sanest and most comprehensive measure that has yet been adopted in the United States for the regulation of public-service corporations. It was in this way, too, that he constrained the politicians to put their dearest possessions in jeopardy by passing an Electoral Redistribution Bill. But Mr. Hughes has also shown that he can stand up to popular opinion as well as guide it. For the past year or so there has been a mania among the State Legislatures for attacking the railways. In New York it took the form of a Bill forbidding the railways within the State to charge a higher passenger rate than a penny a mile. The facile and popular course would have been to sign it. Mr. Hughes vetoed it; and he did so in a message of such arresting cogency that not New York alone but the whole country was converted by it. Like Mr. Cleveland many years ago under somewhat similar circumstances, Mr. Hughes was soon to find that there is no such favourite of democracy as the man who chastises and corrects it.

Thirteen months of Mr. Hughes at Albany have, then, persuaded the American people that he is honest, that he does not "play politics," that the "interests of the people" are something very much more to him than a mere electioneering tag, that he knows how to serve them, and that to clamour and "pull" he is equally indifferent. He is a man who stands altogether on the Rooseveltian plane, though the difference between the President and the Governor is not less defined than the resemblance. Five years younger than the President, Mr. Hughes has schooled himself to a far greater self-control. He works through his intelligence where Mr. Roosevelt would be apt to trust his instincts and emotions. In courage and self-reliance there is probably little to choose between them, but Mr. Hughes has none of the President's expansive breeziness; his mind, while steadier and more analytical, has not Mr. Roosevelt's range; he lacks, perhaps despises, the President's turn for the dramatic effect, and his nature, so far as it is revealed to the public, is mingled with more austerity, reserve, and deliberation than Mr. Roosevelt has room for, with more patience, too, and possibly with more fair-mindedness. The temperamental divergence implies in this case a divergence in political methods, if not in political aim. It is probable that Mr. Hughes, while subscribing to the Roosevelt policies, would carry them out in ways less sensational and disturbing, with more reflection and less violence, than the President's disposition permits of. The feeling has, at any rate, been developing that Mr. Hughes has most of the characteristics which the average sentiment of the country is looking for, and would like to see applied to the business of national government. The movement in favour of his nomination as the Republican candidate has been a purely popular one. It owes nothing, while Mr. Taft's prospects owe much, to the support of the Administration or to the machinations of the politicians, who, indeed, never voluntarily rally to a man of Mr. Hughes's type. It has sprung altogether from the desire of the people of New York to testify to their appreciation of the Governor's character and conduct, and though its ultimate success is more than doubtful, the mere fact of its initiation speaks not unhopefully for the improving standards of American politics.

Letters to the Editor.

"WASTE" AND THE CENSOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In your issue of the 16th of November you were good enough to insert a letter from me on the Censorship of Plays, dealing with the refusal of the Censor to license Mr. Granville Barker's play Waste. In that I committed myself to the assertion that the Censor's objection, instead of being founded, as his supporters imagine, on general ethical principles, or—to put it in another way—on any pretension on the part of the King's Reader of Plays to have any higher sources of ethical inspiration than Mr. Granville Barker, was a matter solely of the observance of an absurd rule forbidding dramatists to mention the subject of obstetric surgery.

Whenever an obviously well-founded statement is made in England by a person specially well acquainted with the facts, that unlucky person is instantly and frantically contradicted by all the people who obviously know nothing about it. This was what happened to me. I was not only contradicted on the point of fact, on which, as I am now going to prove, I was exactly right; but I also had against me that utter lack of political principle which divides us at present, not into supporters and opponents of the freedom of the stage, but into persons who liked Mr. Granville Barker's play, and therefore think that Mr. Redford should be utterly abolished for daring to refuse it a license, and persons who, not liking the play, hold that Mr. Redford's refusal to license it is a satisfactory and final proof of the desirability of the Censorship. It will be remembered that when Mr. Redford refused to license M. Maeterlinck's Monna Vanna, all the critics denounced the Censorship furiously because they were delighted with the incident of the condottiero and the lady in the tent. But when Mr. Granville Barker substituted for these allurements a long discussion on the disestablishment of the Church, a subject in which the critics take no interest, they forgot all about Monna Vanna, and declared one after another that the Censorship is an excellent institution, and that the Lord Chamberlain deserved well of his country for driving Mr. Barker off the stage. And to save their faces, they implied that what Mr. Redford had objected to was the adultery, the illegitimate child, and the seduction scene.

Now mark how plain a tale shall put these gentlemen down. In order to secure his legal rights in countries not ruled by Mr. Redford, Mr. Granville Barker has been compelled to accept momentarily all the alterations of his play demanded by the Censor, so as to be able to obtain a license and give one technically public performance of it in the United Kingdom. Accordingly, last Tuesday week, at the Savoy Theatre, the play, in a form duly guaranteed by the Lord Chamberlain as not containing "in its general tendency anything immoral or otherwise improper for the stage," was performed before a select audience by perhaps the most remarkable cast—judging by the celebrity of its members in literature—that has ever appeared on the stage in London. With the exception of the one eminent dramatic critic who opposed the Censorship on principle, and who is disabled on this occasion from criticism by the fact that he undertook one of the principal parts in the play, the Press was not represented; and I was therefore deprived of the pleasure of challenging our critics personally to put their finger on one single noticeable alteration in the play except the substitution of a conventional and incredible suicide by poison for the death under illegal operation of the unlicensed version. The seduction scene was there, word for word as it originally stood—that scene which so many critics cited as an instance of the horrors from which the Censorship protects us. The adultery was there; the illegitimate child was there; everything was there that was supposed to be the forbidden fruit of the Lord Chamberlain's garden. I am infinitely obliged to Mr. Redford for so precisely confirming my description of the real operation of the Censorship, and routing in shame and confusion his own credulous and inconsiderate supporters.

Let us consider the effect of the alteration by which Mr. Redford considers that he has purified the English stage. The question at issue between Mr. Redford and Mr. Barker was not as to whether the persons in the play should act immorally or not. Mr. Redford had no objection to the immorality: he has given it the Royal sanction. The difference between them was as to the retributive consequences of that immorality. Mr. Barker presented an entirely credible, probable, and highly deterrent result of the immorality. Mr. Redford has insisted on an entirely incredible one. As the law stands at present a man may commit adultery with another man's wife with absolute legal impunity, provided the husband has himself been unfaithful. This was the position in Mr. Barker's play. If the lady had not resorted to an illegal operation, and had not unluckily died under that operation, the career of her accomplice would not have been wrecked. That was the real risk that Mr. Barker's protagonist ran; and that was what ruined him. Now it would be absurd of me to say that Mr. Redford is anxious that public men should not be discouraged from adultery by reminding them of consequences that are natural and reasonably probable. It would be equally absurd to say that Mr. Redford must be anxious to conceal from the public the fact that it is perfectly well known in the medical profession that illegal operations are undertaken by qualified practitioners of much higher standing than the obscure and needy doctors who are imprisoned from time to time on this charge. But it is not at all absurd to say—and I accordingly take the liberty of saying it—that if Mr. Redford really had so desired, his action in Mr. Barker's case would have exactly carried out his wishes. Has any man ever been deterred from committing adultery by the possibility of his accomplice committing suicide by poison? I once knew a man who refused to insure his life because he was absolutely certain that the Judgment Day was fixed for Easter Sunday in the year 1889. I have heard of a man who refused to take an otherwise eligible house at the foot of a Welsh mountain which he suspected of volcanic tendencies. But I cannot believe that even these two would have denied themselves the smallest gratification for fear of somebody committing suicide—especially stage suicide. What Mr. Redford has done is to license the crime and virtually suppress the retribution. That is a very characteristic example of the way in which the Censorship, with the best intentions, always contrives to do exactly the opposite of what it is supposed to do, what it is meant to do, and what I have no doubt Mr. Redford honestly intends to do.

A few minor alterations, which have been demanded as a matter of taste, raise the question: Whose taste? In certain classes in this country it is considered good taste to discuss delicate subjects by innuendo. There is a solid reason for this in the fact that in the classes in question, the vocabulary applicable to such subjects is coarse, and is used freely for the exchange of insults as well as for the exchange of ideas. In other classes, at the more cultivated end of the social scale, the system of conversing by innuendo, by blanks and dashes, and by the initial letters which help the blushing police constable to spare the delicacy of the bashful magistrate, is an unendurable vulgarity. You can be simple and outspoken, or you can hold your tongue; but you must not embarrass yourself or the company by self-consciousness or half measures. The stage, unfortunately, is not yet as much at its ease in reproducing the manners of the cultivated classes as in imitating the tricks and fashions of newly enriched week-enders. When there is anything delicate to be discussed, it has to take refuge in innuendo; and the Lord Chamberlain's department, corrupted by endless reading of plays, has become as sensitive in the wrong place and in the wrong way as an eighteenth century stage duenna. Accordingly, in the licensed version of Waste, one notices a few passages where the decent directness and unconsciousness of the original version have been replaced by blanks left to be filled in by the imagination of the spectators, without any guarantee that their imagination will be in any way superior to Mr. Barker's, and with even a considerable probability that they will fill in a great deal more than Mr. Redford has cut out. Fortunately, there is very little of this; but what there is is all to the bad.

In short, the Censorship has not only made a stupid and mischievous scandal by suggesting to the public that one of the finest products of our modern dramatic literature is a deplorable indecency; it has actually first had the play altered for the worse, and then guaranteed it as being altered for the better. Which, I repeat, is just precisely what I said it would do. I claim no merit for the prophecy. Everybody who has seriously studied the action of the Censorship could have predicted the event with equal exactness.

By the way, I notice in your paper, over the unfamiliar signature M., a series of dramatic criticisms of which I should speak in high terms if I could pretend to be indifferent to the fineness of hand with which M. has manipulated my own plays. But since we are on the subject of the Censor's notion of the proper way to treat adultery on the stage, may I ask whether M. has seen Dear Old Charlie, and if so, what he thinks of it from that point of view?—Yours, &c.,

G. BERNARD SHAW.

10, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.,

THE REVIVAL OF HOME RULE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—With the dawn of the twentieth century developed a theory among statesmen that by convention a problem of actual life might be annihilated. Mr. Balfour first introduced this delightful conceit. Finding that his Ministry and his party were greatly exercised about something that they described as the "fiscal question," he lightly ordained that as far as his administration was concerned, there should be no fiscal question, and that was to end the matter. The policy of his Cabinet was not to be open to imputations of free food or Free Trade or Protection or preferentialism. By an official convention these matters were eliminated from existence, as being obnoxious sources of strife, and Balfourism, ignoring them, went blithely on—to destruction. His party was smashed very largely because he was believed to be a Protectionist, but also very largely because the voter conceived that his Ministry had some fiscal policy up their sleeve that they were ashamed to confess. Democracy will far sooner vote for a man who is a Protectionist and says he is a Protectionist than for a man that is believed to be one, yet who will not declare it. For food taxers, candour and honesty are proving useful policies, while the Liberals are being badly hit in the country by the suspicion that they have an Irish policy that they are afraid or ashamed to avow.

One of the conventions of 1905 was that while the Liberal Administration was in power there was to be no Irish question. It was open to members of the Cabinet to be Unionists or Home Rulers in the abstract. Their views about Ireland could not possibly concern the Government, as the political existence of that island was to be more or less in a state of suspense until it would suit the Liberal party to revive it. Many of these arrangements have come to pass. We have a Cabinet and a party that embraces abstract Unionists and abstract Home Rulers, while the Government, as a Government, favours neither Unionism nor Home Rule. We have an Administration with no official opinion on the vital question of Irish existence, but we have an Ireland that won't go to sleep or yield to the influence of political anesthetics. I don't think that this situation is to the advantage of Liberalism.

On the one hand there is the tremendous difficulty of administering Irish affairs. This has to be done in practice on the Unionist principle of farming-out the government of the country to some clique within it. There is nothing else for an English Minister to do. No member of the Cabinet has any personal knowledge of men or affairs in Ireland that could be of the slightest use to him in any attempt to conduct individually the control of that country. Earnest student and observant traveller can only be certain that it is hopeless for a stranger to guess at the motives and sentiments that mould the conduct of the native.

No Englishman ever yet governed Ireland as a Minister of the Crown. Whoever thought he did was but the blindest victim of the resident party, who, pretending to be his supporters, made him their mouthpiece in Irish affairs. The success of an Irish Chief Secretary depends not on himself but upon his good or ill-fortune in the haphazard selection of the lessees to whom he may demise his confidence. The present Administration is most unfortunate in this. Of the earnestness, sympathy, and unselfishness of the Chief Secretary all Irishmen are convinced, yet no man ever had a harder task in the conduct of affairs in the Western Island. The selection of the clique to whom the country is committed was not in his power. He came into his office finding the country already allotted to the mercies of a party that had sprung into existence between August, 1905, and February, 1906. On the subject of Home Rule this interesting collection of amateur politicians has no settled convictions—nor have they upon any other subject save that they are the victors and that Ireland must provide the spoils. They have excited the hostility of the Tory Party, from whose ranks a large proportion are deserters, and the disgust of the Irish Party, whose members, with all their faults, have no love for the Tammany system in politics. They form an encasement of insulating material that renders impossible frank communication between the country and the Minister, and they include no man of ability whose opinion might be accepted as reflecting some fraction at least of Irish sentiment. There is consequently developing in Ireland a desire to end this Administration at any cost, and for the purpose of ending it to hamper and to harass it at every turn.

The ephemeral character of the chief responsible Minister for Irish affairs adds to the trouble. I do not think that a friendly Chief Secretary gets what Englishmen would call fair play from us Irish Nationalists. I am perfectly sure that honest and friendly communications from Irish sources would be well received, yet they are not made, and any attempt to make them rouses misunderstanding. The Minister mechanically regards every Irishman who addresses him as a beggar for some salaried post to be bestowed upon some incompetent protégé. The Irishman reflects that he would be wasting his time in trying to combat and expose an intrigue since the Chief Secretary is almost certain to be changed before he can be convinced of the truth. Truth by its eternal consistency has an advantage in the course of illimitable time, but in the brief reign of the ever-changing Irish Minister falsehood obtains a start that renders correction impossible.

Outside of Ireland the Irish question is not a difficulty, but a danger. Its existence exposes the Government to all the dangers of a coalition. It is a dividing and weakening force in the Cabinet, and can no more be conventionally ignored by the Ministry than the fiscal question could be ignored by the Tory party. The Government agree to ignore it, yet it forces itself upon their attention at every turn. The electorate believes that the party are afraid of it, and that the Liberals are attempting Home Rule by some underhand trickery of which they are ashamed. The avowal of Home Rule as a rallying cry would be an immense source of strength to Liberalism. No one who took an active part in the last General Election could fail to recognise how completely the fear of Home Rule has vanished from the English middle and lower classes. Mr. Balfour would have been beaten in Manchester had his election been confined, as he declared it should be, to the Irish question. The policy of Legislative Freedom for Ireland becomes a policy of danger only when it is treated in the spirit of funk. Unsettled convictions on such a question will always be dangerous in a country whose people are in favour of politicians who have the courage to face issues squarely.

The campaign against the Lords is fearfully handicapped by this timidity about Home Rule. Every professing Liberal who is in fact a Unionist is put out of action in the fight with the Peers. The other Unionists whisper truly, "The House of Lords is the only real barrier against Home Rule"; and all weapons fall from the nerveless hands of the "Imperialists." No man who is against Home Rule will ever do an honest day's work attacking the titled ascendancy. He must be conscious that that is a task pre-eminently fitted for a friend of Irish autonomy. The presence in the ranks of half-hearted colleagues takes the spirit out of the whole army, and if Liberalism is to exist the Ascendancy Chamber must be assaulted with zeal and enthusiasm.

Never could it be more truly said that Ireland blocks the way. Within fifteen months the Ministry must definitely make up its mind on the Irish question, or the dissension, doubt, and cowardice that are breeding in the ranks will leave the Liberals to face a general election as disastrous to them as was the last election to their predecessors.

It must be clear to everyone that the Parliamentary forces of Democracy cannot longer be kept idle in the trenches firing desultory shots at the stronghold of Privilege. There must be some forward movement, or the Liberal army will dissolve and melt away. Prudence and circumspection and caution are all great virtues, but if you want courage and enthusiasm to inspire a charge to victory, you would do well to enlist the Irish on your side.—Yours, &c.,

A. M. SULLIVAN.

Dublin, February 3rd, 1908.

SIMPLE BIBLE TEACHING.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—While cordially appreciating the spirit in which Mr. John Evans has written to you on the above subject, I should be thankful if you would allow me to indicate one point in which he is in error. There is no one school "syllabus" for Bible teaching. It varies under different local authorities. And while it is quite true that some—and some only—of such authorities have latterly omitted the Six Days' Creation and the Fall of Man, they nearly all of them include the "lives" of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, which they expect their teachers to treat as literal fact. Mr. Evans is, of course, familiar with the "life" of Jacob. But does he really think it affords healthy moral pabulum for infant minds? At any rate he cannot be ignorant that half the teachers who have to give it as fact do not believe it to be so. In a more limited sense the same thing may be said of those who have to rehearse the "Virgin Birth," the raising of Lazarus, and the bodily resurrection of the Lord himself. The question is not—I once more repeat—whether these things are true; but whether all "untested" teachers believe them. Apologising for troubling you again—though I ought not to need any apology where the morality of a nation is at stake.—Yours, &c.,

J. ALLANSON PICTON.

Caerlyr, Penmaenmawr,
February 3rd, 1908.

THE CHURCH AND THE LIBERAL PARTY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The letter of the Vicar of Ashburton in your last issue, on "The Moral of Mid-Devon," sounds a note of serious warning. Before that contest, he says, the Church vote had been "quietly organised." Churchmen had been roused to action by the circulation of a "manifesto to Churchmen," emanating from an authoritative quarter, and pressed upon their flocks by "more than forty incumbents in the division." "A strong feeling of disgust and indignation" among Churchmen has been engineered by an almost ubiquitous clerical agency, with the result of making the election of a Liberal candidate impossible.

The moral that the Vicar of Ashburton draws is that no wise politician "can shut his eyes to the power of the Church when it is aroused"; that the Church is, politically, "a force to be reckoned with," a force that can and will defeat candidates all over England "if they do not repudiate Mr. McKenna and all his ways, and shake themselves free of Dr. Clifford and his party." That is the price of the neutrality of the Church.

Most people are naturally inclined to magnify their own share in a success, and the Vicar of Ashburton is probably no exception. But, all allowance made for Gallicantus, enough verifiable fact remains to make the Vicar's letter a very important document. It was so that the Transvaal was "organised" before the war in South Africa. When the war actually broke out England had cause to regret her previous indifference to warning. And so with the Liberal Party at the next General Election. What he describes is going on all England over. The whole country is permeated by "mighty voices three"—the Church, the "Trade," and the Landed Interest. The Primrose League acts as gramophone to the Tory Cerberus, and blends its triple bark into a bellow of impressive volume. But it is not in public utterances that the danger lies. It is in the quiet pressure brought to bear upon the ignorant elector by men from whom he cannot escape—by the parson, the publican, and the employer of rural labour. Take any ordinary village. There are three centres of gravity, three points round which the labourer's thoughts revolve—the vicarage, the taproom, and the master's pay-room. Look at the clergyman's opportunities. He has practically the official right of entry into every cottage in his parish, and the right of asking what questions he pleases. He has the irresponsible disposal of a part of the money given in charity, a generally decisive voice in the apportionment of the rest. If he chooses, he may certainly be a member of the parish council—probably its chairman—a position in which education enables him to dictate, repress, or encourage, without apparently going beyond the functions of his office. He has the school, the mothers' meeting, the Church-room all at his command for the quiet cultivation among his people of that "strong feeling of disgust and indignation" with the policy of the Government, which, according to the Vicar of Ashburton, has led to the defeat of the Liberal candidate in Mid Devon. He is able to conciliate the "Trade" by giving the support of the Church to the Liquor interest. Here is a Church-room utterance, quoted from a report in the local Conservative weekly, a warning delivered to a crowded meeting of villagers in the presence of their vicar. "This Government would not make it any easier for the licensed victuallers, and, if they did not, how was it possible for the licensed victuallers to make anything easier for their customers?" No place is better adapted for the purposes of a propaganda than a taproom, nor can any missionary be more persuasive than a publican. Cow-yard oratory out of the mouth of an employer with the power of dismissal is apt to be convincing. The mere uncontradicted repetition of the words "Lies" and "Rot" has an influence upon uneducated people. An aged gentleman has just used them in a letter, published in the local papers, as descriptive of the methods that brought the Liberal Party into power. Translate this into the "vulgar tongue" of Tory agitators, and remember that the rustic voter cannot escape hearing it, that he practically never hears a contradiction, and that the speakers are supported by the whole weight of the Church.

The Vicar of Ashburton has given expression to what is of common knowledge. The Church has chosen her side, and is backing it for all she knows. Before the last election, when the Nonconformist vote was looked upon as likely to turn the scale, it was edifying to listen to ecclesiastical deprecation of united political action on the part of religious bodies. Nous avons changé tout cela.

Well, what are we to do? The Church has declared definitely against the Liberal Party. Roma locuta est. Causa finita est. Here is a little story that perhaps the Church might do well to lay to heart:—

Dr. Johnson was at a dinner-party. Cheese was brought in. A lady showed signs of extreme disgust and fainted. "Take away the cheese!" exclaimed some of the guests. "Take away the lady," said the Doctor.—Yours, &c.,

D. C. PEDDER.

Applegarth, Ogbourne St. George, Marlborough.

February 3rd, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Having had some opportunity of noticing the direction of opinion in Church circles, I feel sure that your correspondent, the Vicar of Ashburton, has correctly diagnosed one important cause of the recent defeats which the Liberal Party has suffered in bye-elections. I may go further, and say that it was, and still is, my belief that the dread which Church people professed to feel of the possible action of the late London County Council in school matters had more to do with the defeat last year of the Progressive Party on the Council than all the audacities of the "Daily Mail" and other "Moderate" organs put together. In that case, of course, the women's vote was a power; and every parson, as one knows, carries an important feminine contingent of voters in his pocket. But there are plenty of male voters in the same frame of mind. You noted, if I mistake not, that in the Mid Devon election that staunch Free Trader, Sir John Kennaway, allowed himself to support the Protectionist. Sir John, however, is no less strenuously a Churchman. Since the Bill of 1905, and even more since Mr. McKenna's resolution of last year, every clerical school-manager has become an enthusiastic canvasser for the Tory Party. I have even known the pulpit to be used for the purpose.

Another suggestion I would make is that Liberals, Churchmen especially, should keep an eye on the forthcoming "Pan-Anglican Conference." Great efforts are being made to give this an éclat such as the modest meetings of bishops which have hitherto satisfied "Pan-Anglican" aspirations have never enjoyed. It is being subtly linked up with that somewhat undefined but pervasive notion known as "Imperialism," with which, as you will see, great play can be made in connection with the religious activities (against which I have not a word to say) of the Anglican Church.—Yours, &c.,

A. J. B.

February 4th, 1908.

THE HISTORIANS' HISTORY.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If I may be allowed to look a gift-horse in the mouth, I would say a few words about a book the publishers of "The Times" have sent me. I gather from it that they are anxious to give readers 4,666 words for a penny, whereas Macmillan lately published a book which gave 550 words, and Constable one that gave only 460 words per penny.

Now I am quite in favour of making good literature cheap, and I therefore turned eagerly to see what quality of matter "The Times" supplies at this price. The book sent me contained an inset of 8 pages from the 25-volume "Historians' History" they want me to buy. On page 324 of this inset I came upon the following sentences:—

"During the whole of his reign Peter struggled against the prejudices and evil nature of his subjects and dependents; he prosecuted embezzlers of the public funds, takers of bribes, impostors, and lamented that things were not done in Russia as he could have wished. His partisans sought, and even now seek, to find in all this the cause of the obdurate vices and defects of the ancient Russian. But looking into the matter dispassionately, it follows that much must be ascribed to the character of Peter's action. It is impossible to make a man happy against his own will or to force his nature. History shows us that, in a despotically ruled society, the vices that chiefly hinder the fulfilment of the most laudable and salutary preconceived designs of the power are most frequently and saliently manifested."

I venture to enquire what this (especially the passage I have italicised) means?

Further on in the same inset I read: "Because of Peter's love for the ideal of the Russian people, the Russians will love Peter until he himself loses the national ideal, and for the sake of this love they will forgive him all that a heavy burden has laid upon his memory."

What is it that a "heavy burden" has laid upon Peter's memory, and why did it put it there? And how can Peter the Great (who has been dead quite a long time) be expected to "lose the national ideal"?

I wonder whether this is really a fair sample of the matter "The Times" is publishing, or whether the bulk will be above sample?

I would suggest to "The Times" that without incurring any heavy expense they might engage an intelligent reader (who need know no history, and no language except English) and instruct him to run his pencil through all incomprehensible passages, and prevent their going to press unrevised. For though it would be nice to have 4,666 words of readable matter for a penny, I personally would rather pay three times as much to be excused reading words of that sort quoted above.

And is "The Times" quite fair to other firms? I have on my shelves a book Messrs. Constable published for me at half-a-crown, which contains more than one full-page illustration and 4,666 words for each penny of the price, and I think every sentence in it means something.—Yours, &c.,

AYLMER MAUDE.

Great Baddow, Chelmsford,

February 1st, 1908.

MID DEVON AND THE SMALL HOLDINGS AND ALLOTMENTS ACT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I must confess surprise on reading Mr. Montague Fordham's letter in your last issue. Perhaps, as an old Social Reformer (and therefore a Liberal) who remembers taking part in the General Election in 1865, I may be permitted to say a few plain words. It is too apparent that Mid Devon is made to do duty as a whip ready to hand wherewith to beat the new Land Act. But a moment's thought will show that the said measure of Land Reform which came into possible operation with the New Year could only receive such severe treatment, like the unfortunate schoolboy, for offences which he would be sure to commit. Your correspondent's verdict of wholesale condemnation must have been arrived at from the very opposite policy to the waiting attitude of the Fabian. Indeed, a fortnight ago Mr. Fordham (rushing in the other direction) told us that he saw a solution to the rural problem in what may be called the association clauses of the now utterly "found-wanting" Act, and even had then gone so far as to describe in his "Mother Earth" "the land club scheme for the administration of the new land law." It is not conceivable that there is anything so poisonous about this enabling measure as that it should turn thousands of votes the other way. Mr. Roden Buxton does not so much as name it among the causes of his defeat. With all respect to your correspondent, I would ask him not to be so hasty in his pronouncements one way or the other. I am afraid it is a case of the Socialistic bee preferring to go without honey at all than to visit the yellow flowers of Liberalism, preferential treatment being reserved for those red blooms of uncertain promise. So far as I am acquainted with the agricultural labourer and the rural "small man," they most certainly, if they partake at all, will not refuse to try what is offered them because of a possible more highly-flavoured meal in the unborn future. "A bird in the hand," &c., is a homely proverb they have daily to act upon. No new machinery is needed to introduce Mr. Fordham's "land clubs"; this was done by Robert Owen over half a century ago. May I commend to the close attention of Liberal workers the very practical and businesslike leaflet of Mr. E. O. Fordham, the well-known social worker and president of the Norton Small Holdings, Limited (Co-operative Printing Society, Tudor Street)? It is co-operation that we want in small culture, and Sections 9 and 39 of the new Act gives it us, while the Agricultural Organisation Society, Co-operative Union, and other associations will assist and supply the indispensable credit bank or loan society. More new machinery, unless imperatively required, is always weakening, being centrifugal rather than centripetal in tendency, dissipating force. In his hurry to break up the social system in an old country and out of the ruins construct a brand-new State collectivism of all the means of production, distribution, and exchange, Mr. Fordham appears to have overlooked the co-operative movement or to have confounded it with Socialism, the principles and policy of the two being essentially distinct. When the former new force has failed it will be time enough to take the whole machine to pieces.—Yours, &c.,

J. FROME WILKINSON.

Barley Rectory, Royston.
January 29th, 1908.

THE BEST CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I regret that, owing to a printer's error, due, perhaps, to an imperfection in my handwriting, the name of the authoress of "The Fairy Bower" has not yet been given correctly. Her married name was Mozley, not Morley. Her husband, Thomas Mozley, wrote "Reminiscences of Oriol College."—Yours, &c.,

M. J.

February 5th, 1908.

"A WOMAN'S CHARTER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I crave your permission to make a short reply to the ladies writing on this subject in your issue of February 1st. When I suggested a "Woman's Charter" in your columns I did so because of the vague and extraordinary demands that may be heard at any meeting of the militant women. I drew no analogy between the Chartist and these ladies, but suggested that, as a well-considered political programme had been useful in the one case, it might prove useful in the other.

The Chartists asked, amongst other things, for

1. Universal suffrage.
2. The Ballot.
3. Payment of members.
4. Annual Parliaments.

For what do the ladies ask? The suffrage as for men on the present household basis? This scheme is supported, we believe, by Mrs. Fawcett, as representing the older suffrage societies, is seconded by Mr. Bernard Shaw, but repudiated by the recent Trades Union Congress.

Or do they claim adult suffrage? I am assured by friends amongst the Suffragists that they also claim the right to represent their sex in Parliament.

It is obvious that so large and revolutionary a measure of electoral reform cannot be given by a stroke of the pen or any Parliamentary hocus pocus. The issue must be laid fairly before the electors. It would surely be a step in advance towards peace and clearness of understanding if the militant ladies would formulate their demands, and then, as other citizens do, await the verdict of the country. If so reasonable a request be refused, it would seem that the reason must be that they cannot agree upon a charter.—Yours, &c.,

G. B. HARRISON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—One of your correspondents in last week's issue asks: "What are women's grievances and disabilities? Is it entirely a question of the vote?" and then goes on to say: "Let us have a Women's Charter."

To this I would answer that there is no need of a Charter. Lack of the right to a Parliamentary vote connotes our whole grievance. Give us that, we'll do the rest. Every subject for redress by legislation is as much the concern of women as of men; their interests cannot be separated. The working woman of to-day wants what man wants and wants it just as badly: the chance to earn a living decently with a margin, be it ever so trifling, that will lift her life above sheer drudgery. Never can she accomplish that while she remains in economic dependence on man. Never will she remove her present shackles while she is denied the right of effectively influencing the course of legislation.

It is all very well for your correspondent to discount the value of this vote we are so strenuously bent on capturing, by pointing out that once we get the vote we won't use it. Judging by the men of this country that might possibly result, but judging from the use made of their vote by women already enfranchised we need not too readily anticipate such refusal to utilise the power entrusted to them. Even were they as remiss as men now are, why should the energy of the faithful few among us be left sterile because all will not be active?

Again, your correspondent derides legislation as a means of reform at all. The futility of some legislation cannot be denied, but while it remains the recognised and official means for effecting reform, it must be used till a better engine is invented. Are we to wait until legislation has become a fine art nicely and exactly adjusted to its ends before we ask for women's suffrage? We may as well wait for the millennium. I for my part believe that the enfranchisement of women would be a first and no ineffective step towards hastening its coming.—Yours, &c.,

E. L. C. WATSON.

Avenue House, Clifton, York,
January 28th, 1908.

[We must hold over further letters on this subject.—
ED. "NATION."]

Poetry.

HOPE AND DESPAIR.

SAID God, You sisters ere ye go
Down among men, my work to do,
I will on each a badge bestow:
Hope I love best, and gold for her,
Yet a silver glory for Despair,
For she is my angel too.

Then, like a queen, Despair
Put on the stars to wear.
But Hope took ears of corn, and round
Her temples in a wreath them bound—
Which think ye lookt the more fair?

LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

Reviews.

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE.*

"THE great evil of our age," declares Mr. Scott-James, "is that we are constantly and terribly aware of evil." With wealth accumulated to the astonishment of mankind, tribute sucked from all subject races, opulence which makes poorer nations envious, we yet reveal no content, no deliberate acceptances, no high inspiration. "Our science, philosophies, and inventions and manufactures and infinite complexities have conspired to make us more discontented, even if we have not actually more cause for misery." So this critic attempts from a wide and impartial survey of contemporary literature—contemporary literature as reflecting the spirit of contemporary life—to diagnose the malady of the century. Why this world-weariness, this restlessness, this despair? And how, if underneath them, there is still to be found the unconquerable spirit of Romance, compelling the allegiance of mankind?

The "ache of modernism" and the turmoil of Whitman's "growing arrogance of realism" confront at the commencement the demands of the human spirit for adventure and of the human heart for triumph over time and change and decay. Science in its buoyant beginnings had provided that great inspiration, of wonderful gifts for man's enjoyment, of wonderful knowledge of the universal Secret. But science to-day—in this critic's examination—protests in literature the affirmation of a bankrupt creed. The revelation of the Secret has become the assertion of Haeckel, that "consciousness, thought, and speculation are functions of the ganglionic cells of the cortex of the brain." And the inspiration of the Discovery sinks back into the declaration that "democracy is an expression of the constant desire for change, due to a hope that change will bring some remedy for the really incurable ills of human nature." Mr. Scott-James finds in Mr. Thomas Hardy's work, not, indeed, the expression of the creed of science, but the ultimate almost savage revolt against the blind purposes of life; its clumsy cruelties, its lack of guidance or intelligible meaning. "Thomas Hardy goes so far as to suggest that God is either a defeated God or that he is indifferent, if not actually hostile, to men." "Human beings are for him worthy of praise and pity because they have been laden with sorrows which they did not deserve, and are kinder to one another than God is kind to them." He quotes from "Jude" this great writer's vision of the tragedy of "the modern vice of unrest," of "the view of life as a thing to be put up with, replacing that zest for existence which was so intense in early civilisation." "It is the beginning of the coming universal wish not to live." Mr. Scott-James passes on lightly to examine the work of those who refuse to accept this life; who, flinging themselves out of the main stream of it, like the "Decadents," find satisfaction in sense-given impression, repudiating ultimate purposes; or the psychological novelists who analyse without affirmation or denial; or the apostles of protest—Jack London, Upton Sinclair, Gorky—who stab and slash at it in furious revolt against its commonplaces and cruelties; or the visionaries, like Mr. H. G. Wells, who seek refuge in dreams of a transfigured humanity from the implacable defiance of present things. Beyond these are the fugitives who frankly take to flight; like Lafcadio Hearn, fleeing first to the south, then to the east, "to the unexplored Eastern mind which may yet afford a refuge from modernism," and finding his latter days saddened by the aggressive entrance of modernism even into these remote fastnesses, and civilisation ravaging the simplicities of old Japan. In the near East (with which he is familiar) this writer finds the challenge frankly flung down, and the two forces—romanticism and modernism—joined at death grips. "'Time!' ejaculates the Montenegrin. 'What is time? Time is nothing. You live, and then you die.'" The same resistance, the same overthrow is being revealed here as Mr. Fielding Hall discovered, and so unforgettably stamped into literature, in his picture of the passing of the soul of Burma before a conquering Imperialism and a vigorous commercial development. "I know what it means, this civilisation," says the priest of "Our Lady-of-the-Rocks" in the remote mountain fastness of the Balkans. "My poor people. They have no idea what life is out in the great world, and it is coming to them." "Till now they have lived with God and the mountains. It is very little that one needs in this life. We have so short a time here."

From the revelation of the triumph of wasting and decay Mr. Scott-James turns to the evidence of hope, to the indomitable determination of man, still surviving under grey skies, to penetrate beyond to the Vision Splendid and voyage down all the great ways of the world. From Blake, the master-mystic, he traces the tradition of those who accept and yet transfigure—perpetually charging themselves in Whitman's cheerful benediction from beyond the seas, with "contentment and triumph." Seeing God visibly with the naked eye, angels with "bright angelic wings bespangling every bough with stars" in the trees of suburban London, and the sun not as a golden guinea hung in the sky, but as a multitude of the heavenly host singing "Holy, Holy, Holy," this man could defiantly proclaim that "though on earth things seem permanent, they are less permanent than a shadow, as we all know too well." Here is one method of escape: passing through the search of the Border-landers (a hideous phrase) with their intrepid questionings, "Who can think that either science or revelation has spoken as yet more than a just half-comprehended word?" to the affirmation of a glory not yet revealed, the consciousness of shadowy presences and life charged with significance; the aspiration towards the "road which leads to the light on the far horizon and beyond to the presence of God." And the other is the "new Romance" of Robert Louis Stevenson and his successors: accepting all things and yet delighting in all things, with the solemn engrossing play of children, living in make-believe, knowing it make-believe, and yet not desiring to have it otherwise. "He seems to be marching through a land and an atmosphere of his own, where the men are strange men; and the lights are garish and there is a queer noise of music borne upon the wind. And yet this land, for all its strangeness, is found to be the land we knew before, but seen under a new perspective, upon a more imaginative plane." And Stevenson's true successors he finds in such a great writer as Mr. Joseph Conrad, with his sense of companionship, laughter, and fury, in the still untamed forces of wind and tempest; or in (as a lesser example) that "Beloved Vagabond" who discovered "why I was sent into the world. It was to play the fiddle up and down the sunny land of France."

It is a great task which Mr. Scott-James has essayed in this volume; to interpret from its literature—good, bad, and indifferent—the spirit and meaning of an age. If he has not entirely succeeded in providing a coherent picture, that may be because he is considering a generation, more than most, complex and baffling; as little able to interpret its desire to itself, as to find outside interpretation. Much is omitted which is required to complete the vision. All the copious writing here marshalled in review—even though it includes most of the great novels of the time and some of the popular ones—represents little but the appeal by a scanty company to an exceedingly scanty audience. Outside lies the great silent accumulation of city populations, finding what spiritual satisfactions are possible from the newspapers and popular writings which they consume with so astonishing a demand. They seek romance—and find it—in a complex murder case, in stories of crime which seem to the fastidious sordid and disgusting, in stories dependent in their appeal upon sudden vicissitudes of fortune, in which chance or resolution are always breaking down the insupportable sequences of cause and effect. That a man shall reap as he has sown, that to-morrow will be as yesterday, that inevitable law shall bind and control the revolt of human passion against circumstance—these are the affirmations of moralist and philosopher against which the romantic spirit is in continual rebellion. That rebellion will endure so long as the human will affirms itself free, and passion can draw its inspiration from some elemental fires beyond the boundaries of the world. The fire descends in the Divine fury of all revolutions; which burns up and suddenly consumes the civilisation which has become orderly and comfortable and weary of it all. It descends also when to some remote obscure human being, set in the sordid encompassing influences of the enormous city, life suddenly acquires significance and high meaning, in utter devotion to a person or a cause.

* "Modernism and Romance." By R. A. Scott-James. John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.

GHOSTS OF POETRY.*

MISS TINDAL ATKINSON in one of these volumes speaks rather prettily about—

"Quest of some rare, half-conscious thing Along the haunted ways of Spring."

Even so is the reviewer's quest along the ways of modern verse, a quest after poetry. These, too, are often haunted ways; memories of the great dead glide across them—ghosts who commonly seem to be shaking their heads vehemently.

The quest through Mr. Adcock's "Shadow Show" yields us neither poetry nor anything else. We cannot grumble at catching no poetry here, for none is intended; but neither do we catch wit and humour, which seem to be Mr. Adcock's aim. There is a fatal facility in puns, a certain trick of metre and rhyme, but never a pinch of salt; and the ghostly heads of Hood, Praed, Calverley, shake vehemently. The poem which gives its title to Mr. Mackereth's volume is addressed to Wordsworth; but did Mr. Mackereth not see a stern spectre nearly shaking its head off when he accosted that mighty genius in such lines as these?—

"Rest, poet, in thy simple grave:
The tangled hum of Sabbath bells
Throbs round thee, and the winsome wave
Comes from the genial fells."

Sometimes, indeed, we get a good line or two, as these, in the middle of an irritating "Prayer of a Little Child":—

"Let every sound be folded deep
In moonwhite mists of sleep."

Sometimes a poem just misses being fine, as "The Climber" and "The Song of a Motor Car." But generally there are no flagrant sins to cavil at, scant distinction of phrase to admire, and unexceptionable sentiments.

In Miss May Aldington's "Songs of Life and Love," if the poetry is hard to find, there is no escaping the passion. The worst of relying entirely on passion for wings is that when the wax melts we have such a long way to fall. For instance, in a song called "The Woman," we reach this rare height:—

"Did not the lark sing songs in Heaven above?
Because that day you said 'I love.'"

But mark the crashing fall:—

"I gave you more than self—
I gave my heart, my soul, myself."

At times the wings refuse to work at all; this is the first verse of a song called "Life":—

"The hour you took
From out her life,
Was that her death?—
The rest seems trite."

It all seems trite to us. Miss Aldington, when her usual wings are out of gear, is not above adopting such old-fashioned creaking machinery as the White Rose of Purity and the Red Rose of Passion. This is one of her journeys on the Red Rose:—

"Twine her hair with roses,
Red with love's grim passion,
Roses with scent of blood,
Hear you her teeth gnashing?"

"E. A.'s" slim volume, "Spring in London," is further labelled "a poem on the nature of things." We are

* "The Shadow Show." By A. St. John Adcock. Elkin Mathews. 1s. 6d. net.

"In Grasmere Vale, and Other Poems." By James A. Mackereth. Nutt. 1s. net.

"Songs of Life and Love." By May Aldington. Nutt. 1s. net.

"Spring in London; a Poem on the Nature of Things." By E. A. Smith, Elder & Co. 2s. net.

"Pen Aspera ad Astra." By David Ffrangcon-Davies. W. Speaight & Sons. 2s. 6d. net.

"Prometheus Delivered, and Other Poems." By Bernard Drew. Sisley's, Ltd. 2s. 6d. net.

"Inclinations." By Edward A. Storer. Sisley's, Ltd. 2s. 6d. net.

"A Garden of Shadows." By Ethel Tindal Atkinson. Illustrated by Byam Shaw. Macmillan & Co., 3s. 6d. net.

"The Lover's Hours." By Filson Young. Grant Richards. 2s. 6d. net.

afraid the English song is not an advance on the Roman. Towards the beginning a train of reasoning to prove that sin is the product of reflection (more properly of introspection) encourages the reader to proceed, but the poem is dull on the whole. The versification—rhymed couplets—is tolerable, but the poetry is exiguous. "E. A." sometimes descends as low as this:—

"Homer wrote Homer, that is my belief,
In this preferring Andrew Lang to Leaf."

Which may well serve as a model of how not to use proper names in poetry.

Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies as a singer does excellently; as a maker, he does not. His poem deals with the function and duties of the artist, particularly his duty to himself. It is earnestly written, but no more. Undistinguished blank verse makes tedious reading; why do the unpractised always adopt this most intricate and subtle form of verse? We might expect the name of Beethoven to stimulate Mr. Davies into poetry, but this is all he can say of him:—

"And, one there was
Who stilled loud voices of the nether world,
Sang, hearing not, and gave to listening spheres
The echoes of the eternal universe,
In symphonies that never die."

And that is a fair specimen of "Per Aspera ad Astra."

We now come to the four volumes in our batch that afford some quarry for the quester. Mr. Drew's meritorious "Prometheus Delivered" does not send one impatiently to Æschylus, Goethe, or Shelley; and that is much. He can use blank verse, is never far off poetry, and often in the midst of it, and, even more important, has considerable power of form. In his version he rejects any reconciliation with Zeus as incredible; certainly it would take an Æschylus to make it credible, and even he, if he really did introduce it into the lost "Prometheus Freed," probably did so in a very different way from what is commonly assumed, involving some kind of repentance on the part of Zeus. However, without the help of this tremendous enigma, Mr. Drew has written a highly interesting poem—almost a noble poem. The ending of it, where Prometheus welcomes the sleep that has so long been denied him, reaches a high level of beauty. Throughout the verse is strong, dignified, and well-worded:—

"This mighty universe is compact of hate,
And bitter dregs of passionate revenge
Afford it moisture that but bids the soil
Flourish and bring forth fruit of its own kind.
I toiled in love, and lo! I have drawn down
The excrement of hell upon my head."

Mr. Storer is not so easy to gauge. He is deliberately bizarre, and scruples not to describe a poplar in this bad strained fashion:—

"So clean upon the sky
It lies,
Flung in an artist hour of time
Upon the pale blue canvas
With wide, bold lines
Of living crayon."

He commits worse sins, too, yet often he has a true lyrical touch, and throws out pleasing lines, such as:—

"And the soft scent of your dear mercy bore Me on a raft of dreams to a white shore."

Or again, of a mandoline:—

"You are a mirror,
Or a silent pool of sound,
And when life breathes,
The mist on you
Is music."

But it seems strange to invent such a pretty conceit for that hideous engine of pain.

In some respects Miss Tindal Atkinson's book is the best of the lot, though the title might lead one to suppose that she is one of those unhappy folk who think darkness more mysterious than light. She has not cultivated the faculty of jingle which destroys so much modern verse. Her music, both the music for the ear and the music for the mind, grows out of the idea. The development of her verse is from within outwards, what is commonly called spontaneity; as, for example, when she speaks of the New Year uprising as

"One whom death
Hath lately held in deep imprisonment—
And sudden loosed, till moveth through the dark
The low, uncertain thrill of wings untried."

That last line is what we are looking for—poetry. Here again is more poetry:—

"Yet did I dream of you one night,
And all the bitter days between
Were fled, as flees a forest scene
From one who steps into the light,—
And casts behind him with a cry
The weight of haunted silences,
The terror of unending trees
Dim with the breath of mystery.

* * *

"I prayed for blindness, and am blind,
I wander in the place of fears,
The many trees are many years,
With that one vision left behind."

Mr. Byam Shaw's illustrations are charming.

There is a good deal of excellence in Mr. Filson Young's eleven pages. His theme may be described by two of his own lines:—

"Sad the bread of the unmated—Bitter herbs and salt desire."

Some of his lyrics contain passages as good as this:—

"Life's but once and for a wink;
Death is longer than you think.
Ay, and deeper! Time and he Long had planted You in me,
Sowed the Me in you, before
Mothers twain their children bore.
Deep in stardust lay our fate,
All the ages chose my mate."

That is worthy of Emerson. And there is more of the same lofty seriousness and skill in words. If, along with their intellectual strength and subtlety, these poems had the poignancy the theme demands, there would have been little to criticise in them; but they have not.

ELIZABETH GUNNING.*

SEVERAL years ago two Englishwomen were in the Irish National Portrait Gallery in Dublin. One of them paused before a series of mezzotint heads. "Here," said she, "is the most attractive woman I ever saw. I don't know that she is really so beautiful, but how irresistibly charming." The portrait was one of the three that represent Elizabeth Gunning. Of her sister, Maria, generally considered more beautiful, there are five, and of her sister Catherine, less famous, but perhaps most seductive of the trio, one. The Englishwomen stood gazing at the nine engravings, fascinated by the Gunning charm. That strangers should be thus enthralled by little black and white portraits hanging among hundreds of others is surely a proof that the contemporaries of the Gunning sisters had good ground for their rapturous admiration. If to the record of the mezzotints we add the colours of life, and that perfection of figure attributed by all eyewitnesses to the famous sisters, we may well believe that a more attractive pair than Maria and Elizabeth Gunning never entered a London drawing-room. Not only were they exquisite of face and of form; they had—Elizabeth perhaps more particularly—the aristocratic air. No ancestress of either of her ducal husbands can have looked more duchess-like than she. And indeed, though poor, the Gunnings were of a good family; their mother was Bridget Bourke, daughter of Viscount Mayo; their paternal grandfather was the owner of estates and a castle in Roscommon. Poor they undoubtedly were, and Mrs. Gunning pretty certainly brought the beauty of her girls to London as a market. She managed the transaction successfully; within a year Elizabeth was a duchess, and Maria a countess. Very rapid was the Duke of Hamilton's wooing of Elizabeth, very sudden their marriage, which, however, was probably the best day's work ever done for himself by that dissipated young nobleman. His wife largely reformed him, and he seems to have adored her to the end. At twenty-five she was a widow; and three years later she married General Campbell, who eventually became Duke of Argyll. As a wife she seems to have been blameless, and as a mother most devoted. A clever woman she probably was not, but she possessed good sense, was loyal to all her attachments, spirited, and straightforward. Admiration she liked, but she was no coquette, and her head seems never to have been turned. Of her true inner self we know nothing; probably nobody ever did outside her family; but all that we do know commands respect.

* "The Story of a Beautiful Duchess. Being an Account of the Life and Times of Elizabeth Gunning, Duchess of Hamilton and Argyll." By Horace Bleackley, M.A., Author of "Some Distinguished Victims of the Scaffold," &c. Constable. 21s. net.

Of such a woman the personal history can hardly be extensive; but Elizabeth Gunning's was amplified by her connection with the great "Douglas Cause," the essential question of which was whether the last Duke of Douglas's property should follow his will and descend to his reputed nephew, or whether the young Archibald Douglas should be declared a spurious child, introduced by fraud, in which case the property would pass to the six-year-old Duke of Hamilton, Elizabeth's son. The story told by Lady Jane Douglas and Colonel Steuart, her husband, was that twin sons were born to them abroad; the suggestion of the Hamilton party was that Lady Jane was childless, and that the pair hoped to become reconciled with her brother by providing him with an heir. Husband and wife were practically without resources, and the addition of two children to their household must have increased their difficulties, especially as the half-mad Duke of Douglas remained hostile. That both parents invariably treated the children with warm affection is not disputed. The younger of them, always delicate, died; Lady Jane survived him but a very short time, and was declared to have died of a broken heart. Her brother, partly relenting of himself, partly urged by a wife who was herself a Douglas, eventually acknowledged the remaining boy, and finally made him his heir.

On the death of the Duke, the Duchess of Hamilton, on her son's behalf, seems to have urged upon his guardians the prosecution of his claim, and sent to Paris one Andrew Stuart, an able lawyer, to hunt for evidence against Archibald.

When the case came to be heard in Edinburgh, and afterwards in the House of Lords, a mass of statements from French persons, none of whom appeared, was brought forward on both sides. Probably none of it would be admitted in a modern court. Certainly none of it was conclusive, and the credibility of every one of these unseen witnesses was doubtful in the extreme—especially considering that the events dealt with were nineteen years old. Mr. Bleackley—possibly because, from the nature of things he has had in contemplation chiefly the Hamilton side of the controversy—has convinced himself that Archibald was not really a Douglas, and dwells repeatedly upon the fact that the boy was dark-haired and dark-eyed, while Lady Jane and her husband were fair. He omits to refer to the marked likeness declared to exist between him and Colonel Steuart's elder son (by his first wife), who was of the same complexion. They were distinguishable apart, says Lord Mansfield, only by the difference in their ages. A letter still extant from the head master of Rugby, where (not at Westminster, as Mr. Bleackley says) the lad was at school when his uncle died, recounts how a messenger sent from Scotland "immediately of himself singled you out as soon as he saw you, and said he was sure from the family likeness you must be the gentleman he came for." The younger child, Sholto, was fair, and (in addition to Lord Mansfield) three credible witnesses, including a medical man who had attended both of them, testified that a strong likeness existed between him and Lady Jane.

No doubt the story told by the parents was suspicious. On the other hand, the case against them involves many difficulties—among others the supposition that a proud Scotchwoman who thought her family the most illustrious in the kingdom—"no subject," she writes about her marriage, "could add to me"—would foist upon it the child of foreign peasants as its chief.

Upon presumptive evidence at secondhand no tribunal would have been justified in dislodging a child steadily acknowledged by both parents, and the verdict of the House of Lords in favour of Archibald was no doubt the proper one in law. It was also, considering the very high character both of himself and of his descendants, a very fortunate decision for the dwellers upon the Douglas lands. Opinion in Scotland, where all the persons were best known, has always applauded it, though several English writers have ranged themselves on the side of the beautiful and disappointed Duchess.

THE NOVEL OF THE WEEK.*

"Life is short and art is long" is a phrase that hits off Mr. De Morgan's style and narrative. The reader may be warned that by devoting two days' hard reading to "Somehow Good" he may get through it in the time if he does not pause longer than to snatch a biscuit. But he must expect to have his sleep of exhaustion broken by uncanny visions and, like the hero, Algernon Fenwick, he may for a time lose consciousness of his own identity.

Mr. De Morgan has too much insight into human nature not to be well aware that after conquering his readers with "Alice For Short," his new novel may prove to be his battle of Leipzig. For in "Somehow Good" he has exposed himself to the serious dangers of repeating his own method, and of cheapening it by expounding a parallel psychological case of "brain shock." Further, his pair of lovers, the saucy Miss Sally and her nervous admirer, Dr. Conrad, go through almost the identical experiences of Miss Peggy and Rupert Johnson in "Alice For Short," while for the middle Victorian household of the Heaths we have, in the same tone and manner, the amusing sketches of old-fashioned British paterfamilias and materfamilias, Professor Sales Wilson, Mrs. Wilson the "Dragon," and the selfish and "aggressively patient" old mother, Mrs. Vereker. We are not complaining that the author has elected to give his readers battle on the old ground that his masterly tactics have made familiar. He is a specialist in the diagnosis of the Victorian household, and his literary method is so peculiar, and his exposition of the sub-conscious forces at work in the human consciousness as well as in human intercourse is so deep and so clever that we should gladly surrender ourselves for a third time of asking. Nevertheless it is undeniable that an artist who returns to the same situations and reproduces the same manner of telling too closely, forfeits much of his power over us. We begin to learn his secret, to anticipate his conclusions, and in "Somehow Good" it would be a dull reader who could not forecast from a study of "Alice For Short" what happens in the end to the leading characters.

This being said, the reader may be urged to plunge boldly into the maelstrom of spiritual and material forces that is churned up in the novel by the veering wind of fate and the flowing tide of accident. The mystery of chance plays a great part in the human fortunes of the characters. Rosalind Graythorpe, a beautiful girl of twenty, has gone out to India, twenty years before the story opens, to marry her fiancé, Gerry. But there is cholera at Umballa, and she is seduced by the notorious Colonel Penderfield, while detained at a hill station. We are told nothing further of this affair to form a judgment upon. Rosalind proceeds to Umballa, and after twelve months of married life, her husband leaves her, abruptly, for good, when her baby, Sally, is four months old. An old friend of her father's, Colonel Lund, shelters her at this stage, and under his protection she returns to England with her child, and lives quietly in a London suburb. The story opens with an encounter between the spirited and charming Sally, aged twenty, and a bronzed and bearded stranger in the Twopenny Tube, with an accident to the latter whereby he is nearly "electrocuted," and loses his memory, and with the bringing back of the injured man by Sally to her home. This bronzed stranger is discovered by Rosalind to be none other than her husband, Gerry, who parted from her twenty years before. Described in this bald fashion, the fabric of the situation appears to be woven unduly by the fingers of coincidence, but it is in fact the spiritual pattern of the web that is so original. The author's plan is to unravel bit by bit the threads of the fabric of his people's lives, and show us matter and spirit are as warp and woof, and that what we call good and evil are spiritual re-agents in the mysterious chemistry of life. Mr. De Morgan, indeed, analyses "mind stuff," under the pressure of the physical laws of environment and sensuous experience, much as a chemist splits up a liquid into its constituent gases.

Gerry, suffering from the nervous shock of his electrocution, falls in love, for the second time, with Rosalind, and re-marries her, while totally unconscious that they have a past in common. Rosalind, on her side, while passionately loving the man thus given back to her, expiates the wrong she had done him twenty years before, by her hourly apprehension that when he recovers his memory and discovers her identity he will again cast her off. Further, Rosalind is torn by the distraction of feeling that though the wrong of her infidelity to Gerry was great, she cannot regret that Sally is not his child but Penderfield's, for she cannot conceive that any other Sally could be so adorable or be so loving and beloved. Good has, in fact, come out of evil, and how can she regret the fate which has brought Sally into being and given her back Gerry? In spinning the threads and weaving the complex fabric of this psychological puzzle Mr. De Morgan is, of course, wholly in his element, and the uncanny atmosphere he steepes us in of the inexplicable scheme of human existence, is a metaphysician's doubled with that of a psychologist, and fortified by all the arts of a clever novelist. The effect of the author's rich and subtle and amazingly perplexing psychological analysis is as though "Somehow Good" had been composed as a fugue, and had then been turned by its creator, during sleep, into literature. In some chapters the composition "goes" admirably; in others we wonder vaguely whether mathematics or painting would not have been a more appropriate vehicle than the written word.

The fact is that Mr. De Morgan, in writing his novels, is trying to do many things at the same time, and his brain is busied with philosophical cogitations and scientific enquiries in the very act of getting a poetic effect out of life's prosaic details. If the reader has been put out of patience and scared away by the extremely diffuse, and often tiresomely detailed, conversations between Sally and her friend, Letitia, we advise him to turn to the remarkable scenes of Chapters XXIII. and XXIV., which describe for us in the most wonderfully vivid manner the deaths of the two old Anglo-Indian warriors, Colonel Lund and Major Roper. Here Mr. De Morgan is at his best. He catches in an extraordinarily realistic way the spiritual confusion and the sense of nightmare that so often overwhelm those watching by a death-bed, the uncanny jumble of accident and meaning swimming into our consciousness while we are powerless to do anything but wait. The deaths take place in, indeed, they are caused by, a London fog, and never was a fog better described in literature than that which carries off the old Anglo-Indians in its clutches. The comedy of life interwoven in the strands of tragedy is always present and heightens the vraisemblance of Mr. De Morgan's atmosphere, and his power of enjoying the fun of any given situation increases the naturalness of his scenes. The instinctive hypocrisies of love-making between Sally and Dr. Vereker, the Victorian family rows of Professor Sales Wilson and Mrs. Wilson, the disingenuousness of the selfish old party, Mrs. Vereker, all these are the cause of so much fresh natural glee to their keen-witted creator that it would be a surly reader who did not himself catch the infection. Human feeling to Mr. De Morgan is so much food for philosophic analysis and curious speculation, and we have the sense that if tenscore years were allotted him as his span of life that he would make some discoveries that would revolutionise psychology, which science is, of course, now only in the making. And having given our author these testimonials we may repeat that his roundabout narrative method, though it has great compensations, is one that recoils eventually on its maker. The attention of the reader is so strained by the superfluity of detail introduced that a sense of fatigue supervenes. The energy, indeed, of the style is excessive. We enjoy and are most grateful for the spiritual force and the daring originality of the book, but we would never face a re-reading, for the simple reason that the author's art is long and life is brief.

* "Somehow Good." By William De Morgan. Heinemann. 6s.

SOME THEOLOGICAL BOOKS.*

(1) MGR. DUCHESNE is well-known in this country and has a European reputation as an authority of the first order on the origin and growth of early Christian worship. His "History of the Primitive Church," which has recently appeared, is also a work of marked ability and adroitness. In this history the learned director of the French school at Rome glides over acute critical questions with admirable wariness, and has so far escaped the condemnation which has fallen of late on so many eminent Roman Catholic scholars. The present volume, which has been well translated by Mr. Mathew, is an attempt to give a brief historical account of some of the Christian churches which are now separated from Rome, and of the causes which have led to this result. The opening pages of the book are devoted to the Church of England. England, says M. Duchesne, is, of all countries of the world, the one whose ecclesiastical origin is most visibly connected with the see of Rome. He disputes the contention of many Anglican writers that the English church originated independently of Rome. Her origin, in his view, is clearly Roman according to all the best historical evidence. On this point, it must be admitted that the weight of evidence is with M. Duchesne. But on the fact he bases a rather curious argument. He contends that a church which was founded by Rome must remain ever after under the control of Rome; it has no pretext for individualism. A child must always remain under the power of its parents because it was to them it owed its birth. External ecclesiastical unity, according to M. Duchesne, is the supreme object for which the Christian church should labour. Unity is the Church's ideal. It is with this ideal in his mind that he addresses himself to the Greek and the English church. But his conception of unity is a unity under the supreme headship of the Pope; a unity which involves acceptance of the whole of Roman doctrine and of the Roman ecclesiastical system. In the present conditions of the Christian world such an ideal is a dream, and if we look at the tendencies which are now shaping the future it is likely to remain a dream.

* * *

(2) Canon Henson's volume is the first of a new series of books which has for its object the stimulating, guiding, and strengthening of the Christian life. The intention of the series is not to advocate the views of any special school of religious thought, but to set forth in the light of the latest knowledge and experience the practical duties which belong to all who profess the Christian name. Canon Henson's little volume hardly fulfils the conditions of the prospectus. It is more pronouncedly historical than practical. The book opens with an account of the theory and practice of marriage among the Jewish people in the time of Christ. This is followed by an examination of the teaching of Christ himself on the subject of marriage. Canon Henson is quite right in pointing out that this teaching, in the precise shape in which it has come down to us, is not free from difficulty. The texts in which it is contained do not harmonise and they are capable of more than one interpretation. Take, for example, the texts relating to divorce. In Mark, which is now considered the oldest Gospel, divorce is absolutely forbidden; in Matthew, divorce is allowed in the case of adultery. Which of these two texts is the more authentic? If we accept Matthew's text the marriage tie may be dissolved in the case of adultery; if we accept Mark's text marriage is indissoluble. The words of Christ as they have come down to us contain no clear teaching on this subject. St. Paul takes a more ascetic view of marriage than Canon Henson is inclined to admit. But whatever his opinions were they cannot be regarded as binding upon the Christian spirit of to-day. Society has been completely transformed since the dissolution of the ancient world. We are now living under conditions of which the apostle had no conception, and his ideas as to the relationships of the sexes, although containing elements of truth, largely belong to a bygone order of things. Canon Henson has written an interesting and thoughtful little book, but all his writings would gain in popularity if they were less wordy and were written with more simplicity.

* * *

(3) This volume consists of the Bampton Lectures for the year 1907, and, according to the sub-title, it is an enquiry into the apparent failure of Christianity as a general rule of life and conduct, with special reference to the present time. Mr. Piele is a High Churchman, and approaches the subject he has set before himself from the sacerdotal point of view. His book, as the title implies, covers a very wide and supremely difficult field. But he disarms criticism to a considerable extent by telling us that he is looking at the question not as a specialist, but as an ordinary educated man. This point of view has its advantages, and requires to be stated. Mr. Piele's attitude of mind is distinctly clerical and professional, and the ordinary educated man is too often concealed under the cassock of the priest. Notwithstanding this, he does face the facts which are standing in the way of the Christian religion at the present time. In his opinion the great religious difficulty of the day is to be seen in the striking contrast between the lives of professing Christians and the rules of conduct which they profess to accept. Whole classes of our fellow-countrymen, he maintains, are driven away from religion because they see that people who go to church are in most cases no better than those who do not. But does not this arise from the false conception of religion which is taught from too many pulpits? In the clerical mind religion is too exclusively identified with church-going and the acceptance of an orthodox creed. A church and a creed may be of value to the religious life, but these things are not religion. Religion consists in a life, not in mere beliefs and observances. Until this is driven home into the minds of the people, organised Christianity will be ineffective as a power for good. Mr. Piele sees this when he says that the road to truth of doctrine lies through reform of conduct, and that for centuries the Western nations have done everything with the moral rule of the Gospel except obey it. His remedy for the apparent failure of Christianity is "Back to Christ." We must, he says, go behind the medieval church, behind the first six centuries, the saints, the fathers, even behind St. Paul, and seek our inspiration once more where he sought it, in the Master Himself. All this is very true. The ultimate source and standard of what Christianity is must be its Founder. The opinions of disciples and the doctrines of Churches must take a secondary place. It is certain, for example, that Christ did not teach much of what his immediate disciples taught or what most of the existing ecclesiastical formularies teach. If the Gospel as taught by Christ is to be the final standard of faith and conduct, Mr. Piele must be prepared to sacrifice the merely metaphysical contents of the creeds. But he is not prepared to do this. Hence the inconsequence of certain parts of his book. Nevertheless, it is a book to be read.

* * *

(4) This book, which forms the third volume in Messrs. Longmans' series, "The Pocket Library of Theology," is marked by a literary quality not often to be found in modern sermons. Mr. Gamble has command of a clear and delicate style, which is at the same time vigorous and impressive, and frequently rises into real eloquence. It is always rather a daring thing for a preacher to publish his sermons—though few preachers seem to realise that this is so—for words which produce a real effect when aided by gesture and intonation very often seem cold and lifeless when read. To construct a sermon that will compel the reader's interest is an art which, unhappily, few of our "painful preachers" seem to have learnt; but Mr. Gamble is among the number, and we can pay him the compliment of saying that his volume of sermons is one of the few that we have read with pleasure. On one point we take exception to Mr. Gamble's teaching. He defends war on the ground that in it "men have found opportunity for the exercise of typically Christian virtues." A great many vices—cruelty, for instance—which every Christian teacher must reprobate, can be defended on the same ground. Orthodox Christians may tolerate war, but war is distinctly opposed to the teaching of Christ.

* (1) "The Churches Separated from Rome." By Mgr. L. Duchesne. Translated by Arnold Harris Mathew. Kegan Paul. 6s.

(2) "Christian Marriage." By H. Hensley Henson, B.D., Canon of Westminster. Cassell. 1s. 6d.

(3) "The Reproach of the Gospel." By the Rev. James H. F. Piele. Longmans. 5s. 6d. net.

(4) "Christianity and Common Life." By the Rev. H. R. Gamble, M.A., Rector of Upper Chelsea. Longmans. 2s. net.

Scribner's 1908 Magazine

FICTION

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE,

by John Fox, Jr. A strong Serial Story commencing in the January number.

Richard Harding Davis, James B. Connolly, Thomas Nelson Page, will be among the contributors of Short Stories.

ARTICLES

The West in the Orient, by Charles M. Pepper.

Chateau and Country Life in France, by Madame Waddington, the author of the "Letters of a Diplomat's Wife."

Three Articles on South America, by Arthur Ruhl.

ART

ILLUSTRATED ARTICLES dealing with the work of Raphael, Millet, Ingres, will appear month by month.

THE FINEST COLOUR WORK REPRODUCTIONS will appear throughout the year.

On Sale Everywhere. ONE SHILLING.

Annual subscription, 15s. post free, to all parts.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
New York and London.

TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS ST., E.C. Telephone: Holborn 5849.

Our Land

Edited by

George Radford, M.A.

☞ The first, the February Number of "Our Land," is now ready at all Bookstalls, price 3d. net.

☞ "Our Land" is a monthly journal devoted to the interests of Agriculture and Land in Britain. The central feature will be Co-operation, but Land Tenure, Housing, Taxation, Railway Freights and Local Traction, Sanitation, Purity of Food, Education, and other subjects will be discussed.

CASELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.

The FEBRUARY "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs; the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND! Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS! Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED! Some Book Pictures that we Know no More.

A LONDON LETTER. New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor.

ANNALS OF PRINT. Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES. The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topographer—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classical Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who, on application, will send a Specimen Copy free.

ROUTLEDGE'S NEWEST LIST.

ASPECTS OF GEORGE MEREDITH. By Richard

H. P. Curle. With an Engraved Portrait after G. F. Watts, R.A. Large crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

I.—General Introduction to the Study of Meredith. II.—Meredith's personality explained by Atmosphere and Style. III.—Philosophy of Nature. IV.—Lyrical View of Nature. V.—Philosophic Conception of Social Problems. VI.—Insight into Character. VII.—On Tragedy. VIII.—On Death. IX.—On Love. X.—On Egoism, Sentimentalism, and their Relationship. XI.—The Comic Spirit. XII.—Sense of Humour. XIII.—As Aphorist and Metaphorist. XIV.—Eloquence of Meredith. XV.—Last Words on Criticism and Method.

A RESIDENT'S WIFE IN NIGERIA. By Constance

Larymore. With 41 Illustrations on Art Paper, and a Portrait of the Author, 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

"Miss Kingsley has shown us that a woman can travel. Mrs. Larymore gives a further demonstration of the fact. In Miss Kingsley's book nothing is more striking than the good humour of the writer; Mrs. Larymore has the same fine gift of kindly optimism. A most engaging account of her life and experiences in Nigeria."—Liverpool Courier. "A most entertaining book, very pleasing and never dull."—Standard. "WE HAVE SELDOM READ A BOOK OF TRAVEL WITH GREATER ZEST. IT HOLDS THE READER'S INTEREST THROUGHOUT; the interest never for one moment flags."—Manchester City News. "Mrs. Larymore seems to be one of those energetic, enterprising, wide-awake women, who are beginning to be the companions of men who often sacrifice life and health on the outposts of the Empire."—Country Life. "It is impossible to convey in a review even a glimpse of Mrs. Larymore's delightful character, the unstudied revelation of which is the book's greatest attraction."—World. "Mrs. Larymore is not only a skilled traveller in wild countries but is able to describe her wanderings most graphically with pen and camera. ONE OF THE MOST ENJOYABLE BOOKS OF TRAVEL WE HAVE SEEN OF LATE."—Globe. "A good example of a class of book which always attracts and pleases an Englishman. . . . The index adds to the usefulness of this interesting book."—Spectator. "The book is one which no Nigerian, no colonial man, no believer in woman, should miss reading."—Daily Chronicle. "Capital reading for those who would know something of the conditions of life of those responsible for looking after the interests of out-of-the-way portions of the Empire, and also for those who stay at home. Mrs. Larymore is evidently a born traveller."—Daily Telegraph.

CHRYSL; OR, THE ADVENTURES OF A GUINEA. By CHARLES JOHNSTONE. With an Introduction by E. A. BAKER, M.A. 8vo, buckram, 6s. net.

The work is a curious hotch-potch of picturesque incidents, and roughly a 'roman à clef' of the period covered by the Seven Years' War (1757-63). The Guinea acts as a special correspondent, visiting the battlefields of Frederick the Great and Ferdinand of Brunswick, and witnesses the execution of Byng, the capture of Minorca, and the military operations in Canada. Notes, short but most useful, are added.

Entirely revised edition (1907) with 268 Magnificent Coloured Figures and 245 Cuts.

FLOWERS OF THE FIELD. By Rev. C. A. JOHNS. Revised throughout by CLARENCE ELLIOTT. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

"It has been found necessary to make many additions, and the Editor has done so in an admirable manner. The present-day naturalist is deeply indebted to the advance made in illustrating objects in their proper colours; this is where the present edition is SO SUPERIOR TO ITS PREDECESSORS. It is the most comprehensive and useful book the botanist can desire."—Standard.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Limited: London.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

A new Monthly Magazine dealing with the Philosophy, Religions, Politics, Literature, Art, &c., of the East.

ONE SHILLING NET.

THE ORIENT REVIEW

is the only Monthly Review in Europe exclusively devoted to the Eastern World.

FIRST ISSUE ON SALE

At Bookstalls and Newsagents.

Subscription rates, inclusive of postage—

14s. for 12 months; 7s. for 6 months.

If any difficulty in obtaining a copy send to

"THE ORIENT REVIEW,"

Thanet House, Strand, London, W.C.

Publishing Office: 27, Chancery Lane, E.C.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

THE merits and faults of the modern American school of literary criticism are alike evident in Professor F. W. Chandler's study of "The Literature of Roguery" (Constable, 2 vols., 12s. net). The book is comprehensive. Professor Chandler seems to have read everything to be found which has the least bearing upon his subject. There is an imposing series of bibliographies appended to each chapter. The author begins by defining the literary rogue or anti-hero, distinguishing him from his near relative the villain, and thus leads his readers to hope that they are to have the pleasure of wandering along one of the most fascinating, though at the same time most neglected, of literary bye-paths. But this hope is soon extinguished. Professor Chandler's volumes are, to speak frankly, as unreadable as a dictionary. Instead of mastering his material he has allowed his material to master him, and amid the heap of detail it is impossible to disentangle the main lines of the subject or to see it as a whole, while the arid catalogues of books and authors, unaccompanied by the comment and criticism which we have a right to expect, will deter the great majority of readers. Probably so much information concerning the literature of roguery has never been gathered before into a single work, but Professor Chandler has not given us a good book on the subject. What he has done is to compile a most exhaustive catalogue.

* * *

THE latest volume in Messrs. Macmillan's "Golden Treasury Series" (2s. 6d. net) is a selection of "Aphorisms and Reflections" from the work of T. H. Huxley, chosen by Mrs. Huxley. The time has not yet come when we can see Huxley's work in proper perspective, but he will always stand out as one of the brilliant group of men of science who had so great an influence upon the thought of the latter half of the nineteenth century. But apart from his rank in science Huxley will also be remembered as a gifted writer of English prose. His style lends itself to the compilation of a volume of aphorisms, and Mrs. Huxley is to be congratulated both on the plan and the execution of this tribute to her husband's memory. We quote a few of the aphorisms taken almost at random, "Logical consequences are the scarecrows of fools and the beacons of wise men." "Time, whose tooth gnaws away everything else, is powerless against the truth." "Orthodoxy is the Bourbon of the world of thought. It learns not, neither can it forget." "No slavery can be abolished without a double emancipation, and the master will benefit by freedom more than the freed-man." "Science has fulfilled her function when she has ascertained and enunciated truth." "Books are the money of Literature, but only the counters of Science"

* * *

DR. ANGELO MOSSO's book on "The Palaces of Crete and Their Builders" (Unwin, 21s.) is a useful companion to the work by Professor Burrows published last year. In the first place, Professor Burrows' book suffered in some degree from the lack of a sufficient number of illustrations. The present volume contains 187 well-reproduced photographs, which may with advantage be compared with Professor Burrows' descriptions. Moreover, Dr. Angelo Mosso, though eager in the cause of science, is no less alive to the human and adventurous side of the search for buried treasures. If the artist and the archæologist, he writes, "could explain the hidden power of excavation to exalt the mind, and the insistent, almost childish, call on fortune to grant new treasures, he would write not a book, but a romance, a drama of the human soul which seeks the unknown." Oddly enough, the man who thus expresses himself was attracted to Crete by his interest in a science so little romantic as craniology, in which he is a specialist. He soon became "an amateur archæologist," and the greater part of his book is a popular account of the researches that have been made in Crete, with descriptions of the most interesting objects that have been rescued. Only in his concluding chapter does he expound the theory for which his Cretan explorations have furnished him with evidence. Briefly stated, this amounts to a denial of the Aryan race theory put forward by philologists, and an affirmation that "Minoan civilisation, parent of Hellenic culture, developed without participation by the Indo-Germans." The student of Cretan civilisation, however indifferent he may be to this theory, will find much to interest him in Dr. Angelo Mosso's book.

* * *

IN "Vasari on Technique" (Dent, 15s. net) the introduction to the "Lives of the Most Excellent Painters, Sculptors, and Architects" has been translated into English for the first time by Miss Louisa Macle hose, and edited with an introduction and notes by Professor Baldwin Brown. The volume increases one's wonder that this technical disquisition has not been translated before. Although it is perfectly true that the "colour" which makes the "Lives" such delightful reading is perforce absent from the introduction, and that the average person cares more for biography than for descriptions of processes, the intrinsic interest and value of these pages is such as to render their studious exclusion from previous compilations extremely astonishing. For Vasari embodies the very spirit of the high renaissance, and as we read his descriptions, comparatively matter-of-fact though they are, we feel ourselves, as Professor Brown has it, "spectators of an organised activity on a vast scale, where processes are so well understood that they go on almost of themselves." There is something monumental in the range of Vasari's knowledge. Himself a painter and architect, he necessarily did not practise every craft that he wrote about, but he was in the way of gathering first-hand information from practical exponents of this or that. His account is not always clear, and—as in the "Lives"—it is sometimes warped by prejudice and downright error—witness his wholesale denunciation and wrong historical explanation of the Gothic. But his catholic sympathies and activity remain abnormal, and of the many technical treatises of an age saturated with technical triumphs his is easily the first. That of Benvenuto Cellini comes second; it elaborates several subjects of which Vasari only touches the fringe, notably the arts of medal-making, niello work, and bronze-casting, with which the former, as a practical sculptor and craftsman, was more directly in touch, and thus constitutes a very useful supplement to the slighter portions of Vasari's work. But in treating of painting and architecture the latter is as exhaustive as Cellini, and his greater comprehensive knowledge enhances his value as a specialist. The volume does not appear to us to call for illustrations, but those in half-tone, line and colour, which are supplied, seem to have been selected with exceptional thoughtfulness.

* * *

DR. MACMILLAN'S "Life of George Matheson, D.D., LL.D." (Hodder & Stoughton, 7s. 6d.) is a most impressive book, for Dr. Matheson was a remarkable man. Blind at the age of eighteen, he nevertheless distinguished himself at Glasgow University, and during the fifteen years that he was minister of the village of Innellan his literary output would have been considerable even for a man who had no such difficulties to surmount. His removal to Edinburgh in 1886 to take charge of a parish of over two thousand communicants brought upon him still more exacting duties. But he rose to the occasion, and as visitor, preacher, and sharer in the social life of the parish, he made his people forget that their minister was so heavily handicapped. As an instance of the way in which he looked upon his duties, Dr. Macmillan tells us that he never preached the same sermon twice—a record that few preachers can claim. His devotional and theological works have been widely read, but he will probably be remembered as the author of the famous hymn, "O love that wilt not let me go," written in 1882, and now to be found in nearly every hymnal. Dr. Macmillan has told the story of Matheson's winning and heroic life with considerable literary skill, and just that right measure of enthusiasm proper in a biographer.

* * *

"FANCIES IN PROSE," by Constance Evan Jones (Nisbet, 2s. 6d. net) is an unnecessary book. The author has nothing new to say, the subjects are trite, and the style undistinguished. Even the quotations with which the book abounds are hackneyed. The title excites hopes that are not fulfilled.

The pipe that clears today of past regrets and future fears

Omar Khayyam (modernised).

is a pipe filled with

Player's Navy Mixture

A Tobacco of Matchless Charm.

Sold in Two Strengths:

MILD, 5d.
per oz.

MEDIUM, 4½d.
per oz.

John Player & Sons,
Nottingham, will forward
Testing Samples
post free to applicants mentioning this paper.

C442

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

BOOKSELLERS.

THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE

Have the Largest Selection of Oxford and
Other Bibles and Prayer
Books from
6d. to £10.

BIBLES

Illustrated,
Wide Margin,
Interleaved,
Teachers',
Interlinear,
Revised,
and other Editions.
Telephone Central 329

53, PATERNOSTER ROW, E.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row,
and at the above address.

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones.—Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each). Saint Jude's Depôt, Birmingham.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF
BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION,
SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,

ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ONE & ALL SEEDS

THE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.

ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet
Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz.,

Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple;
Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender;
Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.

One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10
Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet,
The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue;
Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum;
Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.

One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9;
56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.

ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRI-CULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION,
LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

THE GERMAN CODES.*

AMONG learned lawyers, Mr. Ernest Schuster is one of the very few who is equally at home in German and English. He is just as willing and just as competent to review an English law-book in a German Archiv, as to review a German law-book in an English quarterly. And the work before us, with its constant comparisons, shows that he might easily have written at the same time a similar book in German on English civil law. We are grateful to him for the preparation of a treatise that is at once succinct, scientific, and practical. It should be followed, we think, by a translation of the codes and principal statutes. This Mr. Schuster did not attempt, because "a translation without notes would have been unintelligible, and a translation with notes would have been unwieldy." The French translation (with notes), now being prepared by eminent jurists, with the Government's aid, has so far dealt with only about one-half of the Civil Code; yet it already runs to more than 1,500 large pages. Mr. Schuster has packed his exposition into less than 700 pages—a remarkable achievement when we consider the extent of the ground and the danger in such matters of losing in utility more than you save in space.

Had space permitted, we should have liked to give illustrations of the practical as well as the educational value of Mr. Schuster's work. We must be content to summarise its triple purpose:—

1. To promote the comparative study of English and German law. In expounding the German codes, Mr. Schuster constantly dwells upon the similarities and differences they present to our own law on the same subject.

2. To give an insight into the most modern and perfect systematisation of the whole private law of a country. What struck Professor Maitland, who made an eloquent plea for the study of the German codes a few months before his death, and called on English reformers to take many leaves from the German book, was the wonderful skill with which Germany had set about and accomplished this herculean task. It was a work in which all German parties were proud to share. Even the Socialists, who regard the whole basis of society as false, did not obstruct. They thought that, at any rate, the new code would be more intelligible, and, therefore, more easy to alter, than the old chaos. "Our German neighbours," in Maitland's words, "have brought their law up to date, and are facing modern times with modern ideas, modern machinery, modern weapons."

3. Mr. Schuster's third purpose is to aid the increasing number of practitioners who, in the course of their daily work, have to deal with questions of foreign and private international law. The ever-growing interdependence of nations, owing to travel, migration, books, invention, trade, and all the developments of international life, makes it more and more necessary that we should have a number of jurists learned in the laws of other nations as well as our own. Germany is one of our largest customers, and one of our most enterprising competitors. Mr. Schuster has helped our lawyers to understand the German system. If they would help us to abolish our land laws, and we, in exchange, could show them how to get rid of administrative law, both nations would be stronger and happier.

The Week in the City.

LAST week the City was quite beginning to look forward to a period of very cheap money and of great speculative activity. The big spurt in Consols and Irish Land Stock, as well as some Foreign securities, gave colour to these anticipations. But since the beginning of this week more sober opinions have prevailed. The most obvious reason for the change of sentiment is the evident determination of the Bank of France to recover all the gold that came to London during the recent crisis. The Governor of the Bank of France, in his speech the other day, plumed himself upon having been able to spare a large amount of gold without inconvenience "from our strong reserve." Upon this the City editor of the "Times" admirably remarks: "An English observer must be pardoned for observing that banking is a comparatively simple matter when the banker retains the right to meet his obligations in silver, and that the problems which the Bank of England had to face last autumn, as the custodian of the world's free market in gold, were of a more varied and complicated order than those which presented themselves on the banks of the Seine." It is, of course, free trade in gold that makes London the great centre of banking and exchange; the rôle of Paris is necessarily subordinate on account of the rule which enables the Bank of France to pay out depreciated silver instead of gold.

THE OUTLOOK FOR BUSINESS AND INVESTMENT.

Upon the whole, therefore, the sentiment is decidedly less optimistic than last week. Bankers do not appear to think that there is really much liquid capital waiting for investment although there are great numbers of prospectuses waiting to be launched at the first favourable opportunity. Even if New York is compelled to part with its gold, a plentiful supply of the precious metal in Europe would not mean necessarily that there will be new money available for a Stock Exchange boom. Advices from New York show that the depression there continues, and is not likely to be dispelled for a long time to come. The difficulties of Germany do not diminish, but rather increase, as the impossibility of finding new taxes to cover up the huge public deficits becomes more and more evident. Meanwhile, there is undoubtedly a progressive decline in manufacturing activity, not only in the United States and in Germany, but also in England and Scotland. The shipbuilding trade and the building trades are both in low water. Reliable reports from Lancashire and from the West Riding of Yorkshire show plainly that the boom in the cotton and woollen trades is at an end, and it is to be feared that unemployment will rapidly increase. A very eminent banker told me on Thursday that he attributed the falling off to a general decline in the consumptive power of the people, caused by the dangerously high level of taxation and the high level of prices. The result is that all classes, rich, middle, and poor, find it necessary to curtail their expenditure and reduce their standard of living.

EXCITEMENT ON THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Great excitement was caused on the Stock Exchange on Thursday when it was discovered that the Stock Exchange Committee, by striking out an old rule without substituting a new one, had, consciously or unconsciously, suspended for the time being the distinction between brokers and jobbers. This was the sole subject of conversation, and no one seemed to know what to make of it. One result is quite certain—namely, that the elections for the new Committee a few weeks hence will arouse enormous interest. There has been more discussion in the last weeks on the morality of a double commission and the propriety of shunting than for a very long time past. The keenness of these discussions is doubtless due to the fact that the Stock Exchange is suffering severely from depression, and is beginning to think that some part of the evil may be traced to defects in its own rules and constitution.

THE MOTOR TRADE.

"In France, Germany, Italy, and Switzerland there is talk of lack of demand, large stocks, and financial stress. Present conditions and indications in the automobile trade are similar to those existing in the bicycle business some ten years ago, which resulted in radical changes in prices and the financial distress of many firms and individuals engaged in the business." So writes a Continental expert, and proceeds:—

"The belief generally prevalent that prices will be cheaper next season is given as a reason by many intending purchasers and agencies for not placing orders in advance. As a result many of the large factories and warehouses find themselves with a heavy stock of 1907 models on hand, with little prospect of disposing of them, except at a very low figure. Both manufacturers and dealers are confronted with the problem of disposing of stock to make room for the product of 1908."

The position of motor manufacturers in this country appears to be very similar.

LUCELLUM.

* "The Principles of the German Civil Law." By Ernest J. Schuster, LL.D. Two Guineas. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

E. F. ROBINSON, Secretary.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte,
Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplace. "The English Home."ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.PUBLIC OPINION

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF CURRENT THOUGHT AND ACTIVITY.

Twopence. Each Friday.

Established 1860.

An Interesting Review of World Events.

To get a broad, comprehensive and clear view of the great movements afoot on the globe, to catch the inmost spirit of the activities of the world—to grasp their full meaning—read
PUBLIC OPINION.

This paper compels reading by the tremendous interest of its subjects and their cosmic sweep. It is a journal of timeliness that appeals to intelligent men and women who wish to know the best that is said and done in all fields of human activity.

Its pages are brimful of information and discussion on Politics,
Science, Religion, Literature, Art, Music, and the Drama, and of the people who keep the world turning around. It gives the best from all periodicals, and keeps one abreast of the culture of the age in all lines of thought and achievement. To the busy men and women it is indispensable. It is the paper that keeps you educated.

PUBLIC OPINION is the ideal paper for every home, of interest to every member of the family, a luxurious necessity and a necessary luxury. Its circulation increases each week, and it is read by people in all parts of the world.

Specimen post free on application.

Offices; 30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATIONIs NOW READY, and can be had free
on application to the Manager.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR - YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM - ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephones: 58 and 8058.LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the post of HEAD MISTRESS of the Chelsea Secondary School for Girls, Hortensia Road, Chelsea, in which will be incorporated the Secondary Girls' School of the South-Western Polytechnic. The school will open in September, 1908, when there will probably be over 300 girls.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £400 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £20 to a maximum of £600 a year.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, L.C.C. Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, March 16th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

If a written application is made for a form, it must be marked outside "Application for form for appointment, Head Mistress, Secondary School," and must be accompanied by a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's services are given in the "London County Council Gazette," which is published weekly, and can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
February 5th, 1908.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Roentree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS:—At end of every Term.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM. LONDON." Telephone No 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

Before Selecting a School or Tutor

PARENTS SHOULD OBTAIN A COPY OF

"A Practical Guide to Schools, Tutors, & Educational Homes,"
PUBLISHED BY

Messrs. TRUMAN & KNIGHTLEY,

Containing full particulars (including number of pupils, fees, etc.) of over 1,000 establishments in Great Britain and on the Continent. Price 6d. To be obtained post free from the publishers.

Address:—6, Holles Street, Cavendish Square, LONDON, W.

New Departure in Preparatory School Training.

Bodily as well as mental fitness aimed at.
Manual Work as Aid to Bookwork.

Snettisham Grange, Norfolk, W. H. PROSSER,
B.A., Camb.

EDUCATIONAL.

ELTHAM COLLEGE, KENT.

Public School Life and Education, with Special Classes for all Naval and Military Examinations. Special Fees for Officers in the Navy and Army. Recognised by the Army Council. Large playing fields; gymnasium, swimming bath; chemical and physical laboratories; cadet corps, &c. Recent Honours: Open Scholarship, Balliol College; 1st Open Scholarship, Hertford College. Admissions to Sandhurst, Osborne, &c. Apply to the Head Master, Rev. A. E. RUBIE, D.D.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters." Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE

THE most interesting of the London penny evening newspapers, and the only one representing Liberal thought. Publishing five editions daily from noon, it presents the news of the day fully with promptness and accuracy, and generally contains a

CARTOON BY "F.C.G."

On Saturdays the daily paper is always a special enlarged number, and a weekly edition is published, Price One Penny, under the title of the

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

Offices: TUDOR STREET, WHITEFRIARS, E.C.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

A Reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X.

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM.

Translated from the Italian. With an Introduction by the Rev. A. L. LILLEY, M.A. 5s. net.

This work is the fullest statement of the Modernists position and aims that has yet appeared, and as such is a document, of the utmost importance for the understanding of the new movement.

CRIMINAL APPEAL AND EVIDENCE.

By N. W. SIBLEY, B.A., LL.M., Joint Author of "International Law as Interpreted during the Russo-Japanese War."
15s. net.

HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION.

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 5s. net each.

Vol. I. HISTORY OF ANCIENT CIVILIZATION.

Vol. II. HISTORY OF MEDIAEVAL CIVILISATION.

A concise review of the development of European civilisation since the downfall of the Roman Empire.

THE CONGO AND THE COASTS OF AFRICA.

By RICHARD HARDING DAVIS. Illustrated, 6s. net.

This book sheds much new and surprising light on the manner in which King Leopold has conducted and is conducting the government of the Congo.

WILD HONEY FROM VARIOUS THYME.

By MICHAEL FIELD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

ARTIST SONGS.

By E. RICHARDSON, LL.A. Author of "Songs of Near and Far Away." Illustrated. Fcap 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

NOTABLE 6s. NOVELS.

THE BLUE LAGOON.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE.

EVE'S APPLE.

By ALPHONSE COURLANDER.

THE TERROR OF THE MACDURGHOTTS.

By C. E. PLAYNE.

FATHER ALPHONSUS.

By H. A. HINKSON.

SPECIAL EDITION.

THE MERMAID SERIES.

THE BEST PLAYS OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.

LITERAL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE OLD TEXT.

With Photogravure Frontispieces.

The volumes may now be obtained bound in the following styles:—

- I. Crown 8vo, uncut. Brown paper boards, with label,
3s. 6s.
- II. Crown 8vo, uncut. Green cloth, with gilt lettering on ink panel, 3s. 6d.
- III. Crown 8vo, uncut top. Brown cloth, with gilt lettering and decorative design in brown, 3s. 6d.
- IV. Crown 8vo. Full vellum, with gilt lettering and gilt top,
6s. net.

The Thin Paper Edition, in cloth at 2s. 6d. net, and in leather at 3s. 6d. net, is also obtainable.

LIST OF VOLUMES SENT POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

DAVID NUTT, 57, Long Acre.

Mr. NUTT will publish immediately—

THE CONGO STATE: Its Origin, Rights and Duties; the Charges of its Accusers. By the Rev. FATHER CASTELIM, S.J. With a Prefatory
Note by M. CH. WOESTE. Crown 8vo.

Mr. NUTT has just issued—

SONGS AND POEMS. By T. H. T.
CASE. Crown 8vo, 106 pp., Wrapper. 1s. net (1s. 2d.
post free).

 In the same series of 1s. Poets have already appeared:

LYRICS. By GERALD GOULD. Second Issue.

SONGS OF LOVE AND LIFE. By
MAY ALDINGTON.

POEMS. By MATILDA BETHAM-EDWARDS.
Popular Reissue.

IN GRASMERE VALE and other
Poems. By JAMES MACKERETH.

 All of the above volumes are tastefully printed at the Ballantyne Press on antique wove paper. They have been received with warm commendation by the Press and the Public.

Mr. NUTT will issue immediately in his Six Shilling Novel Series—

KATHLEEN. By W. FERGUS GRAHAM.

 Mr. Nutt's recent novels include:—

A SOUL FROM THE PIT. By WALTER GALLICHAN.

A BRUMMAGEM BUTTON. By EMILY FINNEMORE.

WHOM GOD HATH JOINED. By ARNOLD BENNETT.

DIVORCE. By PAUL BOURGET.

Mr. NUTT will shortly issue in the Irish Texts Series—

KEATING'S HISTORY OF IRELAND. Irish Text and English translation by the Rev. Father DINNEEN. Vol. II.

 The first volume, edited by the late DAVID COMYN, appeared in 1901. Vol. III and IV may be expected in the course of the year. Full particulars respecting the publications of the Irish Texts Society may be had from Mr. Nutt.

Among Mr. NUTT'S Latest Publications are—

FLEURS DE FETE. A French Birthday Book for English Households. 32mo. 240 pp.
cloth, gilt edges, 2s. 6d. net; full limp leather, gilt edges, 3s. 6d. net.

PEARL: a New Metrical Rendering. By
G. G. COULTON. Square 16mo. white buckram,
1s. net (1s. 1d. post free).

GOOD QUEEN BESS. By JOHN
HASSALL. 23 Plates in Colours. 5s.

"Here we have the artist at his very best!"—Queen.

"Be sure to get it for your bairns!"—Christian World.

"Combines to an unusual degree instruction with amusement!"
—Tribune.

THE YOUNG NORSEMAN. By
W. B. RANDS. Illustrated. 3s. 6d.

 "A rich mine of romance. A capital Christmas book for boys, and cleverly illustrated."—Scotsman.

THE ENCHANTED DOLL. A reprint of MARK LEMON'S classic Fairy Tale. Finely printed on art paper. With new Illustrations in Colour by MAY GLADWIN. Small 4to. in a Pictorial Cover, 1s. net.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 20.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.

Postage: U.K., ½d. Abroad, 1½d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 693	The Government and Irish Liberalism. By "An Irish Liberal" ... 710
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	"Lucretius, Epicurean and Poet." By John Masson ... 710
The Clash of Commerce and Militarism ... 696	"The German Codes." By Ernest Schuster ... 712
The Austrian Lead in the Balkans ... 697	Germany and the Powers. By Francis Ram ... 712
The Nation and the Railways ... 698	The Effects of a Bread Tax. By R. Shindler ... 712
The Policy of the Minimum Standard ... 700	"A Woman's Charter." By Susan Cunningham and Janet Elizabeth Leitch ... 712
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	"Simple Bible Teaching." By John Evans ... 713
Sport. By John Galsworthy ... 701	POETRY:—
Sisters of Fear ... 702	A Royalist in Spring-Time. By W. J. Cameron ... 713
Wild St. Valentine ... 703	THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 714
CONTEMPORARIES:—	Books to be Read ... 714
The Abbé Loisy's Farewell. By W. S. T. ... 703	REVIEWS:—
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—	The Age of Louis XIV. ... 715
The Revolt in German Radicalism. By Ed. Bernstein ... 705	Ancient Britain. By E.C. ... 716
THE DRAMA:—	A Minor "Prelude" ... 717
The Dramatic Critic of the "Times." By D. ... 706	A Tour de Force ... 718
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—	NOVELS ... 720
Is the Church the Clerical Party? By the Dean of Ripon ... 707	BOOKS IN BRIEF ... 722
The Spirit of Expenditure. By George McCrae, M.P. ... 708	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 724
"The Church and the Liberal Party" By Cheshire Incumbent ... 708	SUPPLEMENT:—
"Dear Old Charlie" and the Censor. By Wm. Poel ... 708	Bonaparte and Egypt. By Dr. J. Holland Rose ... 731
The Rush for Small Holdings. By Ernest E. Taylor, Montague Fordham, and Frederic Impey ... 709	Old Gold and Silver Work ... 732
	The Pick of the Publishing Season ... 733
	Modern Spanish Novelists. By Major Hume ... 734
	"Sidelights on Golf" ... 734

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE election for South Leeds has ended in a victory for Mr. Middlebrook, the Liberal, by the rather narrow majority of 359 over the Tory and Protectionist candidate, Mr. Neville. Mr. Fox, a not ideal representative of Labour, was last on the poll, and Mr. Middlebrook's majority over him was 2,853. The Liberal poll showed a decline of 926 votes, as compared with Sir John Walton's vote at the General Election, while the Tory strength, which two years ago was given to a weak candidate, has grown by 2,699 votes. This is not a satisfactory result, for Mr. Middlebrook was an able, though not an advanced, candidate, and Leeds is an historic stronghold of Liberalism and Free Trade. It presents some definite features of interest. The first bye-elections showed generally a growth of the Labour vote or a retention of the Liberal force, with no kind of movement in favour of Protection. Now the Protectionist advance is clear, and, as we have always anticipated would be the case, the Liberal and Labour forces, being kindred in character, decline together. This is a point which the Labour leaders should take into serious consideration; it is, we are sure, a capital fact in politics. For the rest, we learn from many competent sources that the Free Trade propaganda was very unwisely brought to a dead stop at the General Election, under the impression that Protection had been killed. It has now revived under the stimulus of lavish, and often very improper, expenditure, and a campaign of furious energy. A Free Trade response is imperative. The second cause of the Liberal decline is undoubtedly the absence of large and positive ideas in politics, and of the enthusiasm and freshness of mind and feeling which the advocacy of ideas carries with it. Certainly the revival of Liberal and Radical enthusiasm will not be stimulated by an abandonment of the cause of peace and retrenchment on the military services.

SIR EDWARD GREY confessed on Tuesday that his proposal to get the Macedonian gendarmerie employed in putting down the bands instead of troops had been unfavourably received by both Russia and Austria. It is, therefore, out of the field, at least for some time. Meanwhile the judicial reform scheme makes no progress, and Turkey's consent has not yet been received to the renewal of the mandate of the Finance Commission. The whole basis of the Mürzsteg scheme is in some danger of disappearing. That scheme was drawn up in 1903 by Russia and Austria, and it depended on a mutual agreement to refrain from territorial aggrandisement. In his annual statement a fortnight ago Baron von Aehrenthal announced that Austria-Hungary intended to link up the Bosnian railway lines through Novi Bazar with the Turkish lines at Mitrovitz, and since then the Sultan has given permission for the survey of the new line. This has come as a surprise to Russia, and the Russian and French Press have denounced it as treason to the Mürzsteg understanding. Baron von Aehrenthal on Thursday defended his sincerity by drawing a distinction between economic and political expansion; but it is pretty obvious that in practice these tend to become confounded. The episode is important for its bearing upon the future of the Concert and of Macedonia.

THE late King and Crown Prince of Portugal were buried on Saturday, and the King and Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales attended a memorial service on the same day at a Roman Catholic church in London. Senhor Franco has retired completely from public life, and the new Cabinet has definitely reversed his policy. The decree against the Press, and the decree of January 31st, deporting persons without trial, have been annulled with the result that suppressed papers have re-appeared, many political prisoners have been released, and some exiles have returned. The King has also abandoned the Civil List increase, the acceptance of which by the late King from Senhor Franco so embittered public feeling. It is understood that local government, abolished by the Dictator, is to be restored. With the lifting of the censorship we are beginning to learn how deep was the hatred of King Carlos. The "Times" correspondent remarks that his murder was received with "incredible equanimity," and he adds that the danger is not yet over. The Republican movement has made great progress, and the new Government's measures so far have not touched ancient radical evils nor even wiped out recent ones thoroughly. A complete amnesty of political offenders, notably of the naval mutineers of 1906, is, according to the "Secalo," indispensable for disarming public opinion.

ON Wednesday the Prime Minister moved the resolution which provides for a swift passage through the Commons of the two Scottish Bills—the Land Bill and the Land Values Bill—which the House of Lords rejected last year. The resolution is no doubt novel, for it covers two measures, and simultaneously assigns a time limit for both of them. It gives a day for the second reading stage of each measure, and one or two days for Committee and third reading, according as the proposal is amended in Committee or passed unaltered. The Bills were amply debated last year, and have a great popular agitation and feeling in Scotland at the back of them. Mr. Balfour did not object to the procedure, but thought the time limit too short, and chose to regard the policy of a second reference to the Lords as simply that of filling up the cup with a draught that the Government knew the Lords would not drink. The Bills were "preposterous," and in any case the House of Lords, in face of the bye-elections, would be armed with the knowledge that the Government were deprived of the mandate to effect resolutions. Mr. Balfour did not consider that bye-elections disqualified him from passing the Education Act and the Licensing Act. But it is clear that he now thinks he can force the pace, and bring about a general slaughter of Liberal measures through the House of Lords. The resolution was easily carried.

* * *

THE Government, with the approval of the Opposition, has sanctioned the Indian Frontier expedition. Unofficially we learn that two brigades under Sir James Willcocks will enter the Bazar valley in a few days, while a third is to be held in reserve at Peshawur. The objective is the Zakka Khels, a kind of Rob Roy clan, which harassed the retreat of the Tirah expedition and is blamed for the recent raids, and it is hoped to confine the operations to them and to restrict them to a short and sudden incursion. An extension is, we fear, probable, having regard to the explosive nature of the frontier tribes and the evident desire of Lord Kitchener to test his new army organisation. Mr. Morley promised on Tuesday to find out why no correspondents are to accompany the expedition, though he expressed the hope "that no discussion would take place until the expedition had at all events made some advance." This has been rather perversely fulfilled by Mr. F. E. Smith, who has handed in a blocking motion which will prevent Mr. W. Redmond carrying out his expressed intention of moving the adjournment of the House.

* * *

A most suggestive discussion on the state of British railways was opened in the House of Commons on Tuesday by Mr. George Hardy. Mr. Hardy's motion pointed to nationalisation, for which Mr. Gladstone provided in the Act of 1844, and to which, we believe, he was always privately attached. Mr. Lloyd-George did not accept Mr. Hardy's motion, which, as he said, raised a "gigantic issue." But he made the important announcement that the Government, following the precedent of 1865, had decided to inquire into the whole condition of the railway system. He spoke of our railway direction, on the whole, in terms of compliment, and showed how it had been handicapped by the "scandalous pillage" on the part of the landlords, from which in earlier days it had suffered. But conditions were changing, for, crushed between the demands of workers, traders, and the travelling public, the railways were coming together to stop competition. That opened a new issue. Incidentally, Mr. Lloyd-George rebutted an argument of Mr. Bonar Law which attests the worthlessness of the Protectionist case. Mr. Bonar Law, an "anti-dumper," would not allow that the low rates which our railways give to many foreign importers constituted a preference against British trade. Mr. Lloyd-George, on the contrary, affirmed that there had been "undue preferences to the foreign producer," and a true, as against a mere technical, inquiry would prove that fact. The truth is, we believe, that in quoting low rates for foreign goods in bulk the railway simply estimates the cost of the special train or service, but makes no allowance for general management. This really means that the British producer pays a portion of the cheap foreign rate.

* * *

THE case for a status quo was chiefly argued by Mr. Bonar Law and Mr. Perks. The former opposed nationalisation on the ground that it would set up an organised body of railway workers in every constituency, putting excessive pressure upon candidates in favour of higher rates and improved conditions of labour. Mr. Perks pointed out that Mr. Gladstone's Act of 1844 made a dividend of 10 per cent. the condition of expropriating any single railway. For a railway director, he spoke with singular inaccuracy. He thought the smaller number of express trains between Paris and Marseilles, as compared with London and Edinburgh, was an argument against State ownership. The French railway service in question is, of course, in private, not in public hands. Furthermore, his criticism of the effects of State purchase in Italy is entirely incorrect. Every observer is aware of the remarkable improvement which State ownership has brought about. In private hands the railways had reached the last point of inefficiency. Since then they have been steadily bettered, and the change will be clearly visible when the great work of doubling the lines has been completed.

* * *

SINCE the big debate on Morocco the French troops have resumed and increased their activity. They advanced once more to Settat, and between the 2nd and the 8th of February fought three engagements, in one of which they lost rather heavily. A communiqué in the "Sud-deutsche Reichs-correspondenz," revealed the new and rather serious fact that both Sultans, Abdul Aziz as well as Mulai Hafid, had protested to the German Government last month against French aggression. The precise formality of Abdul Aziz's protest is disputed, but there is no doubt that the German Government replied that it could not intervene alone, though the Sultan might appeal to all the signatory Powers if he had a serious grievance. M. Jaurès interpellated the Foreign Minister on Monday in connection with these episodes. M. Pichon praised the correctness of the German attitude, belittled the importance of Abdul Aziz's appeal, attacked M. Jaurès's patriotism, and declared that the French operations would continue indefinitely. The docility of the Chamber by no means reflects French opinion faithfully. Sir Harry Maclean was released on Friday after being a prisoner since July 1st. Raisuli's terms were apparently British protection and a ransom of not less than £5,000, presumably paid by the British Government.

* * *

CERTAIN statements of facts, made by Mr. Jellicoe in a letter to the Governor of Natal announcing his withdrawal from the defence of the Zulu chief Dinizulu, and borne out by letters written by Miss Colenso, throw a curious light upon the Natal conception of a "fair trial" in a Court of Justice. The refusal of the Attorney-General to permit a solicitor to enter Zululand in order to get witnesses and to prepare a defence, the refusal to permit access to documents in the possession of the Government relating to the charges against the prisoner, the difficulties placed in the way of the counsel when desiring to communicate with his client, coupled with the illegal refusal of access to Miss Colenso even when provided with a permit, the dilatory policy of remands practised by the Court, undoubtedly constitute a strong prima-facie case for supposing that it is the intention of those responsible for this trial to deprive the prisoner of fair opportunities of defending himself. It must be remembered that it was only after strong representations made from this country that Dinizulu was withdrawn from that travesty of justice entitled a court-martial and promised a trial under civil jurisdiction. But if the retention of martial law in Zululand is made the pretext for disabling him from procuring witnesses and evidence in his defence, this concession of the Natal Government to the "mawkish sentimentalism" of the Imperial Government is virtually cancelled.

* * *

MEANWHILE the retention of martial law throughout Zululand and the northern districts of Natal remains an inexplicable feature of the situation. That it should ever have been proclaimed, in face of the grave commentary upon its use tendered last year by the Imperial Government, is, we fear, only one more evidence of the intention of the Natal Ministry to disregard the Imperial connection except so far as it can be made subservient of their own designs. It is not even pretended that any serious "disaffection," much less a state of war, has arisen in these areas of martial law. Indeed, the formal announcement of amnesty made by the Governor during his recent tour in Zululand in which he proclaimed a policy of "forget and forgive," and announced that a pardon would be granted to all the rank and file of those who took part in the so-called "rebellion" of 1906, only makes the maintenance of martial law more mysterious. It is to be hoped that the wide and really urgent question of the liberty of self-governing Colonies to abuse the ultima ratio reserved for extreme instances of internecine struggles by applying it to minor incidents of police will be definitely raised in Parliament before the necessary Act of Indemnity comes to the Imperial Government for ratification. The plea for a suspension of judgment contained in a recently published letter of our Prime Minister must not be so interpreted as to preclude Parliament from considering this urgent question before it is too late.

* * *

THE "suffragettes" have made two attempts to enter the House of Commons, the first body of raiders emerging from pantechnic vans. They were, of course, captured, and a large number were sentenced to six weeks' imprisonment as second-class misdemeanants. The Home Secretary was asked on Thursday night to regard their offence as political, and to use his influence with the magistrates to have them treated as first-class misdemeanants. He refused, on the ground that the prisoners could have the prison doors opened if they liked, on giving sureties for good behaviour, and that the London magistrates had apparently come to a joint decision in favour of strict prison treatment, in view of the repetition of these offences. We are not impressed with this argument. The offence of the "suffragettes" is not less political because it has been repeated, and it is its character which is important. The country will never be persuaded that people who break the law because they wish to change it, as they think, for the better, belong to the same class as those who break it in mere selfishness or brutality.

* * *

THE presentment on Monday of a Supplementary Army Estimate, which involves a sum of £358,000, tends to show, we are afraid, that there will be little or no real saving on the Army Estimates this year. This sum, which represents savings on last year's Army expenditure, should have gone to the Sinking Fund. Mr. Haldane has diverted it to the payment of the debts of the volunteer corps. The object of this is to relieve next year's Estimates. As the War Office usually estimates too high, we are not impressed with the so-called saving, and we do not like Mr. Haldane's partial admission of Sir Charles Dilke's charge that the Territorial Army will be extremely costly.

* * *

THE adventurer—a kind of criminal "Barry Lyndon"—who called himself von Veltheim was sentenced on Wednesday to twenty years' imprisonment, practically a life sentence, for attempting to blackmail Mr. "Solly" Joel. The Judge was apparently influenced by the fact that von Veltheim had killed Mr. Joel's brother, though he was acquitted of the charge of murder. His career seemed to have been one of rascality, coloured by swagger and adventure, and there was no reason to believe his story of a Rand plot to kill Mr. Kruger. But we deprecate sentences so terrible for offences which have no serious issue.

THE fourth test match has been won by Australia by 308 runs, and as the Commonwealth Eleven won two other games, the primacy of cricket returns to it. The English Eleven failed on a bad wicket in their first innings, when they made only 105 runs against Australia's 214, and they could do nothing to meet the answering score of 385. They were handicapped throughout by the illness of their captain, Mr. Jones, who is perhaps their best all-round player. In his absence the eleven was a trifle too young and unsteady.

* * *

WE are glad to learn that the Prime Minister has offered the Crown living of Marylebone, which Dean Barker's elevation left vacant, to the Rev. W. D. Morrison. This is much the most significant and important piece of Church patronage with which the Government has as yet been associated. Dr. Morrison is a scholar and worker of European reputation, and his part in the reform of our prison system marked him out some years ago as almost the only scientific student of criminology—we had almost said of the greater science of humanity—that the prison service contained. In theology he has been a chief agent in opening up to English thought the most interesting and stimulating work of recent Continental, and especially German, schools of religious thought. His appointment, therefore, is a real victory for those who desire to preserve and continue the tradition of liberal Churchmanship which seeks to resume and enlarge the work of Jowett and Stanley. Dr. Morrison is not only a man of singular breadth and power of thought, but of a character well suited to adorn his new position.

* * *

MR. GEORGE MEREDITH's eightieth birthday was celebrated on Tuesday, chiefly by the presentation of an address from his comrades in English letters. The vellum covering of this document bore the names of four intimate friends of Mr. Meredith, who were also four chief figures in contemporary literature—Mr. Swinburne, the greatest of living English poets; Mr. Morley, the greatest living English critic; Mr. Hardy, after Mr. Meredith, the most distinguished of our novelists; and Mr. Frederick Greenwood, truly the doyen of English contemporary journalism. The address, presented in Mr. Meredith's modest home in a fold of the Surrey Hills, well spoke of the life by which he had advanced the ideals of his art. Goethe himself could not boast a more dignified career, a daily existence more noble in its simplicity and serene withdrawal from elements of vanity and weakness.

* * *

SIR JAMES KNOWLES, who died suddenly at Brighton on Thursday at the age of seventy-five, was a figure of real significance in English literary life. His chief work in it was the founding and maintenance of the "Nineteenth Century and After." This famous review he made into a forum for the discussion of great questions by great men, and its authoritative and often brilliant pages formed a useful monthly pendant to the work of the "Times" in the same direction. This achievement was entirely due to the editor's personality, to his faculty for turning to practical account the passion he had for the company of the distinguished, and to his singular flair for interesting work. These gifts made him a really great journalist, who could always reckon on obtaining much of the best kind of fugitive writing of his time. He was a little too fond of names for names' sake, and this tendency developed in the later years of his editing. But he made several discoveries, and his magazine was always alive. It was possible to regard Knowles as a flâneur, for he loved gossip and the shows of the town. But he was a man of winning kindness of heart and manner, and he had a sure eye for the excellent both in literature and in art.

Politics and Affairs.

THE CLASH OF COMMERCE AND MILITARISM.

It is, we think, a misfortune that Sir Edward Grey, who has a singular gift of affecting the imagination of his own countrymen, has so little power of realising the thoughts and feelings of others. This incapacity handicaps him in the actual business of politics, just as a general is handicapped in battle by his failure to guess what is going on on the opposite side of the hill. A very crucial example of his failing occurred in last week's important debate on the right of capture of an enemy's merchant vessels in time of war. If Sir Edward had possessed the power of sympathetic intuition, he would not, we think, have based his case for retaining the right to capture private property at sea on the argument that to abolish that right would cripple the activities of the British Navy. How does that argument sound in the ears of the foreign nations to which it was in part addressed? In the first number of THE NATION the Prime Minister declared that "the sea power of this country implied no challenge to any single State or group of States." "I am persuaded," he added, "that throughout the world that power is recognised as non-aggressive, and innocent of designs against the independence, the commercial freedom, and the legitimate development of other States." But what was Sir Edward Grey's account of the main function of the British Navy in time of war? His grievance against the doctrine of immunity for trade was that under it the enemy's commerce "was to go without let or hindrance," and that our fleet was deprived of its power of "bringing any pressure to bear on the mercantile marine of a foreign country." How does that contention support the Prime Minister's theory of the non-aggressive character of the British Navy?

Sir Edward Grey argued in all sincerity that the question of capture at sea was completely divorced at The Hague Conference from that of the reduction of armaments, and that the failure of our policy under the first head was in no way influenced by our refusal to treat with Germany and other sea Powers under the other. This may be the formal truth, but no observer can doubt that the two events were closely, even vitally, connected. We cannot well blame Germany for cherishing fears for the safety of her growing mercantile marine against such a destructive power as we command, and for providing a countering force. Indeed, Sir Edward Grey's argument seems to us to be directed quite as much to the defeat of the cause of the reduction of armaments as of that of immunity for trading vessels at sea. For the Foreign Secretary could find no security in an honourable agreement among Naval Powers to leave each other's merchant shipping alone. "Would you," he asked, "really be quite safe if you so decreased the British Navy in consequence of such an agreement (i.e., to secure immunity from capture) that in case of war you would not have the means to protect your mercantile marine?" We cannot think that the cheers which followed that statement came from the Liberal benches. For if foreign Powers cannot be trusted to keep an honourable understanding in regard to the safety of merchant shipping, they may well break faith in regard to the promise to reduce armaments. We think Sir Edward's argument unduly materialistic and sceptical, for, as a matter of fact, the nations adhere honourably to proposals, under the Geneva Convention, to soften the cruelties of war. Civilised Powers do not poison wells, or use obviously explosive bullets. But if the Foreign Secretary is right, the hope of reducing armaments by agreement is vain. Where we fail to follow Sir Edward Grey is in his commendation of a cause which his arguments defeat, and also, we are bound to add, in his failure to perceive the rebound of his case in favour of the retention of the right of capture on our own commerce. Major Seely pointed out that though, in the event of a naval war, we may be superior in warships in the proportion of two to one, we should be five or six to one in respect of British ships liable to capture. German merchandise, even when it was not conveyed over-land, could readily be carried in Dutch vessels, as much of it is carried to-day. Our much vaster commerce and mercantile sea power could seek no such protection. The tables would then be turned, as the sound instinct of British commerce in favour of immunity has all along perceived.

It is for these reasons that we see with some concern the failure of a Liberal Government to defend its historic relationship with British commerce, when a certain clash occurs between commercial interests and the prepossessions of the war services. We hope that that failure will not be repeated when the nation's eyes are turned on the general question of warlike expenditure. The Liberal Party is, we hope, a people's party. But it is also a commercial party. At the moment there is a real confrontation between trade and militarism. Our commerce wants the free supply of cheap money which has ceased to flow since the South African War. The home trade has been gravely restricted by the want of capital—is so restricted, with disastrous consequences to employment, to this hour. Mr. Asquith has done something to restore our finances and to check the disastrous results of a long period of unproductive expenditure. But in a time of real and unusual rest and appeasement among the nations, he has not achieved the capital result of placing the warlike expenditure of the nation on a peace basis. This, as Mr. McCrae reminds us elsewhere, was the crowning distinction of Gladstonian finance in the period following the Crimean War. Here, indeed, is a mark to be set up and to be aimed at, not merely in the policy of Liberal Governments, but in their construction. We doubt whether a control of expenditure and a diversion of the national wealth into the right channels can ever be achieved unless the Premiership is at some future day associated with the Chancellorship of the Exchequer. Finance is the key to modern statesmanship; and finance is also the soul of a progressive Government, both on its democratic and its administrative side. If Mr. Haldane and Lord Tweedmouth cannot by themselves keep the cost of the Army and Navy within such bounds as a democratic House of Commons will accept and willingly sanction, they must either give place to other statesmen, or they must have a special reinforcement of strength from the directing heads of the Cabinet.

Let us add one other consideration, which bears directly on the issue, so imprudently and unwisely raised, between this country and Germany. We believe that the question of national safety cannot be raised in relation to the forthcoming Army and Navy Estimates with any pretence to reality. The present overwhelming superiority of the British to the German fleet is admitted by every authority worth counting, by Sir John Fisher, by Lord Brassey, by the compilers of the "Naval Annual," and by Sir Edward Grey. That superiority cannot be disturbed for at least four years to come, even if we leave out of account every one of the five separate classes of battleships which are all superior to the strongest German ships afloat to-day. In "Dreadnoughts," "Invincibles," and "Lord Nelsons" alone, we should have, in 1912, practically a two to one advantage over the German vessels existing in that year. If the little inferior "King Edwards" and the kindred new classes are reckoned, as of course they would be reckoned, that superiority is beyond comparison. We cannot but think that the Government are alive to these material facts, and also to the larger aspects of the European situation. Even if we are to treat the improved Anglo-German relations as nothing, and to wipe out the Kaiser's visit as a mere insincerity, or even as a deliberately assumed mask for unfriendliness, we are bound to take account of the political position in Germany, and of the unfavourable effect upon it of a precipitate British programme of shipbuilding. The bloc in the Reichstag is not solid, never has been solid, on the finance of the new naval programme. If we will avoid the capital error of supposing that we can stop shipbuilding in Germany by running huge and dominating counter-proposals on this side, we may yet secure a reasonable modification of the German programme. Programmes invariably stimulate programmes, and as long as the peoples stand the cost, that self-slaughtering rule in armaments will hold. The revision of the abortive German scheme of 1900 was not a wanton provocation to Great Britain; it was a defensive answer to our initiation of "Dreadnoughts," following on our creation of a fleet that practically wiped all Germany's vessels off the seas. If the two nations can once realise that good-will breeds good-will, they will have reached a profound moral truth, which readily works in practice into the ordinary fabric of affairs.

THE AUSTRIAN LEAD IN THE BALKANS.

For five years past the Great Powers of Europe have been engaged in a debate about European Turkey which was wearisome because it was so rarely sincere. One would find if one were to make an exhaustive collection of all the despatches and speeches composed by official persons upon this desolating theme, the materials for a really edifying discussion, in which two contrasted but equally disinterested views of politics have clashed and the unsubstantial play of nationalism and fanaticism, Powers urged the case of the revolted populations, denounced Turkish misrule, and argued, with that sharp insight which official persons often display in criticising the affairs of other Empires, for drastic and radical remedies. The Eastern Powers, on the other hand, with a fine show of impartiality, balanced the offences of rebels and rulers, and discoursed on the beauty of order and the paramount duty of preserving peace. Suddenly, in the midst of this academic and apparently disinterested discussion, a new word has been spoken. Britain still talks of humanity and reform, and Russia of peace and order. But Austria has said "railways." It is like some profane echo from the Stock Exchange in the midst of a debate in Convocation. Most of us knew that all the while, when Austrian statesmen juggled with moral categories, they really meant railways. But the effect produced by this sudden lapse into candour is none the less startling, and the Russian Press, in particular, has been seized with a rather alarming fit of moral indignation.

The brutal fact about the whole Turkish problem is that for a generation past it has meant for the real directors of European policy little else than railways. Greeks and Bulgars have been cutting each other's throats for a national idea, and Abdul Hamid slaughtering Armenians in the name of religion. Statesmen watched these manœuvres, content to know that, amid the unsubstantial play of nationalism and fanaticism, sleepers and steel rails are solid realities. Asia Minor may be for us the stage on which races are martyred, and Macedonia a vortex of human miseries. To the Bülow and the Aerenthals they are simply the routes which lead to Salonica and Bagdad. It is only half a century since a quarrel for the keys of the Holy Sepulchre led to the Crimean war. To-day it is for the keys of harbours and roads that the Powers are struggling. To the British conscience Macedonia is a collection of villages where men are murdered and women dishonoured in a war of churches and nationalities. To the concrete German intellect Macedonia is simply the valley of the Vardar, the highway from the Adriatic to the Aegean. Baron von Aerenthal has just announced that he has obtained from the Porte permission to survey the route for the 150 kilomètres of railway, which were required to bridge the gap in Novi-Bazar, between the Bosnian and Macedonian systems. When that is complete, the road for troops and merchandise, constructed solely of Austrian metal, will lie open from Vienna to Salonica; an extension by way of Larissa may link it to the Piræus, and a branch to Scutari open Northern Albania. In the light of that announcement one understands, at length, why Austria and Germany oppose all really effective reforms in Macedonia. Austria, posing still as one of the two Powers charged with the task of reform, has sold her mandate for a concession. Henceforward it is not mere inertia which blocks the work of the Concert, but sheer financial interest. Austria, in a less dramatic way, has done what the Kaiser did when he went to Constantinople to embrace the Sultan over the corpses of the Armenians. Armenia without the Armenians was still the road to the Persian Gulf. Macedonia without the Macedonians has still the passes of the Vardar, and the broad gulf of Salonica. Salonica, to land-locked Austria, means more than Port Arthur meant to Russia. The compact, as the Russians justly divine, alters the whole aspect of the future. It is not merely this or that reform which Austria will block. Turkey has not opened her railway system to the Austrian invader without assuring herself that the support of Vienna will be permanent.

The European spectator, unversed in the peculiarities of Turkish politics, is apt to argue from other precedents—that a railway, even when its promoters are cynics, is, after all, a highway for civilisation. Surely, he retorts, when the Indian mails are running over Austrian metals to Salonica, Macedonia must reap her harvest from the new traffic and anarchy disappear, if only because the highroad itself must be policed? Trade and security and the stimulus of direct contact with Europe and Europeans will insensibly bring order and prosperity to this mediæval chaos. It ought to be so, and ultimately it may be so, but these effects are not yet observable on the routes of the existing railways. Their construction and maintenance are an intolerable burden to the country, for the European financier always insists on a guarantee of so much per kilomètre, which ensures him a profit quite independent of the prosperity of the line. Baron Hirsch knew how to increase this profit by the simple expedient of building unnecessary loops and serpentine curves, which roll to-day over level plains—a monument to Turkish venality and European cupidity. The lines are managed solely in the interest of strategical needs and the through European traffic. There is little attempt to cater for local wants, and the stations are often many miles from the towns. It is always the peasant who pays, and the kilometric guarantee of the railways, like the service of the foreign debt, is always a first charge on the tithes. Nor do the railways contribute notably to the security of the countryside. Instead of pacifying and policing the whole country through which a railway passes, the Turks prefer, at an appalling cost, to station their patient conscripts in tents and shanties along the line. These sentries watch the bridges and the culverts, but a mile away from the line the bandit and bashi-bazouk work their will unmolested. The European financier, with the Yildiz clique to aid him, has always been willing to exploit the peasants and tax-payers of Turkey. He has never yet reached the standpoint of enlightened self-interest, which sees that prosperity and good government are the condition of any really flourishing commerce. The British railway from Smyrna to Aidin is the one honourable exception to this rule of grasping and short-sighted exploitation.

Meanwhile, the task of international reform in Macedonia itself has become, in consequence of this "deal" between Vienna and Constantinople, more difficult than ever. The Sultan is proposing to incorporate all the European officials in the Turkish service, and though the Ambassadors reject this impudent claim, they do not appear to resent it. The timid little scheme of judicial reform makes no apparent progress, and though it is at present so weak as to be nearly worthless, all the Ambassadors, our own included, have agreed to recommend a further process of dilution. Sir Edward Grey, on the other hand, has at last realised, as Lord Lansdowne did after a brief experience of office, that there can be no advance if the Western Powers are content to leave the initiative to Austria and Russia. He has proposed to arm the European officers with executive powers, to employ the gendarmerie under their command in hunting down the bands, and to meet the additional outlay which this would involve, by reducing the cost of the army of occupation. This suggestion amply justifies the programme of the Balkan Committee, which has been urging, for five years past, that international "control" is nearly useless, without executive powers. It is doubtful whether the cost of an efficient gendarmerie would really be prohibitive, if the European officers were authorised to enroll a non-professional peasant militia to act as a passive line of defence in the villages themselves. The tragedy of the present position is that the Macedonian peasant is at his best a decidedly virile and self-reliant person, quite capable of defending his village against bands and brigands, if only he were allowed to carry arms. Frequently, indeed, he has a store of rifles waiting in some hiding-place in the woods against the next insurrection, but if he were to use them for self-defence against marauders he would only invite a visitation from the Turkish soldiery. The work of combating the bands is an indispensable measure of police, and many of them are merely foreign invaders. But there are genuine Macedonian bands, governed by a local organisation, working for liberation, and serving at present, though often by barbarous means, a purpose that is not wholly mischievous. They help to terrorise the worse type of Turkish landlord, and to hold the bashi-bazouks in check. Reform in other directions must keep pace with repression. One does not wish the European gendarmerie to become the servant of an unregenerate Turkish administration.

This new Austrian move reveals very clearly the danger to European peace which is latent in the Balkan problem. Italy, which has looked to Albania for her future expansion since the Montenegrin marriage, and allowed her older ambitions in Tripoli to lie dormant, would not be passive in face of an Austrian advance. The Russian newspapers have been talking as though the compact with Austria were now mere waste paper, and even as though an Austro-Russian War might become a possibility in the near future. In point of fact, none of these three Powers dare think of war, and yet a policy of open self-aggrandisement might easily lead to war. The policies of partition and of laissez-faire are almost equally dangerous. They are really complementary. So long as we allow Turkey to remain unreformed, so long will partition seem the inevitable end, and partition means certain war.

THE NATION AND THE RAILWAYS.

WHILE Mr. Lloyd-George was naturally unable to commit the Government to the principle of State purchase of the railways, we are convinced that a very widespread public opinion, by no means confined to Socialist and Radical circles, welcome his statement that the time has now come for a close and comprehensive inquiry into the relations between the State and the Railway Companies, which shall not preclude the policy of national ownership and working, should that solution be found desirable and feasible. Although the fact that every other European country save Spain and Portugal, together with our own self governing Colonies, own or are in process of acquiring their railways, may be in itself no convincing testimony to the validity of the policy for us, it does undoubtedly show that this national ownership belongs to the normal development of a modern State, and cannot be discussed as a new revolutionary project. The difficulties of estimating the degree of success attendant on the process of nationalisation were well illustrated in the course of last Tuesday's debate. But while it may often be difficult to prove that in cheapness or efficiency of service the State railways of the Continent excel or equal the private services here, it is remarkable that no country which has once nationalised its railway system would, even if it could, revert to private ownership and working. This, we take it, does not imply any fixed conviction that public officials will necessarily bring other and more enlightened management to bear than private directorates, even in a country where directors are chiefly chosen for other than business qualifications. The tendency to nationalise railways is due to the general recognition that in its structure and working a railway can never rank as an ordinary competitive business. Where railways compete, their competition is more wasteful and disastrous than any other industrial competition. Where they do not compete, their combination is fraught with even graver public injuries. Competition and combination alike are reasons why every civilised State must maintain a closer public control over this than over ordinary business operations. Mr. Lloyd-George rightly called attention to the colossal extravagance and waste involved both in the origin of our railways, and in their competitive working, with their empty or half-empty trains, and their duplication of lines, stations, and officials.

But though this waste is probably greater in transport than in any other line of business, the prime motive for making towards a national control, which cannot eventually stop short of ownership, is not competition, but the failure to compete. The real grievance of the ordinary trader against the railways is his conviction that the latter, by monopoly or by combination, impose excessive or discriminative rates prejudicial to the trade of certain parts of the country as compared with others, and of British trade as compared with foreign. While we agree with Mr. Bonar Law that some of this criticism is erroneous, being based on the unreasonable claim that retail carriage should be sold as cheaply as wholesale, we cannot conceal our surprise that this arch-Protectionist should defend a railway policy which is, in fact, one of the leading instruments and classic examples of "dumping." For there is no doubt whatever that the low rates accorded to foreign produce, shipped in bulk along our railways from ports of entry, have, in fact, exercised a very injurious influence upon our agriculture and our industries. It may be, probably is, vain for English traders to seek redress of this burden from companies which are compelled, from the conditions of their being, to make such discriminations as spell "dividend." It may be, probably is, impossible for the State to compel companies to stop this discrimination and forego its gain. But the more clearly traders recognise this truth, the more seriously will they turn to the alternative of Public Ownership.

It may perhaps be urged that, if it is sound business for a company to make these thoroughly anti-British discriminations, it will be sound policy for a State railway. But this objection ignores a most vital distinction between a public and a private enterprise. An enlightened State railway will not conduct its operations with a single eye to the monetary profits of railroading; charging the highest rates where it can exort them, and giving low rates to get the business of foreigners; over-feeding certain main routes with cheap luxurious services, while starving remoter and less developed districts; maintaining a number of expensive boards of directors, and paying its lower grades of employees wages insufficient to maintain them and their families in decency and comfort. A company driven by the necessity of earning dividends may be disposed, nay driven, to adopt such courses: it may pay it to do so. It would not "pay" a State railway conducted with a due regard to the wider welfare of the community. Such a railway would consider part of its duty to lie in helping to develop the agricultural and industrial resources of the country as a whole, not of selected centres only; it might legitimately open and sustain branch lines which could not be immediately remunerative, run "workmen's" or other cheap trains which did not cover their separate cost, just as it would be publicly advantageous to pay rates of wages and give other terms of employment which would help to raise the material and moral well-being of large classes of employees. Much of the short-sighted criticism poured out by Mr. Perks and other speakers is invalidated by failure to recognise this vital difference between a policy "profitable" for the State, and one profitable for bodies of shareholders. For many of the Continental railways which are compared unfavourably with the services of our main lines, take into consideration other utilities than those represented in the amount of remunerative traffic, viz., the broader industrial, social, and even military exigencies of the nation. Our Post Office affords in many parts of the country a rural service which, taken by itself, as a purely business proposition, does not pay, but is truly profitable in the wider sense. So the national economy of our railway system in public hands must be measured by standards different from those applicable to a company.

We know no matter upon which thorough scrutiny is more urgently required at the present time than the condition of our railways. In so large a proposal as that of national ownership, it would, of course, be as unwise as it would be improper to move rapidly. Railway shares have considerably depreciated, and dividends have fallen, no small proportion of recently invested capital, notoriously in the underground railways of the Metropolis, proving utterly unremunerative. Some of these are doubtless passing causes of depression. But others may be permanent and growing. Even the most ardent advocates of State ownership may well wish to advance with caution. Mr. Lloyd-George's interposition in the debate last Tuesday was not a mere platonic utterance of encouragement. A careful official survey of the entire ground of railroad reform is already being conducted by the most energetic and successful of our younger statesmen, who is sufficiently imaginative to realise the meaning of a genuinely national system of highways in the life of a growing industrial community, while cautious enough to safeguard the nation against an impetuous advance into a country as yet insufficiently explored. The clear aim of the President of the Board of Trade is to make the railways serve the interests of British trade and agriculture, to some such degree as the German system serves German trade and agriculture. To this end the whole system of low import rates for foreign goods, which "pro-dumpers" of the type of Mr. Bonar Law defend, must come under review. It is manifestly unfair that when German railways devise special means of pouring German goods in bulk on these shores, English railways should assist them by rates so framed as to enhance that advantage. To these rates the English producer undoubtedly contributes by the higher rates he pays on the carriage of his own goods, and by the method which our railways adopt of calculating the foreign rate. Mr. George has to bring into line a great body of national opinion when he sets himself to open up a new relationship between the nation's commerce and what is still its chief means of land carriage.

THE POLICY OF THE MINIMUM STANDARD.

It is interesting to note that the two most vivid and alert personalities among the younger Liberal leaders, Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill, are awakening to the necessity of new departures in practical politics. We have dealt above with the problem of the railways, which Mr. George has opened up. In his speech to the Young Liberals, Mr. Churchill, like Mr. George, revealed a diagnosis and outlined a policy. Mr. Chamberlain returned from Africa—from which come all new things—more than ever convinced that home political affairs were parochial, that the true statesman would henceforth extend his outlook to the larger horizons of the illimitable veldt. Mr. Churchill has returned, more than ever convinced that the future of the Empire is being decided here at its heart. He has discovered that the British people are becoming more and more concerned with the question of their own social conditions. While the map is being painted red, many of our own people are half-starved in the midst of such plenty as the world has never before seen. They find that Imperialism, instead of setting itself to the creation of an Imperial race, has been content to absorb the advantages of Empire in the interests of select classes, leaving the workman to fend as best he may. During the decade of this extravagance, no kind of attempt was essayed to make life a richer and more humane affair for the masses of people which are collected in these little islands. Large sections of our artisan population have indeed attained a position of modest comfort unparalleled by any similar populations in Europe. But they have attained it only by stout fighting, by organising Labour into Unions, whose existence and development the "Imperialists" have fought almost with bitterness; by that "Free Trade" which the Imperialists, in the name of Empire, are now desirous to destroy. While this fever raged, Social Reform slumbered and slept. Now that the fever has burnt itself out, the Condition-of-the-People question occupies most of the arena of political interest. Upon it, for the next generation, elections will be fought, Governments will be made and unmade, surprises and sudden upheavals sweep away the best-laid schemes of clever men. The people are determined to press towards a better life for themselves and their children; they will have it from whatever party will give it them; they will swallow a good deal of unpalatable policy in association with it if they are guaranteed the one thing upon which they have set all their desires.

The advocates of things as they are, who think that every change must be a harmful change, are confronted at present with two violent propaganda. The one is the hope which Protection is dangling before the weekly wage-earners, of employment which shall be steady and secure. The other is the Socialist vision of a Society transformed, with the waste of the present system largely eliminated, and some larger approach towards a fairer adjustment of "the monstrous inequalities of fortune." Both these panaceas, however fascinating their ultimate promises, offer prospects of intermediate collapse which excite foreboding amongst the far-sighted. The Tariff, in its effort to exclude foreign-made goods, might strike an irrecoverable injury to the whole gigantic fabric of our export trade, balanced, as, for example, the cotton industry in Lancashire is balanced, on the narrowest margin of profits. And Socialism, in its efforts to right the wrongs of poverty, might conceivably wrong the rights of individuals in any attempt at too sudden disturbance or supersession of the energy and ambition which alone has been adequate to build up and to maintain our commercial supremacy. Yet neither can be fought by negatives. A policy of denial is a policy of despair.

Between these two, therefore, and with the avowed intention of righting the more conspicuous injustices of modern life, without at the same time bringing the whole complicated fabric toppling to the ground, Mr. Churchill offers the programme of a Minimum Standard. He would build a platform above the Abyss, below which no human being should be permitted to descend; to which level he would compel the State to hoist all the forlorn multitudes who to-day endure existence beneath. It was the attempt of the Poor Law, of all the English Poor Laws, to declare that beneath a certain exiguous standard of intelligible life no citizen of England should be allowed to descend. It failed, because the administration was perhaps more concerned with frightening off those who were inclined to descend to that standard than with elevating the less fortunate to its level. So that although the English law guarantees that no man or woman shall die of starvation, men and women perish of starvation almost every day. And although the English Law definitely provides money adequate to the relief of widows and children, and often some form of pensions for old age, widows and children continue to exist in conditions intolerable to contemplate, and the old prefer misery outside to the comparative comfort of the State-managed institutions. Evidently there would appear to be opportunity for a fresh start.

That fresh start, we are sure, will no longer be content with the low platform of 1834. It will demand the definite raising of the minimum. It may require large reforms, emphatic revolutionary changes in the life of the accumulated proletariat of the earth. If it will guarantee organisation of the unemployed, and work (to the minimum standard of remuneration) for the unemployed, it will also necessitate some drastic means of dealing with those who decline work, and some redemptive methods for those who are unable to give back to the nation the value of their money. It will accept as part of its programme minimum rates of remuneration, fixed by law; a minimum standard of accommodation in the home, which are the growing places of the coming generations; with large development of State enterprise in the utilisation of so-called surplus labour, in the training of children and "young persons" for their position in the world. But it will leave all the possibilities of individual initiative and ambition to those who, dissatisfied with such a minimum, are determined to exercise their activities in the struggle for personal gain. That struggle has been the greatest incentive to "progress"; the determination of the man of power to attain, the will that grasps at circumstance and bends it to its desire, the resolution to bequeath a distinguished name and great possessions to wife and children. The real danger of complete Collectivism is not in the least the accepted appeals against it to prejudice or to selfishness. It is not because it is a system incompatible with religion, or because it would make the future of the stupid and incompetent amongst the wealthier classes much more precarious. Whatever changes may come upon Society will be independent of the human outlook upon ultimate things. Whatever changes will come upon Society—if Society is to endure—must of necessity make the future of the stupid and incompetent amongst the wealthier classes more precarious. The real danger is lest the energy which now builds up great businesses, works new patents, accepts risks and adventures, presses its trade into newly-discovered regions, should be content to settle down into a toleration of the accepted things, in secure position under a State department, to enjoy, rather than to struggle and attain. No such fear challenges the conception of a Minimum Standard of Life. Much of its platform advocacy will be denounced as Socialistic, just as every scheme designed to make, through common action, the lot of the poor more tolerable will be branded as Socialistic. But worked out scientifically in all its aspects, it may well be accepted as a practical and necessary business, adequate in its appeal to hold the balance of a great Middle Party between the divergent fascinations of Protection on the one hand and full economic Socialism on the other.

Life and Letters.

SPORT.

OFTEN in the ride of some Scotch wood I used to stand, with eyes moving from right to left, from left to right. Every nerve and fibre of my body would receive and answer to the slightest movements, the smallest noises, the faintest scents; and my fingers would quiver on my gun. The acrid sweetness of the spruce trees in the mist, the bite of innumerable midges, the feel of the deep wet mossy heather underfoot, the brown-grey twilight of the wood, the stillness—these were poignant as they will never be again. And slowly, back of that stillness, the noises of the beaters would begin. Gentle and regular, at first—like the ending of a symphony rather than its birth—it would swell, then drop and fade away completely. In that unexpected silence a squirrel would scurry out along a branch, sit a moment looking, and scurry back; or, with its soft, blunt flight, an owl would fly across.

A shrill, far: "Marrk!" and the beaters' chorus would again rise, drowned for an instant by the crack of the keeper's gun; then louder and louder, rhythmically, inexorably, forward. In the ride little shivers of wind shook the drops of warm mist off the needles of the spruce, and a half-veiled sun faintly warmed and coloured everything. Stealing through the heather and fern would come a rabbit, confiding in the space before him and the ride where he was wont to sun himself. At my shot he would fling his mortal somersault, or disappear into a burrow, reached too soon. To see him lie there dead in the brown-grey twilight of the trees would give me a strange pleasure—a feeling such as some casual love affair will give a man, the pleasure of a primitive virility expressed—but to watch him disappear into the earth would irritate, for I had seen him get his death, and, dead within the earth, he would not do me any sort of credit. Nor was it nice to think that he was dying slowly, so I forbore to think.

Sometimes we did not shoot at such small stuff, but waited for the roedeer. These dun familiars of the wood were very shy, clinging to the deepest thickets, treading with gentle steps, invisible as spirits, and ever trying to break back. Now and then, leaping forward with hind quarters higher than its shoulders, one of them would face the line of beaters, and there would arise the strangest noises, above the customary sounds and tappings paid for with two shillings and a lunch—cries of a fierce resentment, that so much flesh, that such fine "game," should thus escape the guns. When it crossed the line these cries swelled into a shriek, and in the ride my fingers would tighten on my gun; then, as the yells died down in baffled mutterings, I used to feel a hollow sense of disappointment.

When the beat was over they would collect the birds and beasts which had fulfilled their destiny, and place them all together. Half hidden by the bracken or deep heather the little bodies lay, abandoned to the ground with the wonderful strange limpness of dead things. We would stand looking at them in the misty air, acrid with the sweetness of the spruce trees; and each of us would feel a vague strange thirst, a longing to be again standing in the rides with the cries of the beaters in our ears, and creatures coming closer, closer to our guns.

Often in the police courts I have sat, while they drove another kind of "game."

It would be quiet in there but for the whisperings and shufflings peculiar to all courts of law. Through the high-placed windows a grey light fell impartially on everything, and in it everything looked hard and shabby, having parted with its shadow. The air in there smelled of old clothes, and now and then, when the women were brought in, of the corpse of some sweet scent.

Through a door on the left-hand side they would drive these women, one by one, often five or six, even a dozen, in one morning. Some shuffled forward to the dock with their heads down, others walked boldly; some looked as if they must faint; others were hard and stoical as stone. Some would be dressed in black, quite neatly; some in cheap, creased, rumpled finery; some in skimped, starved, mud-stained garments. Most of them were English. Their faces were of many types—dark and short with high cheek-bones; blowsy from drink; worn and raddled; one, here and there, like a wild fruit; and many that were bestially insensible, devoid of any sort of beauty.

They stood—as in Southern countries one may see mules or asses, harnessed to too-heavy loads of wood or stone, stand utterly unmoving, with a mute, submissive viciousness. Now and then one of them would turn half-round towards the public, her lips smiling defiantly, her eyes never resting for a moment, as though well knowing there was no place where they could rest. The next would seem smitten with a sort of death-like shame, but there were not many of this kind, for they were those whom the beaters had driven in for the first time. Sometimes they refused to speak. But as a rule they gave their answers in hard voices, their sullen eyes a little lowered. Then, having received the meed of justice, they shuffled, or flaunted stoically, out.

They were used to being driven, it was their common lot; a little piece of sport growing more frequent with each year that intervened between their present and that moment when some sportsman first caught sight of them and started out to bring them down. From most of them that day was now far distant, many thousand miles of pavement off, so far that it was hard work to remember it. What sport they had afforded since! And not one of all their faces seemed to show that they saw the fun that lay in their being driven-in like this. True women that they were, they took it all quite seriously, as though they knew that man had done the best for them; grateful still perhaps at the bottom of their hearts for that first moment when they came shyly towards him as he stood there holding his breath for fear they should not come; convinced that it had been their business to attract him and afford him sport; incidentally too, now, to keep themselves alive. To be harried by the beaters, and brought up here to prevent their straying from the well-stocked coverts and damaging the fields—it was the usual thing!

Beneath the brazen hardness of the most stoical there was a something in their faces that seemed to cringe ever so little to the fact they saw set forth in all the faces round, the fact that they were "game." "Game" to be allowed within certain bounds for the purpose of affording sport—a comfort and assuagement to man's primitive desire to shoot and feed on what he shoots; but when they strayed beyond those bounds, to be trapped like vermin.

No smile on all these faces showed them to be thinking of the humorous thing, that there was not a single man perhaps in all that court who had not been a sportsman in his time, and helped a little bit to bring them where they were. When they were beautiful, men had not let them beg, but had begged of them. They had given, until their looks were gone. Now that their looks were gone, they found it needful to implore men to be sportsmen. When they implored men to be sportsmen, men brought them here. How could they see the humour of this thing? It was better to be unconscious of the humour than to starve; they knew that if they did not beg men to be sportsmen, they themselves would never get enough to eat. The more sportsmen there were, the better for the "game," until the moment of black death.

So, one after another, they would walk into the dock, and take it all, each in her own fashion, very seriously.

Silently we men would watch—as one may watch rats let out of a cage to be pounced on by a terrier, their frightened restless eyes, cowed by coming death; their short frantic rush, soon ended; their tossed, limp bodies! On some of our faces was a jeering curiosity, as though we said: "We thought you would come to this!" A few faces—not used to such a show—were darkened with a kind of pity. The most were fixed, and hard, and dull, as of men looking at hurtful things they own and cannot do without. But in all of our unmoving eyes could be seen that tightening of the fibre, that tenseness, which is the mark of sport. The beaters had well done their work, the game was driven to the gun.

It was but the finish of the hunt, the hunt that we had started, one or other of us, some fine day, the sun shining and the blood hot, wishing no harm to anyone, but just a little sport.

JOHN GALSWORTHY.

SISTERS OF FEAR.

THEY are brave with the silent steadfastness which counts; for they go down into the packed ranks of those who struggle to exist respectably, without help, without hope of rest, and with no chance of gain; and they are women, past the age of youth, and, maybe, entering the youth of age, who never learned to work.

Some unexpected cause has changed their lives. Death, or a sudden poverty, misunderstandings, perhaps a wrong, have left them to fend and battle for themselves among the unskilled labourers at little things who labour with their fingers and their brain, in the Big Grey City where men game with lives, and do not count the pieces that are lost to win their stake.

Theirs is no sudden craze or make-believe which pays big fees for learning never meant to be applied, or plays at a dainty, interesting work to while away some empty morning hours, or wears a little apron of lawn, and serves expensive tea in dim-lit rooms. They do not seek their occupation as an excuse to gain release from home and see imagined Life without restraint. They work to make a home, and know the stress and welter of real life—the struggling life where credit lasts a week. But so long as they can earn the wherewithal to pay for their small wants, they are, or pretend to be, content.

This is the only glamour of their toil; for, of their necessity, they cannot choose. Therefore, they do the work which dulls the brain, or makes of their fingers tired, worn machines, or blunts their susceptibilities, or strains their eyes, for what is just, or not, enough to live upon. So, for the havoc of their ill-paid toil they cannot save.

They do not do the work they feel they must, or think they can, or hope will pass the time, for personal pleasure, profit, or applause. They work to live.

Thus, though they do not bind expensive books, working in coloured calf with costly tools, in the libraries they stand about for hours, to classify and catalogue long rows, or hunt a reference through dusty tomes, or wrestle wearily with cumbrous files of years-old newspapers, to earn the sorry pittance paid to those who gather long-forgotten facts from print. They do not draw or paint in studios, upheld by hope through headaches and despair, or self-comsoled for mediocre work by freedom, an income, and cigarettes; but in the dimness of one grimy-windowed room, they colour hundreds of merry Christmas cards, and lay them out upon the bed to dry. They do not traffic, under foreign names, in hats and clothes, and spend their time in the places of the rich, superbly dressed, as an advertisement; they make the dainty things that others sell, working with conscientious stitch, and painful, peering industry and care, at home or in the work-rooms of the shops; and by their drudgery of hand and eye they earn an extra price from those who buy and a pittance for themselves from those who sell. Nor do they photograph their friends for gain, in dainty rooms with canvas-covered walls; but in some back, ill-ventilated hutch, filled with the acrid smell of rancid paste, they mount and finish, with a frowning care, the smile, the simper, and the half-turned face; and as they correct an error in an eye to please the vanity of those who pay, they strain their sight to pay for what they need. And though they daily write a heavy count of many thousands of scribbled words, they do not know the pride of authorship, nor yet the pain of putting thoughts in print, but only the blind, anxious, driving haste of writing names of people, streets, and towns on endless envelopes—enough to earn a wage.

For in all the various situations that they fill, they do the work which needs no special gift of mind or face or form; the work which thousands can do as well; the work which thousands wait and crave to do. And by the need and hunger of these multitudes their wage is fixed.

Thus, though a certain wondrous pride sustains them, so that they work on without talking of the future or the past, they always fear. For they know, as well as they who hire them, the worthless value of their services.

This is a knowledge they acquire soon. They know the tied-up bundles of replies which three short lines of solid type produce, the earnest requests for interviews, the stamped envelopes enclosed for a reply, the attempts at self-description, the testimonials, and the efforts at self-praise—all of them written with surpassing care. They know the thought, the doubt, the tearing-up, that go to make the final letter right; and they know the pathetic gamble of the extra stamp. They learn the blind imaginings of waiting days, which dread to leave the house—the waking hope, the morning disappointment, the hourly consolation and doubt, the dragged suspense, and the slowly-growing evening despair. They recollect the pitiful preparatory smartening up, to hide their need, which strangers never really see, the humble waiting at the office counter, the patronage of young clerks, the stare of other applicants, and their own anxious scrutiny of reappearing faces to detect what happened in that unknown private room. Nor do they easily forget the strained composure of the interview, the hopeless wondering of failure, or the awkward, stumbling agitation at success.

So, from their knowledge and imagination grows their fear—the sickening, gripping fear of going under, which clutches suddenly, or lasts for days with a haunting, elusive remembrance of something to be faced.

This lurking, shadowy consciousness of dread is always in the background of their mind. They hear it in the beggar's whining plaint, and give what they can very ill afford; they hear it in the wind and rain at night, and think of the desolation of the streets. They see it, old, grey-haired, and blasphemous, digging crooked fingers in the dustbins on the kerb, or faintly offering matches to the crowd. It stares at them from out the clean-typed page, as they tap out folios at racing speed, called up by some chance word. It dogs them as they tramp from door to door, and climb, continually, high flights of stairs, to ask rude people to subscribe to books, or have their name in a directory, or pay a premium to insure their keys. And from the corners of the streets, at night, it grins and whispers at the younger ones, so that they gulp and hurry, shuddering, home.

Their fear unconsciously for ever drives them on, so that they seem to hurry to escape—at work and as they journey to and fro. And during the moments of enforced repose, in train or omnibus, they read—not papers which remind them of life, and print long columns of requests for work, but story-books of guarded comfortable homes, and love. And in the evening, the lucky ones are they who go to bed at once and sleep—the dead sleep of exhaustion which wipes out; for at night the echo of the city's roar turns to the voices of the crowds who want.

With all the varying burdens of their fear—sickness, and accident, employers' whims, and jealousy, and youthful rivalry—they work on steadily from year to year with a pride which refuses to cry out—aloud. And only in the hunted, tired eyes, the blank, dead stare, the faded, drawn face, which shows the bone, and the shabby non-conformities of dress, do they involuntarily reveal their state.

So they keep on—working, earning, fearing—with-out hope of rescue from their thralldom. They have been forced to enter for a race where there is no winning post, only a finish, which is a very long way off. Because it is a very long way off, they fear.

WILD ST. VALENTINE.

SUN-WORSHIP, an excellent cult when reasonably followed, has suffered a sad decline in the gradual abandonment of the practice of sending valentines. There is no better warranted solar festival than that of St. Valentine, instituted, it is said, by the early Christian Church as a counterpoise to the Pagan spring festival of the Lupercal. We have lost it through the inability of civilised man to appreciate the minor crises in the great annual solar pageant that means so much to us. Possibly we shall some day get back to it through our rapidly accumulating fancy for Nature study.

A shyly held conviction that the wild things, at any rate, still observe St. Valentine's Day leads us annually to the woods or among pleasant hedgerows to observe through the joyous breasts of the birds and other creatures the oncoming of spring. This year, at any rate, we are thoroughly fortunate in a mild, still day. But for a fleecy pillow or two flying in the sky for beauty, there are no clouds to intercept the rays of our sun; there is no biting wind, as sometimes happens, to check the spring feeling with a sharp reminder of winter. There is spring in the air, spring in the sun-glancing waters, and spring in the fermentation of the soil that seems to make itself felt in an elasticity of the turf we walk on.

The woodlands are stirring with the song of birds. There is, of course, the wintry tinkle of the robin. He has been with us as a songster through all the dark days. But beyond him and above him the thrush is practising his full notes, and now dreamily, now with enthusiasm proclaiming his love of the sunshine. The blackbird flutily promises the rich melody we shall have from him in May; the hedge accentor shakes out his rapid, seemingly unfinished song; the wood-pigeon works himself into a passion of coos; and the great tit whistles, "Beat him, beat him," as though proclaiming the victory of the sun over the power of darkness. And what a handsome fellow he is, this impudent singer of victory, with his Gladstone collar thrown into unusual whiteness by the blue-black stock surmounting and dividing his saffron-yellow breast and the other colours of his raiment, well known to us all, but never staled by constant seeing. He has not yet taken his bride apart. The great tits, cole tits, and blue "nuns" are, in fact, all here together, filling the air with the drumming flutter of their wings, gemming the bare trees with their bright bodies, and agitating the fallen leaves as they pick in them for the tiny morsels that keep them alive. But even the indiscriminating eye of a human being can occasionally pick out an obvious couple in the throng.

The hidden forces of earth are responding vigorously to the lengthening days of sunshine. The hellebore has sent up towers of most vivid and tender green, with swollen peony-like buds that seem to invite annihilation by frost. The mullein, whose leaves are sprouting round the tall dry rod of last year's spike, seems far better equipped for rough fortune, being clothed in a thick felt that almost puts our best blankets into the shade. Honeysuckle is in leaf, lesser celandine extends its green daily, and the first colt's foot blossom shines like a full sun from the leafless site of last year's luxuriance. It does not need the evidence of leaves to tell us that all is well with the trees. The beeches are clean and shiny, with a health that only the presence of newly-circulating sap could give. The flowing twigs of the silver birch blush with life; while patches of red willow produce a flood of rosy warmth that makes even the birches cold. The reminder of fallow bids us turn and find that it is covered with thousands of silvery buds that promise at an early date that golden glory that wakes the humble bee and brings forth the hibernated butterfly. Scarcely bigger than a well-sized humble bee seems the feathered morsel in grey-green, black, and gold that we find here searching a blackberry tangle, so regardless of our presence that we can examine it literally at arm's length. He is the only obvious bachelor we have seen—a tiny gold-crest that may have been blown to us from Germany, and certainly will not nest within twenty miles of his present quarters.

The gold-crest was the last person met in the wood. The next sensation is that of being mobbed by a brace of peregrine falcons. Why this is high summer! With a speed exceeding that of swifts, one after another dashes down on this side or on that. Almost as soon as he is gone on the right he is up again far on the left, and coming back with the speed of an express train, to glide off at a tangent to his swoop like an arrow glancing from a tree trunk. When one is not flying at us, the other is, and for three or four minutes we are scarcely for a moment without a mottled breast or dark grey back within easy gunshot. All the time there is a high-pitched "chipping," and so constantly are the flying birds with us that we put it down to them. But at length the author of it reveals itself in a third falcon that had been sitting high up on the quarry face, and now flies off, pursued by the other two. Perhaps two males had been tilting at one another under the eyes of the fair one, and on our approach had exhibited their prowess by giving her an exhibition of man-baiting. At any rate, we may be sure that the trio will shortly be broken into a pair and an unattached falcon or tercel.

In the hedge bank there is rustling and shrill squeaking among the ground ivy. The shrew mice are settling sundry differences that are apt to become acute at this time of year. The ground is seamed with twisting, vein-like swellings—the surface runs of rutting moles. Even those dark-loving animals come as near to the sun as they dare, now that the excitement of love and rivalry begins to attack them. The patient watcher can see these veinings in process of construction, the heaving tunnel prolonging itself at an astonishing rate, and sometimes the fierce little animals breaking out into the light of day or, more often, afternoon dusk.

In the wood again, a red shadow moves among the red leaves. It is a mouse, tired of the dry foods of winter, and looking to see if perchance there is yet a sprig of salad. Not the dormouse, nor yet the vole, but the dainty red-throated wood mouse that a little later can be seen almost any day up in the hawthorn nibbling the buds almost before they are green. The squirrel is out for a sunshine frolic, the full tufts of winter in his ears, but the red coat of summer not so dimmed as the bookman would have it, nor so much as the pelt of the normal winter squirrel should be.

Yes, the world seems to be actively stirring in its sleep as we lie on a heather-clad bank and bask in the early afternoon sun, its vivifying rays piercing the conventional winter clothing, and making the face tingle with its southern message. A robin sings on a spray close by, and openly invites himself to a share of our lunch. When his crumbs have been thrown, however, he only snatches one and disappears, to return shortly bringing another robin with him. When one robin suffers another, and even brings it to the feast, we may be sure that the mellow influence of love has begun.

Contemporaries.

THE ABBÉ LOISY'S FAREWELL.

(From a Roman Catholic Correspondent.)

THE long expected volumes of the Abbé Loisy on the first three Gospels have at length appeared, and with them another little book in red covers, entitled "Plain Reflections on the Decree Lamentabili and the Encyclical Pascendi." It had been rumoured for some months that the Abbé Loisy was at work on a reply to the two Papal documents, while supervising the printing of his two large volumes, and the publication of this reply was awaited with keen curiosity. I am afraid that the learned commentary, full of admirably digested erudition as it is, will rather stand in the way of its lighter twin than otherwise. The fact is that M. Loisy the critic pushes his "historicism" so far in his study of the Gospels that there is no room left for the Catholic divine that he still claims to be. When a Catholic denies every reality to the records of the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection, do what he may afterwards, he must expect to be looked upon as an outsider. Even in most Protestant denominations his explaining away the fundamental dogmas of Christianity would place him at the farthest outposts of theology. The views upheld in "L'Evangile et l'Eglise" concerning the sharp division of history and belief avail little here. One may certainly believe in spite of critical difficulties in the Gospel narratives, not so when one's contention is that those difficulties are insuperable. The theology that then naturally occurs is that of pure theism. It is greatly to be deplored that the Abbé Loisy should have chosen to make his exit by the door of what is practically Unitarianism. He will not be the only loser, and the cause of Liberal Catholicism will suffer as well.

It seems probable that the man who for nearly twenty years was the greatest Biblical scholar that Catholics could follow, is going to leave the stage on which he played so prominent a part. The concluding lines of his last article in the latest and final issue of the magazine which he had brilliantly conducted since 1894, the "Revue d'Histoire et de Littérature Religieuse," sound like a most touching adieu. I cannot refrain from quoting them, not only for the pathos they convey, but as the prettiest bit of hellenistic French that I remember reading for many years.

"Et maintenant, lecteur, je n'ose vous dire: au revoir. Tout m'invite à penser que je dois vous dire adieu. J'ai fait ce que j'ai pu, depuis douze ans, pour vous renseigner sur le mouvement des études bibliques. Je vous quitte avec regret. Vous serez, je n'en doute pas, aussi indulgent pour mon silence, aussi bienveillant pour ma mémoire, que vous l'avez été pour ces chroniques où je vous parlais en toute sincérité, persuadé que vous m'écoutez sans méfiance."

Even though he should never write another line on religious subjects, M. Loisy would leave behind him a contribution to Catholic theology that will never be forgotten. It is no exaggeration to say that his fifteen or twenty volumes embody an effort paralleled only by that of Aquinas to Christianise Aristotelism, and his influence, great as it seems, is only beginning to be felt.

Of the intrinsic value of this mass of work it is evidently too early to speak. M. Loisy himself seems convinced that many of the conclusions at which he has arrived will have to be reconsidered. His purely critical work is probably as good as that of the Germans—not better, not more original—but undoubtedly clearer. Once or twice—for instance, in his book on the Fourth Gospel and his views on the Parables—he committed himself to sweeping theories that have not even withstood a few years' trial. His religious philosophy, as set forth in his shorter works, must also appear, in many of its characteristics, tentative; yet it was certainly in the right direction. The idea at the basis of "L'Evangile et l'Eglise"—viz., the possibility for a normally developing Church to absorb all the modern critical knowledge, no matter how opposed apparently to her tradition and present belief, is sure to prove sound, and has, in fact, already been tested by weaker churches than the Roman community.

The great fault of the Abbé Loisy's written work, that which will retard its beneficent results and perhaps transfer to others the credit of them, is moral rather than intellectual. For many years the critic, harassed, no doubt, both by ill-health and nagging persecutions, has adopted a singular tone, half-way between recklessness and Olympian calmness, which is ascribed by himself and by many to his confidence in saying what he feels to be the truth, but which savours unpleasantly of Calvinistic individualism, and is probably only the blending of German confidence with a French undercurrent of sarcasm. M. Loisy never had any of the delicacy of touch in handling certain subjects which is one of the most attractive features of modern theology in the Church of England; he never would see anybody between the truths he was discovering and himself. The propriety, and even the fairness, of such an attitude can be doubted; it is certainly not in keeping with the Christian temper as commonly understood. It is not right to shake the weak too rudely, even if they are irritating and unintelligent. I don't mean that Loisy's influence was bad. He was right on too many points, and his fearless straightforwardness was at once an example and a protection for the humbler workers behind him. But he staggered many, often without reason, and caused the authorities to look askance at his action, which, with just ordinary caution, might have been carried on unhampered. The old recklessness is more apparent than ever in the "Plain Reflections." In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the Abbé Loisy is right and the Pope's theologians wrong; but instead of being conscious of the fact with a painful feeling that the Church is at stake and must bear the untoward consequences, he points it out with suppressed but deeply-felt pleasure, and in his most heartless style.

From the literary point of view the present book is not equal to its predecessors. We miss the sparkling satire of "Autour d'un Petit Livre," and the depth of "L'Evangile et l'Eglise." The Abbé having been the cause and reason of the Decree Lamentabili—mostly drawn up from his works—and coming in for a good deal of the blame in the Encyclical was certainly entitled to plead pro domo. But the reader gets tired of the ever-recurring Ego, and of the method, which following the decree, sentence after sentence, is dry and uninteresting. All that M. Loisy says against the Pope's fifty or sixty anathemas he had said already when expounding the condemned theories, and the brevity which he finds necessary seems harsh and dictatorial. What he says of the fictitious character of the modernist man of straw held up to ridicule and contempt in the Encyclical is not new either, and had been forcibly expressed by Father Tyrrell, and the Italian Modernists, and even—naturally with more precaution—by Bishop Dadolle, of Dijon. The one thing that is discussed in the "Plain Reflections" with anything like fulness and power is the fallacy of the Papal assumption that Modernism is primarily philosophical and not historical. The Abbé's arguments are irrefutable. The Encyclical is more than right in saying that systems ought to arise from the facts by a natural consequence, and not come before them to throw their light, true or false, upon them. But the Roman authorities should abide by their own principles instead of giving them the lie in the next page. It is all very well to speak of genuine presentment of facts, but one ought to be at liberty to study history and state the results of one's enquiry without fearing any unpleasant consequences. Now Catholic historians and critics are duly informed that they had better not do so. They are not to swerve from the tradition of the Fathers, nor from the theories of the Schoolmen, and they are not even to discuss freely such legends as the miracle of the Santa Casa.

M. Loisy is only wrong in thinking that his old position is untenable, and that the Encyclical shows that the Church is wedded to hostility against science. If he had lived during the last six or seven years in a less absolute seclusion, he would see that the Church has imbibed enough of his old spirit of the days when he was more hopeful to make the success of his methods a certainty. One has only to come in contact with the clergy under thirty in Rome and Northern Italy, in Paris, and in numberless French dioceses, to see that the results of the Modernist campaign are already tangible everywhere. The Encyclical comes ten years too late, when the seminaries are mostly conducted by men who cannot go back to methods they regard as not only superannuated but dangerous, when books written in the judicial spirit of modern history are cheap and numerous, when what was the subject of hot debates among Catholic scholars under Pius IX. and in the first years of Leo XIII. is now a matter of course. All these young men take little interest in the emotion created among the seniors by the Encyclical, even in the resistance of the German universities. A sort of instinct rather than reasoning tells them that the battle of Modernism has already been fought and won.

W. S. T.

Letters from Abroad.

THE REVOLT IN GERMAN RADICALISM.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—There is much unrest in the ranks of the Radicals of Prussia. From everywhere movements are reported which tell of discontent with the leadership of the party, or at least of displeasure with its relations to the political configuration of State and empire.

It cannot well be otherwise. Scarcely ever has a party been more the fool of—I hesitate to write fortune—than the unfortunate political entity called Prussian Radicalism. Enticed by the coaxing rhetoric of Prince Bülow, the Radicals have accepted the part of voluntary rearguard to the Governmental army at the most unpropitious moment. If the imperial finance has for some years been continuously in difficulties, the finances of Prussia were, on the contrary, for many years in the most flourishing condition. In the course of the five years from 1903 to 1907 the net revenue from State enterprises (railways, mines, &c.) alone rose from 495 to 643 millions of marks; the revenue from taxes from 258 to 320 millions of marks. There was always a handsome surplus in the Prussian Exchequer, and money was not wanting for work of recognised utility.

But this is now a thing of the past. With a fiscal policy that pushed prices higher and higher, and new imperial taxes which led the great bulk of the population to lower in several respects their standard of expenditure, we have succeeded in making the surpluses of the Prussian exchequer disappear; whilst increased expenditure for army and navy reduces the finance of the Empire to a worse plight than ever. Thus in State and Empire the order of the day is: "Put money in my purse," and the means are wanting for the most urgent reforms. For example, it is now certain that the promised increase in the salaries of the employees of the Civil Service in accordance with the increase of the necessities of life will have to be put off.

Surely a most ill-chosen moment for a Radical Party to join the retinue of a Government which, as is now quite evident, has neither the will nor the backbone to effect any Liberal reforms. Prince Bülow does not dream of changing the reactionary fiscal policy of the Empire—a policy which to a great extent has contributed to making Germany the country blessed with the greatest number of strikes. Still less is he inclined to democratise the reactionary franchise for the Prussian Diet.

As far as finances are concerned, all sorts of projects are in the air, but of those which find favour with the Government all point to higher taxation on some articles of consumption. Baron von Stengel departs from the Exchequer, but it is only the man and not the system that is to be changed. Germany is by all possible means to be made a dear country. That some luxuries of the masses are not yet as heavily taxed as elsewhere is a state of things not to be tolerated. The nation may now be wealthy enough to bear a higher impost on these luxuries; but the experience of Baron von Stengel's financial measures of 1906 shows how easily such impositions create havoc in the industries concerned. The taxation of railway tickets has led to quite an exodus from the higher railway classes to the lower ones, and what the Empire has won by the tax is not only much less than was expected from it; it is also to a great extent counterbalanced by a comparative decline in the income from the State Railways.

It may incidentally be remarked that the State has in Prussia been quite exceptionally lucky in the purchase of the railways. They were bought at a time of great commercial depression when prices were at their lowest ebb. To-day the nationalisation of any industry would cost much more if carried out by purchase on the open market instead of by expropriation. Prince Bülow is not the man for the latter course, and the influence of the upholders of the sacred rights of property in Prussia is much too strong. The fate of the Expropriation Bill in regard to estates in the Polish provinces of Prussia is a very instructive object lesson in this respect. The Bill has encountered strong opposition in the ranks of the Conservatives, and particularly the grands seigneurs of the Prussian House of Lords—not because they are opposed to a policy of repression, but because they loathe giving an example of expropriation for purposes of public safety, and the Bill will either be greatly modified or, as is now whispered, withdrawn altogether. William II., a ruler of rash impulses, but sometimes very slow and hesitating execution (a kind of Gustave de Guignon in Scribe's comedy), is said to have lost all interest in the Bill.

The influence of the Lords in Prussia is also the most formidable obstacle to sound finance and a tolerable franchise in the leading State of the Empire. In the former respect their attitude in the debate on the new Sugar Convention was characteristic. Being beet producers on a large scale, and owners of, or at least partners in, the big sugar factories of the country, they made their consent to the convention dependent upon the lowering of the sugar tax—not because they are opposed to taxes on commodities of consumption they are, on the contrary, their most praised upholders—but because they are interested in the sale of sugar. And thus they took no account of the financial plight of the Government, and raised the cry, "No remission of the sugar tax, no new sugar convention." It was the Radicals who went to the help of the Government, and suggested a delay in the remission of the tax, at least till the means to make up the loss to the Exchequer could be found. With their aid the Government has obtained this measure of grace. From the standpoint of the Exchequer the Radicals may have been right, but people ask whether it was their duty to jump into the abyss when everything pointed to new taxes on the industry of the nation as the final measure for covering the deficit, and when the country was face to face with the blunt refusal of Prince Bülow to entertain the idea of a thorough reform of the Prussian Franchise.

This refusal has opened the eyes of a good many of the followers of the Radicals who hitherto believed in the wisdom of the pro-bloc policy of their Parliamentary leaders. There is a kind of revolt in preparation amongst the rank and file of that party. The small group of fighters round Herr Th. Barth, until quite recently regarded in their own party as a sect of seditious brawlers, and still denounced as such in some official organs of the party, are now receiving pledges of support from one town after the other. Quite a number of meetings of Radical groups have taken place during the last three weeks, and almost everywhere the declarations of Prince Bülow in regard to the franchise question have been denounced as an insult to the Liberal section of the "bloc." In many places resolutions have been voted urging the party leaders to give Prince Bülow notice.

There is a strong likelihood that this movement is going to continue. In order to get their hands free from any official encumbrance, Dr. Barth and another member of the committee of the Radical Union, Herr von Gerlach, late member for Marburg, and for many years the colleague of Dr. Fr. Naumann in the leadership of the German "Nationalsoziale," have resigned their posts as members of the committee, and, together with others, hold meetings all over the country to advocate a really Radical policy in the ranks of the Radicals—something which for generations has been unknown to most of them. And if one considers the whole state of the interior policy of Prussia and the Empire, one is bound to conclude that the agitation will this time bear fruit.

Who are the bulk of the Radicals in the country? Small traders, representatives of the manufacturing industries, commercial and technological employees, and all sorts of professional people, especially teachers. The great mass of them are sorely damaged by the present fiscal policy. They have not even, as have the wage-earners, the power of resorting to strikes in order to improve their condition. To all the employees, teachers, &c., the public and registered vote, as prescribed in the present electoral law of Prussia, means the most unbearable oppression. Prince Bülow has declared that he is not in the position to hold out any prospect of its abolition. This is indeed a slap in the face for these people, for it means the continuance of their political constraint. Hence their uneasiness in regard to the policy of their Parliamentary leaders.

It would be an exaggeration to speak of an accomplished revolt. We are, all things considered, still only in the beginning. Traditions, personal associations, and other influences keep the present leaders at the helm; nor is it, as far as I can judge, the intention of Dr. Barth and his friends to provoke a new split of their party. They want to push it on, as I have said, to a true Radical policy. And this much has at least been achieved so far that one after the other of the official leaders begins to speak a different language from that used only four weeks ago. Whether they like it or not, whether they look upon Dr. Barth quite as Lord Salisbury once looked upon Mr. Chamberlain when he preached the doctrine of "ransom," they must now profess to be quite as disgusted as he is with Prince Bülow's declarations. The movement in their ranks is too strong to be ignored.

Nor is it confined to the small fry of teachers, clerks, and so on. It is remarkable that just that section of the Radicals which is the most connected with members of the upper middle class, viz., the Radical Union, took a much more advanced and independent attitude than the so-called populist wing. Great, too, is the discontent in the world of the cultured. Perhaps the next week already will show that a large section of the pick of the "intellectuals" is not on the side of Prince Bülow in his resistance to a thorough franchise reform in Prussia. Professor Hans Delbrueck, the teacher of some of the Hohenzollern princes, has already used strong words against the infamy of the public vote. He is not the only member of his circle who rejects it with contempt, nor is he the most Radical of them.—Yours, &c.,

ED. BERNSTEIN.

Berlin, February 9th, 1908.

The Drama.

THE DRAMATIC CRITIC OF THE "TIMES."

THE quarrel between the "personal" and "impersonal" criticism does not rage fiercely among us, because, unlike the French, we are inclined to think all criticism rather small beer. Consequently, the extent to which a critic asserts himself a reporter of personal impressions or claims to be a characterless percipient, interests us little. Besides, it is a question of fine shades, and fine shades the English laity are ever ready to leave to the profession. All criticism must be tinged by the temperament of the writer; and the extent to which any critic has a right to assert that his remarks are "objective," must depend upon the degree to which he has attempted to discount his own peculiar individuality by collating his impressions with those of other people—a process which, if the results are to be fruitful, requires in the critic a considerable knowledge of tradition and an accurate understanding of himself. The division of critics into "personal" and "impersonal," "subjective" and "objective," is then too rigid to be useful; the distinction which enables us to classify them is that some take their own temperaments for granted, and even exploit them with an artistic interest, while others are more interested in guessing what the consensus of experienced opinion would be, and check their personal impressions accordingly. The former are only readable when they possess at once wide sensibilities and strong partialities; the latter, when they hold a clear conception of themselves and can distinguish original voices from echoes in the vague hum of general opinion. Of the second type of critic, Brunetière is perhaps the most perfect example, who thought it uncritical to praise a work of art simply because it delighted or interested him; of the first, Lemaître and Anatole France, who think it priggish and pedantic to praise for any other reason.

As in every other branch of literature, our compromising race fails to show such clear-cut examples; but among our dramatic critics "Max" clearly belongs to the impressionist school, while perhaps the critic of the "Times" keeps the most constant eye upon the traditions of the stage. The publication of the pick of his recent articles gives us an opportunity of elucidating some of the principles by which he delivers judgment.

Most of those who will read his book know already the kind of writing they will find there: logic, wit (now and then cheapened by the professional exigencies, perpetually driving him to nudge the reader's attention), perspicuity, and swiftness of mind, which is the essence of cleverness—these are the most obvious qualities of Mr. Walkley's work. The power of "getting along," which he relishes so much in Mr. Pinero's method of telling a story on the stage, is also a characteristic of his own criticism. With an intellect and an imagination happily in accord, he is untroubled by vague perceptions; nor is he ever driven to the delicate task of disentangling the fibrous roots of an idea from the crannies of the imagination, before transplanting it to the written page. His ideas, on the contrary, are like round, clean pebbles, which he picks up and slings with considerable force straight at the forehead of the public. He is not a contemplative critic; he is not remarkably receptive; he is not a thinker of patient or wide sensibility; but he is a critic of watchful experience and definite opinions, and his readers are never vexed by the spectacle of a writer wrestling with a cloudy conception he cannot embrace.

Why, the reader will wonder, did Mr. Walkley call his collection of articles "Drama and Life"? Titles are usually rough labels; but this one is positively incongruous with the spirit of his criticism. It might have been an appropriate title for a volume of essays, say, by G. B. S. or Mr. Archer, who test the merit of drama by a constant reference to reality, and the value of a dramatic idea by its applicability to life; but such tests, in Mr. Walkley's method of criticism, are clearly second to the consideration whether or not the idea of a play is dramatic, i.e., suited to the traditions of the stage, or dramatically presented—that is to say, expressed by means of emotion and not directly through conversations or harangues. He shows himself a severe critic of Bernard Shaw for this reason. One of the cleverest pieces of criticism in the whole book is devoted to showing that the "idea-plot" of "Man and Super-Man" is not identical with "action-plot"; that the dramatist has not embodied his idea in a story, but only explained it by using his characters as mouth-pieces. Mr. Walkley starts from the proposition that "in the playhouse a dramatist's ideas are postulates not to be called in question." He evidently is not much interested in ideas for their own sakes, an observation of which the reader will find constant confirmation throughout these pages. And starting from this point of view he analyses "Man and Super-Man" as follows: "(a) Fundamental idea: the irresistible power of woman over man in carrying out the aim of nature to make her a mother. (b) Development: partly in Ann's actions, mainly in Tanner's talk. And there, in that disproportion, at once you touch a dramatic weakness of the play. The properly dramatic development would have thrown all the onus on Ann, and would have kept Tanner's mouth shut. . . . (c) Corollary of the fundamental idea: if motherhood is nature's aim, then marriage is a detail; our morality which brands motherhood minus a wedding-ring is false. Hence the false scent about Octavius's sister's baby. (d) Antithetical question suggested by the fundamental idea: is there not a male counterpart to the 'mother-woman'? Mr. Shaw hunts about. Yes, no, yes—it must be, the 'artist-man.' Hence the alleged poetic vocation of Octavius, in order that Tanner may have a cue for haranguing him about the 'artist-man' and the 'mother-woman.'" In reply it may be said that, just as Ann embodies in action the fundamental idea naturally and forcibly enough, a point which the critic is prepared to yield, so Tanner, too, by his flight and general behaviour, reflects in action this idea in addition to expounding it in talk; secondly, that there is no need whatever for Octavius to be more than an "alleged" or extremely minor poet; and lastly, that the story, or "action-plot," has a credible coherence of its own, and is undeniably an example of the generalisation which Tanner himself expounds. The objection of the critic, then, comes down to an objection to the presence on the stage of a character who is so acutely conscious of what is going forward that he can explain the point to the audience, an objection which might be levelled against Relling in "The Wild Duck," which is a play of model construction, or, for the matter of that, against Hamlet's discourses upon his own infirmity of purpose. The truth is that almost every play, once the central idea has been seized, can be reconstructed downwards by the method Mr. Walkley has used here, and its story made to look as though it had been "cooked." The undoubted drawback to explanatory dialogue or speechifying from the stage, is that quick-witted people prefer to work out their own conclusions, and are then robbed of the delight of discovering more and more point in the play as it goes on. Mr. Barrie in this book meets with more undiluted eulogy than any other playwright; but in spite of the absence in his work of the characteristic to which Mr. Walkley objects so strongly in the plays of Bernard Shaw, we are a little surprised to find "The Admirable Crichton" described as "donnant furieusement à penser."

In criticising Shakespearean critics who start with the assumption that the characters are historic beings, Mr. Walkley is particularly happy. If the events in the plays really happened (and this is the spirit in which many critics discuss them), then no extremity of ingenuity in accounting for them psychologically were beside the point; but if the critics remembered that Shakespeare was a playwright, they would perceive that many of the incidents which puzzle them were introduced (often in violation of natural probability) for dramatic effect, and there would be no more straining to reconcile, for instance, "Polonius's foolishness with his sage advice."

It is impossible to summarise the impression made by a collection of criticisms ranging over nearly forty plays; but the critical principles which most clearly disengage themselves from the collected work of our foremost dramatic critic are: (1) That the art of the dramatist is primarily the art of telling a story well.

(2) "That in the theatre the most trivial detail that we see outweighs the most important philosophy that we deduce."

(3) That the dramatist's ideas must be taken for granted, and that though these may be faulty the critic's business is with the way they have been used.

(4) That no play should be a very painful experience.

(5) That the dramatist must persuade you that what you are experiencing has happened, or might happen.

The last principle is the point at which "Drama" and "Life" touch each other in his method of criticism: Mr. Walkley is not a critic to be patient of silliness or inflated sentiment. For the rest, the reader will infer behind these critical principles a certain sceptical disdain for the work of philosophic artists, and a temperamental impatience of experimental or didactic realism, likely to make the critic additionally severe upon the faults to which such plays are liable.

D.

Letters to the Editor.

IS THE CHURCH THE CLERICAL PARTY?

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the correspondence evoked by the letter of the Vicar of Ashburton, "the Church" stands, as usual in such cases, for the Clerical Party. A vast number of those who, on any definition (even the commonest) are Churchmen, are Liberals; and not a few of the clergy, like myself, have spent a considerable part of their lives in trying to combat the inroads of clericalism. Yet, even with the best writers, "Church" almost always stands for clergy, and even for the narrower clique of the clergy by whom they not too often allow themselves to be led. This, it appears to me, is, in these discussions, the πρώτον ψεύδος, the source of endless error, of false judgment and wrong action.

But, taking Church to mean the Clerical Party, it must be admitted that the warning given by the Vicar of Ashburton is just, and is borne out by our recent history. The great reforms of 1832-4 had hardly got into swing when such alarm was caused by the Appropriation Clause that the Liberal Ministry was broken up, and the Conservatives came into power; the Reform Party, though it returned, was smitten with impotence; and the just measure which dealt with the Irish Church system was delayed for thirty years. In 1885 the attempt to embody the plan of the Liberation Society in the Radical programme turned the great majority which should have ensued on the emancipation of the labourers into one so weak that Mr. Gladstone's attempt at Home Rule was hopeless. In 1895 the threat of disestablishment in Wales was one of the chief causes of the overwhelming defeat of the Liberals.

In the light of these facts I venture to ask whether it may not be worth while to consider the policy of a drastic reform of the National Church system, instead of attempting its abolition. The lay power over Church affairs, if rightly used, should be the security that English justice and common sense should rule in the most serious parts of the national life; whereas the separatist policy, which could only be enforced, if at all, by a prolonged and disintegrating struggle, would be the building up by the nation itself of a vast clericalist sect.—Yours, &c.,

W. H. FREMANTLE.

The Deanery, Ripon,
February 12th, 1908.

THE SPIRIT OF EXPENDITURE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,

"Together with the called-for increase of expenditure there grows up what may be termed a spirit of expenditure: a desire, a tendency prevailing in the country which insensibly and unconsciously, perhaps, but, really, affects the spirit of the people, the spirit of Parliament, the spirit of the Public Departments, and, perhaps, even the spirit of those whose duty it is to submit the Estimates to Parliament, and who are most specially and directly responsible for the disbursements of the State."—Mr. Gladstone, Financial Statement, 1863.

That spirit of expenditure, abnormal, insatiable, grows and fattens in time of war. Its unhealthy appetite remains and craves for more long after the cessation of active hostilities. To arrest its progress, to kill the unnatural craving altogether, requires the strenuous and devoted self-denial of a strong Minister of Finance. Economy is never popular save in the abstract.

To bring back the expenditure of the country to a peace basis almost baffled the genius and statesmanship of Mr. Gladstone. It was a great struggle, but he conquered in the end.

The expenditure for the year 1859 was not materially affected by war charges, but the ordinary expenditure continued to increase.

In the year 1860-1 the expenditure again rose, showing an increase in two years of £8,178,000. But this was not the real increase. Owing to the falling in of the long annuities, amounting to over two millions a year, a saving to that amount had been effected on the estimates of expenditure. The real increase, therefore, in the ordinary expenditure in the two years amounted to ten and a half millions.

The aftermath of war. This was the situation that Mr. Gladstone, as Chancellor of the Exchequer, had to face. It was no easy matter. He declared that in those days it was more difficult to save a shilling than to spend a million. Mr. Gladstone set himself to the task of retrenchment, and by the year 1863 he had the satisfaction of making the expenditure approximate more nearly to a peace basis.

The expenditure for 1862-3 amounted to £69,300,000, as compared with an expenditure of £72,800,000 in 1860-1—a reduction of four and a half millions in two years. A gradual reduction was annually effected till the year 1865-6, when the expenditure was reduced to £65,200,000. This showed a reduction of expenditure of seven and a half millions compared with 1860-1.

In June, 1862, Mr. Stansfeld had raised the question of economy in national expenditure. His motion was defeated by 367 to 65, as against the amendment of Lord Palmerston, First Lord of the Treasury, which ultimately became the unanimous finding of the House. Its terms are interesting, having regard to the present situation.

"That this House, deeply impressed with the necessity of economy in every department of the State, is at the same time mindful of its obligations to provide for the security of the country at home and the protection of its interests abroad, and observes with satisfaction the decrease which has already been effected in the National Expenditure, and trusts that such further diminution may be made therein as the future state of things may warrant."

A true Palmerstonian resolution, but Mr. Gladstone was Chancellor of the Exchequer. So carefully was expenditure supervised during his period of office at the Exchequer and afterwards as first Minister of the Crown; so consuming was his passion for economy in national expenditure that for the year 1873, when Mr. Lowe was Chancellor of the Exchequer, the national expenditure only amounted to £70,714,000, or actually two millions less than the expenditure for the year 1861. It is well to recall that great financial achievement.

Once more the nation is face to face with a situation of extreme gravity, demanding the exercise of the most rigid economy. The spirit of expenditure has been running riot during a period of war, waste, and unparalleled extravagance.

If taxation is to be reduced, or an additional ten millions are to be found to start a comprehensive if not complete scheme of Old Age Pensions, the spirit of Gladstonian finance must prevail.

A fair start has been made, more considerable than is generally realised. For the year 1905 the national expenditure, including loan works expenditure, but excluding local taxation grants, amounted to £150,025,500. In 1907 it stood at £145,390,000, showing a reduction of £4,635,500. This has been accomplished after meeting the following additional charges:—

Increased contribution to National Debt	£1,500,000
Increase in Civil Services:
Expenditure, including Education ...	1,738,000
Increase in Post Office expenditure...	1,000,000
Cunard Agreement ...	1,682,000
	<hr/>
	£5,920,000

The real reduction, therefore, amounts to over ten millions sterling.

How has this been attained? By reductions in naval and military expenditure. Taking again the year 1905, the total naval and military expenditure on a peace basis reached the huge total of £73,200,000. The expenditure for 1907 amounted to £62,110,000, showing a reduction in naval and military expenditure of eleven millions sterling. It is but fair to say that a part of that reduction was due to the saving consequent on the redistribution of the fleet, carried out by the late Government.

But the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimates that as compared with 1906, there will on March 31st of this year be a reduction of nine millions on naval and military expenditure under Liberal administration. This is a much larger reduction than even Mr. Gladstone was able to make, and should stand to the credit of the Government for righteousness in the day of political judgment.

If the reduction is large, the margin for possible economies is still greater. Excluding loan expenditure, the expenditure on the Army and Navy amounted in 1899 to 44½ millions. In 1905 it had risen to 66½ millions—an increase of twenty-two millions in six years. For the current year the estimate is £59,200,400, after deducting for comparison a million of loan expenditure carried on the Estimates of the year. That still shows an increase over 1899 of fourteen millions on current expenditure. Is this scale of expenditure necessary? Is even the reduced expenditure of 1907 justified by our present requirements? Are further reductions possible, having regard to national safety? These are the questions which Ministers in charge of the fighting services will be called upon to answer.

The Army Estimates are still open to effective diminution. It is true the ultimate cost of the new Territorial Army is likely to exceed the cost of the present Volunteer and Yeomanry services by nearly a million and a-half annually. This very increase ought to be coincident with greater economy in the gross expenditure of the Army, to an extent unforeseen by military economists. The Army Estimates will next year be relieved of a charge of £500,000, on the completion of the supply of quick-firing guns for the Artillery. The great struggle will come on naval expenditure.

It is understood that no reductions have been made on the estimates in consequence of the recent agitation. The Minister in charge of Navy Estimates will have his work cut out for him if this is so. What the Navy Estimates are likely to be is not difficult to forecast. The Secretary to the Admiralty, when presenting the Estimates for 1907-8, took a long view of future expenditure. The explanatory statement of the First Lord of the Admiralty showed the expenditure for the year at £30,442,400, a reduction of £1,427,000 on the Estimates for 1906-7. Consequent, however, on the new policy of stopping all borrowing for new works, a sum amounting to nearly a million was added to the Estimates for the year instead of being charged as formerly to Loan Account.

The Estimate as finally adjusted therefore stood at £31,419,500, as compared with £31,869,500 for the previous year, showing a net reduction of £450,000. The Estimates for 1908-9 will bear a charge for loan expenditure and an increased charge for annuities. The amount to be spent out of money already provided by loan will be £438,000, as against £1,478,000 for the present year, a saving of over a million in loan expenditure.

It is unlikely that any considerable amount will be borne on the Estimates this year for Rosyth Naval Base.

The Navy Estimates may therefore show a total expenditure under both heads amounting to thirty-one millions.

The expenditure for 1898-9, the year before the war, including loan works charges, amounted to £25,148,000. The coming Estimates may therefore show an increase of six millions over the expenditure of 1899, and a reduction of nine millions compared with 1905, when the total expenditure on the Navy amounted to £40,283,000.

The combined expenditure on naval and military services may fairly be estimated for the coming year at fifty-nine millions. The Government is pledged to economy. It is, we believe, seriously desirous of effecting it. The whole question of economy in national expenditure is to be brought before the House of Commons.

Will a platonic resolution of the Palmerstonian type meet the situation?—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE MCCRAE.

House of Commons.

February 12th, 1908.

"THE CHURCH AND THE LIBERAL PARTY."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent says: "The Church has chosen her side, and is backing it for all she knows." This is in a sense true, but whose fault is it that Churchmen are compelled to fight against the Liberal Party? There are many Churchmen who would welcome a Liberal treatment of present-day questions. With Conservative administration they have been disgusted. But when the first aim of the Government is to cripple the Church and introduce a measure which disregards every principle of Liberalism, Churchmen cannot be blamed for offering strenuous resistance. I voice the views of many Liberal Churchmen when I say that we shall use the Tory Party for the time being, if it will only help us to repel this attack, which is engineered by the Nonconformist wing of the Liberal Party. If the Government wish to force all Churchmen into the Tory ranks, they are going the right way.—Yours, &c.,

CHESHIRE INCUMBENT.

"DEAR OLD CHARLIE" AND THE CENSOR.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It is perhaps easier to defend Mr. Redford for not licensing "Waste" than it is to understand why "Waste" should not have been licensed. Were G. B. S. in Mr. Redford's shoes, probably "Dear Old Charlie" never would see the footlights! And what then? London managers would be in an uproar! They would so inflame the public mind with a sense of its loss that the Lord Chamberlain would be expected to tell his new Reader of Plays that he had mistaken his vocation, and must look out for another one. It may be argued, then, that Mr. Redford must take into consideration the question of morals more or less from the public's point of view, which means that of the London managers, and not from his own inclinations. That is to say, the official conscience will, if it is prudent, try to reflect the wishes of the public. In other words, the decision to license "Waste" rests with the London managers. But since the love of fair play is a British characteristic, it ought not to be difficult to rouse public opinion to recognise that either the Censor should give up passing plays like "Dear Old Charlie," or it should allow the dramatists the right to reply. At present authority is all on one side. This is unjust.—Yours, &c.,

WM. POEL.

February 11th, 1908.

THE RUSH FOR SMALL HOLDINGS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I see that in your issue of the 8th inst. the Secretary of the County Councils Association writes that the Small Holdings Act is being administered quite fairly by the County Councils. I fear that the Secretary is not fully informed on this important matter. You will see from the cutting I enclose (from the "Yorkshire Gazette") that the Chairman of the Executive Committee to which the question of Small Holdings in the North Riding of Yorkshire has been committed, is doing his best to prejudice the Act in the eyes of the Council and the public. In order that you may know that the comments of the "Yorkshire Gazette" are impartial, I also enclose a report of Mr. Lascelles' speech taken from the local Conservative journal, "The Yorkshire Herald."—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST E. TAYLOR.

Bannisdale, Malton,
February 10th, 1908.

[Our correspondent encloses a cutting from the "Yorkshire Gazette," which states that Mr. Lascelles "is apparently somewhat chagrined that the Small Holdings Act is the law of the land," and that he "made a distinctly hostile speech against the new Act of Parliament."—ED., THE NATION.]

To the Editor of THE NATION

SIR,—I have just read Mr. Frome Wilkinson's letter in your last issue. He attacks me personally, only, I feel sure, because he is under a misconception of my opinions; but it seems not reasonable to attack the Land Club scheme just because my name has become quite unduly associated with it, and I have described it in a book. I hope Liberals will not be prejudiced against it. I feel confident it is a bonâ-fide democratic movement, and should have every encouragement, for it is moderate and practical, and also gives hope to the people.

To turn to the main point of my original letter, the position appears to me this: We have now a partially educated country democracy, who are seriously concerned in the decadence of country life, and anxious to revive it. An Act like our new land law gives them first hope, and then despair; for, though sound in principle, it is undoubtedly complicatory and dilatory.

I myself know well the complications and difficulties of modern legislation, and the question does not affect my mind in this way, but it takes heart out of many people who might support the Liberal Party, and they look then to a policy of Protection for a remedy. These undercurrents of thought do not always come before the notice of Liberal candidates or members, but they must not be ignored, for they make or unmake parties and nations.—Yours, &c.,

MONTAGUE FORDHAM.

Paines Hill, Limpsfield,
February 12th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The difference between Mr. G. M. Harris, the Secretary of the County Councils Association, and myself probably arises from the difference of our points of view. No one recognises more readily than I do the "correctness," as diplomatists say, of the attitude of the County Councils Association, and of the officials of the County Councils throughout the country towards the Small Holdings and Allotments Act. I do not doubt that the intention is widely spread, now that the creation of small holdings is required by Act of Parliament, that information of the fact shall be given, and forms of application for land provided. In some, let us hope in many counties, the intention doubtless exists that the land asked for shall be provided also.

Mr. Harris, in his letter to you, supplies good reasons for my warning that in many counties no real interest or intention exists to provide land for the people asking for it. He states that "many members of County Councils in every part of the country expressed strong objections to the Bill during its passage through Parliament," and what, I venture to ask, is there to show that these objections have ceased to exist? The proof of the pudding lies in the eating. What are the facts? Is it not true that during fifteen years the whole of the County Councils of England and Wales succeeded in providing under eight hundred acres of land under the terms of purchase of the Small Holdings Act of 1892?

The Liberal Chairman of one County Council Small Holdings Committee told me his Committee had not met for several years, and many Councils appointed no Committee at all. The men remain the same; what is there to show that their opinions do not remain the same? Let us look the facts in the face. The land laws of England have been driving the boldest and ablest people away from the villages for over two hundred years. Are the descendants of the people who have stayed behind likely to be able by themselves to assert their independence? What does his position appear to a villager who, when he asks for land, knows that his application will come under the eyes of men who may give him in return a week's notice to give up both his work and his home? The Association of which I am chairman gets behind the fair show which may appear on the surface of official explanations of the Act by County Councils and their application forms for land. I should like your readers to see the hundreds of letters we are receiving from people all over the country on this subject. To-day the Clerk of a Parish Council in Yorkshire writes about the application form for land of his County Council: "The tenour of the circular seems to me to be most forbidding, and does not even mention that Associations may apply for small holdings." The Chairman of the Lancashire County Council is reported as saying with reference to applications for land from cockle catchers: "He did not think they were likely to do much at small holdings. It was no use taking a man back to the land who had never been there." A county magistrate writes me from Yorkshire: "The Act was talked about at a meeting of our magistrates the other day. They were very fierce against it."

I spoke last night in a small town where most of the land around is owned by three persons, all strong Conservatives, and none in favour of small holdings. It appeared to be regarded as a heroic act for any man to have the temerity to ask the County Council to provide any of the inhabitants with small holdings, especially in view of the fact that a County Councillor was one of the largest of the landowners in question, and any application would, of course, be referred to him.

All's well that ends well, and I heartily welcome any indication, of which I have received numerous ones myself, that the classes now owning and occupying the land of England are willing to comply with the requirements of the law; and I believe it is the wisest policy to assume that this is their intention. Nevertheless, the Liberal Party and Parliament are bound by every motive of justice and self-interest, having provided a law, to see that no stone is left unturned in the way of backing up, instructing, and supporting those humble, and often timid, people, who, without aid, will not dare to ask for land, or, having asked, need every encouragement and support in seeing that their request is fairly met and acceded to. The cultivable area of England and Wales exceeds twenty-four million acres. Of this let us hope the villagers may be able to hire under the new Act, say, 1 per cent., or 240,000 acres—never forgetting that Parliament deprived their ancestors of eight million acres of common lands.

Yours, &c.,

FREDERIC IMPEY,

Chairman of the Allotments and Small Holdings Association.

Northfield, Worcestershire,

February 10th, 1908.

THE GOVERNMENT AND IRISH LIBERALS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As Ireland has always been a subject of intense interest to Liberals, it may not be amiss for an Irish Liberal to set before your readers his impressions of the general results of Liberal administration since the last election transferred the responsibility of Government from the Unionists to our own party.

To those of your readers who are not familiar with Irish matters, it is necessary to state as an axiom that a Liberal Administration in Ireland is always at a disadvantage as compared with its Tory rival, and to explain why this should be so. The causes of this inherent difficulty for the Liberal Administration are two. First, there is really no Liberal Party in Ireland, and, secondly, a Liberal Government is by the terms of its existence precluded from adopting those methods of government which come almost naturally, one might say, to the Tory Party.

To assert that there is practically no Liberal Party in Ireland may sound rather startling to many well-meaning English Liberals, who, seeing the Irish Party in Parliament voting with them on nearly every question save education, are led to believe that the mass of Irish sympathy is therefore with their party. Nevertheless, the assertion I make is in strict accordance with the facts. The majority of the Irish people are Nationalists and land reformers; their adhesion to the Liberal Party is of the most temporary character, but the great mass of the people on all the questions that interest English Liberals hold views utterly at variance with those of our party.

The absence of a Liberal Party in Ireland deprives a Liberal Administration of that sympathy and support which it should obtain from the mass of the people, from whom under a democratic system of Government it is supposed to derive its power.

To put the matter in a nutshell, the Liberal Administration has no active backing in the country. Political exigencies may for a moment render the manifestations of Nationalist hostility unadvisable, but when difficulties arise, as they must occasionally, there is no party organisation in Ireland to support and defend the administration.

On the other hand, the Tory Party can absolutely rely on the unwavering allegiance and active assistance of a well-organised party, with its newspapers, political clubs, and all the other agents of party propagandism.

As this is very obvious to us here, it ought to be equally obvious to the capable men at the head of affairs in Ireland, and one would therefore expect that these same men would be alert and anxious to do all they could to encourage the growth of an Irish Liberal Party. But unfortunately none of the official chiefs, save Mr. T. W. Russell, has ever thought of doing anything apparently to encourage the development of a Liberal Party in Ireland.

Amongst the younger Irishmen, especially in Dublin and the larger provincial towns, there is growing up a class which is seeking to break away from the traditions of the past, which reads modern literature, not merely English but also Continental, which follows the Liberal movements in Hungary, Russia, and Germany with intense interest, and tends more and more to be attracted to the Radical section of the Liberal Party.

This small but actively intelligent body of Irishmen could, I believe, by proper treatment be converted into helpful allies of our party, but no effort whatever is being made by official Liberalism to attract them to our side and to build up an Irish Liberal Party.

None of our official chiefs, save Mr. T. W. Russell, has condescended to address a meeting in Dublin. No attempt has been made to found any political club of a Liberal tendency, and lastly, no effort has been made by the judicious use of the patronage at its disposal to attract to its support the younger and more active members of the various professions, notably the Bar, that nursery of politicians, in Ireland.

On the contrary, such patronage as it has had at its disposal has been expended in a futile effort to buy off its political opponents by appointing well-recommended Tories and Unionists to offices of emolument throughout the country.

The Resident Magistracy, the Land Commission, the Local Government Service, the Inland Revenue, the Registry of Deeds, and the Board of Works, &c., have all been used, or abused, according as one looks at it, in this way.

Appointments carrying comfortable salaries ranging from £500 a year paid to Local Government Board inspectors, to £12,000 a year or more to a solicitor to the Inland Revenue, have been given to men who are the open and avowed opponents of the present Administration.

It is not necessary to give actual chapter and verse in support of these assertions, but it would be very easy to do so, and I may add that they are the subject of universal comment amongst both potential as well as actual supporters of the Liberal Party in Ireland.

The crowning blunder of the Administration has been recently the subject matter of a judicial inquiry, so it is not necessary to dwell upon it, but how any Administration could have passed over the many eligible, hard-working, daily practising Roman Catholic barristers of both the Liberal and Nationalist persuasion to select the present incumbent for the office to which he was recently appointed is simply incapable of comprehension by the ordinary man in the street.

You will gather therefore from this rough sketch that the prospects of the Liberal Party in Ireland are not encouraging just now, and they appear even less so when one remembers that Tariff Reform is rapidly coming to the front, and that nine out of every ten Irishmen are Protectionists at heart.

If an English party is ever returned to power on a Tariff Reform issue, even the claims of Home Rule will be ruthlessly thrust aside, and the mass of the people of every class and creed will force their representatives to vote for protection against foreign competition.

How very discouraging therefore is all this for everyone in Ireland who, like the present writer, can call himself

Yours, &c.,

February 11th, 1908.

AN IRISH LIBERAL.

"LUCRETIUS; EPICUREAN AND POET."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you allow me to reply briefly to my kind and appreciative reviewer of February 1st?

Acute and often profitable as his criticism is, it is rather a criticism of a book conceived in the reviewer's mind than of the one in his hand. He says, "this work is clearly intended as a scientific study." These words give a greatly mistaken impression of the book, which in fact covers a very wide field, namely, Epicurean science, psychology, ethics, and theology. Lucretius's atomic theory occupies 65 pp. out of 448 pp. The chapters on "The Birth of the World" and the parallel furnished by modern Evolution another 58 pp. (Let me say in passing that Lucretius's saying that "Nature is seen to do all things herself and entirely of her own accord without the Gods," has never been more vividly and suggestively illustrated than by the Tyndall-Martineau controversy which, my critic notwithstanding, is by no means "out of date by now." It will long outlast Haeckel.)

But the main interest of the book lies still more in its dealing with Epicurean ethics and theology. I have written from the standpoint of the Humanist, never forgetting that Epicureanism was not merely a system but a rule by which men sought to guide their lives, and in some sense a religion. In this attempt to estimate Epicureanism from a severely practical standpoint, it would be one-sided indeed

SMITH, ELDER & CO.'S NEW & FORTHCOMING WORKS

RE-ISSUE OF
THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY

AT ONE-THIRD OF THE ORIGINAL PRICE, AND TO OCCUPY ABOUT ONE-THIRD OF THE SHELF SPACE REQUIRED BY THE ORIGINAL WORK.

Messrs. SMITH, ELDER & CO. have pleasure in announcing the publication,
IN TWENTY-TWO VOLUMES,
Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each; or in half-morocco, marbled edges, 21s. net each,
OF

THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Edited by LESLIE STEPHEN and SIDNEY LEE.

The Volumes will be identical with the Original Edition in type and size of page. Errors have, as far as possible, been corrected, and some of the Bibliographies have been revised, but otherwise the text remains unaltered.

VOLUME I.—(ABBADIE—BEADON.)—Including a Statistical Account of the Work and a New Postscript, Will be published on MARCH 10, and a Volume will be published each succeeding month until the completion of the Edition in DECEMBER, 1909.

PROSPECTUS AND SPECIMEN PAGES POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

ENGLISH SOCIALISM OF TO-DAY :

Its Teaching and its Aims Examined.

By the Right Hon. H. O. ARNOLD-FORSTER, M.P., 2s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION. READY TUESDAY NEXT.

The World says:—"For unthinking persons who have been glamourised by the Socialist mirage, we could wish for no better 'eye-opener' than this plain, matter-of-fact and crushing exposure of the mischievous fallacies and predatory aims of present-day Socialism."

MY ALPINE JUBILEE, 1851-1907.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Mr. Harrison has always about him something of an infectious enthusiasm. Alike to those who know Switzerland and to those who do not we would cordially commend this very pleasant little volume."

LORD WANTAGE, V.C., K.C.B.: A Memoir.

By his WIFE. With 8 Portraits in Photogravure. Large 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

SECOND EDITION. READY IMMEDIATELY.

The Daily News says:—"A record of a busy and useful career. Lady Wantage deserves hearty congratulations for the skill with which she has put together this interesting memoir of her husband."

THE SOCIAL FETICH.

By Lady GROVE. With a Portrait. Demy 8vo., 5s. net.

SECOND EDITION, WITH A NEW PREFACE. NOW READY.

The Nation says:—"Full of vivacity and pleasant illustration, and makes a very readable volume."

BRITISH SOCIALISM :

An Examination of its Doctrines, Policy, Aims, and Practical Purposes.

By J. ELLIS BARKER, Author of "Modern Germany," "The Rise and Decline of the Netherlands," &c. Small demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net..

[February 24.]

IDLEHURST :

A Journal kept in the Country.

By JOHN HALSHAM, Author of "Lonewood Corner," &c.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Crown 8vo., 5s. net. February 18.

The Saturday Review, noticing the FIRST EDITION, said:—"We know 'Idlehurst' very well, and we know sundry other bits of John Halsham's work. 'Idlehurst' is one of the most beautiful Idylls in English."

NEW SIX SHILLING NOVELS.

THE ALIEN SISTERS.

By Mrs. PERCY DEARMER, Author of "The Difficult Way," "The Orangery: a Comedy of Tears," &c. [March 3.]

CROSSRIGGS.

By MARY and JANE FINDLATER, Authors of "Tales that are Told," &c. [Shortly.]

DAN RIACH : SOCIALIST.

By the Author of "Miss Molly," "Ingleheim," "The Great Reconciler," &c. [Shortly.]

THE FLEMINGS.

By JESSIE and CHARLES FIELDING MARSH. [In the press.]

THE CRADLE OF THE DEEP.

By Sir FREDERICK TREVES, G.C.V.O., C.B., LL.D., F.R.C.S., Author of "Tale of a Field Hospital," "The Other Side of the Lantern," &c. With a Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Half-Tone Illustrations. Small royal 8vo., 12s. net. [In the press.]

MEMOIR OF FIELD-MARSHAL
SIR HENRY WYLIE NORMAN,

G.C.B., G.C.M.G. C.I.E

By Sir WILLIAM LEE-WARNER, K.C.S.I., Author of "The Protected Princes of India," "Life of the Marquis of Dalhousie, K.T.," &c. With Portraits and Maps. Demy 8vo., 14s. net. [In the press.]

MEMORIES OF MEN AND BOOKS.

By Rev. Prof. ALFRED JOHN CHURCH, M.A. Author of "Stories from Homer," &c., "Two Thousand Years Ago," "Fall of Carthage," &c. Small demy 8vo., 8s. 6d. net. [In preparation.]

THE VICTORIAN CHANCELLORS.

VOLUME II. By J. B. ATLAY, Author of "Sir Henry Wentworth Acland, Bart, K.C.B., F.R.S., a Memoir," &c. With Portrait Illustrations. Demy 8vo., 14s. net.

* * This Volume completes the Work.

[In preparation.]

NEW VOLUME OF THE "WATERLOO LIBRARY."
ADAM GRIGSON.

By Mrs. HENRY DE LA PASTURE, Author of "Deborah of Tods," "Peter's Mother," &c. NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. [Immediately.]

HARDY ORNAMENTAL FLOWERING TREES AND SHRUBS.

By A. D. WEBSTER, Author of "Practical Forestry," "The Forester's Diary," &c. THIRD AND REVISED EDITION. 8s. 6d. net. [In March.]

ANIMAL LIFE.

By F. W. GAMBLE, D.Sc., F.R.S., Lecturer in Zoology, Victoria University, Manchester; Editor of "Marshall and Hurst's Junior Course of Practical Zoology." With a Coloured Frontispiece and numerous Line and Half-Tone Illustrations. Crown 8vo., 6s. net. [In preparation.]

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF ROBERT BROWNING.

By Mrs. SUTHERLAND ORR. NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Edited, with a Preface and an Appendix on the Portraits, by FREDERIC G. KENYON, late Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford. With 2 Portraits. Crown 8vo., 7s. 6d. net. [Shortly.]

A LIFE OF WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

By SIDNEY LEE. Profusely illustrated with Photogravures, Facsimiles, Topographical Views, &c. NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION. Medium 8vo., 10s. 6d. net. [Shortly.]

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

to ignore Epicurus's attitude to "theistic" belief in its bearing on ideals of conduct.

Lucretius is not first and foremost a man of science. He craved passionately to free men from the bondage of superstition, and he found in the atomic theory a weapon to his hand. I have not attempted a scientific history of the atomic theory from its much-disputed origin in the speculations of the Ionic philosophers down to its latest development in investigations regarding "electrons" or "ions," where theory has as yet far outrun experiment. About two-thirds of the book deals with the less academic but more human interest of Lucretius's creed, ethically considered, along with an account of his times and what is known of his life. From such a standpoint Lucretius the Poet cannot fail to come to the front.

The subject of electrons might have been treated more fully. But if my critic will re-read Professor Japp's very able contribution to the book (pp. 105-6), dealing with the bearing of radium on the atomic theory, he will find that some men can express much in small space. Professor Japp says: "To chemists and physicists the essence of the atomic theory does not consist in the unchangeableness of the atoms, but in the fact that the phenomena dealt with by chemistry and physics can only be explained satisfactorily on the assumption that matter consists of discrete particles—that it is discontinuous."

It is in Lucretius's vigorous grasp of this truth and of the consequent doctrine of Law in nature that the splendid prescience of ancient science shines forth. The true modern parallel to Lucretius's atomic theory does not lie in the electrons but in the doctrine of atoms which has been evolved during the nineteenth century. That conception is one which chemistry, I imagine, will never be able to dispense with as a working hypothesis, even though the unchangeableness of the atom be a dogma at present demonstrably false.

Will the processes of atomic disintegration into electrons ever be brought so under control that we shall be able to utilise them as we do our ordinary methods of chemical analysis? Some chemists would say that the former process differs from the latter not in degree merely but in kind.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN MASSON.

Edinburgh, February 8th, 1908.

"THE GERMAN CODES."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I am much obliged to your contributor for his kindly and complimentary notice of my book on the German Civil War. I am not disposed to question his flattering estimate of the utility value of the work in question, but his—or your printer's—statement as to the "exchange value" may possibly frighten off a reader who might otherwise be inclined to buy the book. The price is 12s. 6d. net.—Yours, &c.,

ERNEST SCHUSTER.

14, Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, W.C.,
February 10th, 1908.

GERMANY AND THE POWERS,

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—If it is to be gathered from the great efforts which Germany is making to increase her navy, that she really expects that that force will at some not very distant time be powerful enough to master that of this country, with a view, perhaps, to its invasion, why should it be assumed that it will be for her to select the occasion for the struggle—which may be at a time when, owing to other difficulties, we may be least able to cope with her.

By the custom of nations we might put a stop to efforts, which are being made to our detriment.

When Russia had built in the Black Sea a stronghold, which could evidently only be intended for aggressive purposes, did we not, having our own (supposed) interests solely in view, destroy her fortress, as well as her navy?

Would Germany hesitate to enfeeble France, if she were not restrained from the attack by other Powers?

Acting on these lines a prescient British Government would at once send an ultimatum to Germany fixing a (low) limit to her navy, the immediate destruction of such war vessels as she possesses being the alternative to a compliance with our demand.

Thus should we avoid the necessity for that great increase of expenditure in our dockyards, which will otherwise be inevitable at the time when many millions have to be provided for old age pensions.

By such a stroke, whether limited to diplomacy, or carried to extremes, we should regain some of our lately lost prestige, for the world would see us treating an over-weening Power with that dominancy which we have so often displayed when dealing with recessive communities.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS RAM.

54, St. John's Road, Highgate Hill, N.,
February 2nd, 1908.

[Our correspondent is a little more logical than Mr. Stead, and slightly less expensive.—ED., NATION.]

THE EFFECTS OF A BREAD TAX.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In the very interesting article on "How the People Live," which appears in your last issue, there occurs the following rather curious sentence: "Among the poorest, actually one-fifth of the total food expenditure is spent on bread and flour: a conclusive statistic condemning those who lightly justify a tax on imported corn on the ground that much stale bread is committed to the pig-sty." There seems to be a strange confusion of thought here. Nothing can justify a tax on corn, but I fail to see what the "conclusive statistic" has to do with the matter, for it only goes to show that a small tax on corn would not be of any very great importance. Something equivalent to 2s. a sack on flour would increase the expenditure of these households selected by about one per cent. That of course is no more justification for the tax than the fact that a wealthy man could afford to have his watch taken occasionally is a reason for encouraging pickpockets.

The curious thing is that your contributor appears to think one-fifth a large proportion. When the present Bread Act was brought into the House of Commons its introducer stated as the reason for its proposal that three-fourths of the population lived almost wholly on bread. Now, we see the worst paid artisans spend only one-fifth of their total food expenditure on the cheapest kind of food. Your contributor actually thinks that that shows that they are on the margin of subsistence, whereas it really demonstrates something quite different. Your contributor is probably affected by the "verge of starvation" theory, which is so dear to some people that they accept it without evidence and use it to the manifest advantage of their Protectionist enemies.—Yours, &c.,

R. SHINDLER.

61, Chancery Lane, W.C.,
February 5th, 1908.

"A WOMAN'S CHARTER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent, E. M. Harrison, states very forcibly the comparative powerlessness of political freedom to give happiness, and deduces therefrom the conclusion that women may spend their time and energy to better purpose than in working for their political enfranchisement. Many of us, who share her conviction and are as fully persuaded of the disappointments which accompany achievement, are unable to acquiesce in her resignation to the present condition of women's disabilities.

With Dr. Johnson we recognise—

"How small of all that human hearts endure
The part which laws or Kings can cause or cure!"

But, with the evidence of the social and political history of our country before us, it is impossible to deny that greater possibilities of happiness and well-being have followed the extension of the franchise to all those classes that have shared it. Why should it be otherwise in the case of women? Since thousands of them bear the burdens and fulfil the duties of citizens and subjects of the State, why should the bare rights of citizenship be withheld?

It is easily admissible that the past condition of women's seclusion in the home was the happier one; but since economic evolution has thrust them into the workshop and the market-place, it is useless to pretend that they are not there. Their need makes it easy for their services to be exploited—and exploited they are in every market. Effective combination is as impossible to professional and working women to-day as it was to working men a century ago. They are pawns in the game of legislation; and weapons, as well as hostages, in the contest of capital with labour. The moral influence which women might exert is stultified by their political insignificance.

To many, therefore, it seems desirable and necessary to remove from amongst the excellences of a "man-made" political system the corrupt, and corrupting, anomaly of a State which does not disdain to tax women's earnings for its upkeep, disdaining to ascertain the woman's point of view in matters which concern her most intimately. Her livelihood, her home, her children, her personal safety and honour—it is no idle self-seeking which leads her to believe that in these "moral influence" is potent for equity only when supported by political power.

It has not been found that "moral influence" sufficed in the amelioration of other evil conditions largely due to an imperfect distribution of political influence; to endeavour to recognise it as adequate and sufficient in the case of women's disabilities is to proclaim a futile casuistry.—

Yours, &c.,

January 27th, 1908.

SUSAN CUNNINGTON.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I comment briefly on Mrs. Frederic Harrison's letter? I do not think we women who want the franchise could formulate a "Charter." We have our separate interests and desires quite as much as a man politician who frames or supports any new measure or reformation. But the right to vote should be ours if we possess the same qualification as a man, and we could share his "apathetic indifference" or not, as our temperament or circumstances prompt us.

I entirely agree that the vote would not at once revolutionise everything, and I am sorry when our working sisters are told that Woman Suffrage would immediately solve their industrial problems. But this is no adequate reason for withholding our claim or deferring an act of justice.

Meantime, our militant workers should recognise that laws are not necessarily bad because made by men only. If we are all agreed that drunkenness and theft are punishable, a shout of "man-made laws" does little good in a Court of Justice. And, if we acknowledge that courtesy demands a quiet hearing for a speaker at a meeting, screams of "Votes for women!" at irrelevant moments are not only meaningless but vulgar.

To some of us women it is a matter of glad surprise how many men have recently avowed interest in our cause. Let us increase this interest in every possible constitutional way, for the franchise can only be extended to us by a "man-made" law! Let us prove by better means than disorderly outbursts our desire to share the parliamentary as well as the municipal votes of our country.

All reforms come slowly, but "Tout vient à celui qui sait attendre." Did we not read in the papers lately of a bride who said she had waited thirty years for "the Marriage with Deceased Wife's Sister Bill" to pass?

"The path of half the human race is wide, long, adventurous, but never monotonous—and if women walk therein they will arrive there."—Yours, &c.,

JANET ELIZABETH LEITCH.

"SIMPLE BIBLE TEACHING."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Will you kindly permit me to acknowledge that Mr. Picton was right in saying that there is no one syllabus for religious teaching? I referred to the London School Board Syllabus, which was so largely copied throughout the country as to become almost the one syllabus. In this syllabus, the Six Days' Creation and the Fall of Man are omitted. I should myself treat the "lives" of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as literal facts; but it would not lessen the value of Genesis to me if it could be proved that they never lived.

My answer to Mr. Picton's question is that I think it possible to make the "life" of Jacob valuable in teaching young children. I should certainly not put him before them for imitation in much that he did, but show that his "life" was a strange mixture of evil and good, that he did many wrong things; but I should be very careful to impress their young minds with the fact that he suffered for his wrong-doing, as we all do. I should also teach them that he was a man of faith, and lived with the fear of God before him, that he seemed conscious of God's all-seeing eyes following him, and that it was his firm belief in God and his desire for God's approval that saved him. I cannot help thinking that God judged Jacob more by what he was trying to overcome, and to be, than by what he was. "For He knoweth our frame."

I hope that most teachers in the present day have learnt to read the Old Testament (thanks to the higher critics) different from the way I was taught to read it in my youth. I thought every word was the word of God, and that all the writers were inspired alike, which they were not, and which accounts for much some of them have written that we cannot defend. The New Testament will be the chief book used in the schools. Notwithstanding the fact that there are a few things in the Old Testament difficult to understand, and that cannot be defended, we must admit that the "Bible, as a whole, is incomparably the greatest book ever written—God's book, in a sense in which no other book is or can be."

In conclusion, I should like to say that when parents and all the churches come to see and feel that they are mainly responsible for the religious teaching, they will only expect the day school teachers to give good moral lessons, as all such teachers would be competent to give. Religious teaching requires a suitable atmosphere, and can only be properly given by men and women who have a living faith in Jesus Christ, and are imbued with His Spirit.—

Yours, &c.,

JOHN EVANS.

6, Park Road, Clevedon, Somerset,
February 10th, 1908.

Poetry.

A ROYALIST IN SPRING-TIME.

LATE our land submissive lay,
Hushed and silent, sorrow-wise,
'Neath the old Protector's sway,
Winter, with his grim allies.

Roundhead Winter's rule is o'er;
Overseas in haste he's hieing;
Steps a Prince upon our shore,
Drums a-beat and standards flying.

Exiled in the south afar,
Ripe he comes for royal daring;
Blue and gold his colours are,
Sky and sun at once declaring.

Bough and brake for waving plume;
Song-birds for his courtly train;
Light and sound, and bud and bloom—
So the King comes home again.

Roundhead Winter's rule is o'er;
None, oh Spring, thy claim resist.
Now the King has come once more,
Every man's a Royalist.

W. J. CAMERON.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

AN important volume, with the title "Liberal Anglicanism," will shortly be issued by Messrs. Williams & Norgate in their "Crown Theological Library." It will consist of a series of papers by some of the chief representatives of Anglican Liberalism, both lay and clerical. Only recently the Bishop of London declared that the Broad Church party in the English Church was dead. The forthcoming volume will show that it is still very much alive. Among the contributors to it will be the Master of the Temple, Professor Caldicott, Professor Burkitt of Cambridge, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, Dr. Rashdall, Professor Percy Gardner, the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, Chaplain and Lecturer at University College, Oxford, the Rev. Hubert Handley, the Rev. R. J. Wilkinson—the translator of Professor Harnack's latest volume—and other well-known names.

* * *

IN spite of his vehement Orangeism and Unionism, and his rhetorically scornful descriptions of his political opponents, the late Colonel Sanderson was one of the most popular of members of the House of Commons. His wars with the Nationalists were rather mimic than real, and his personality, even though physically he seemed to suggest something of the "Copper Captain," was agreeable. His biography, written by Mr. Reginald Lucas, is to be published before Easter by Mr. Murray. It should prove an entertaining volume. Besides being a leading politician, he was also an enthusiastic yachtsman—he designed, built, and sailed his own boats—a keen sportsman, a clever caricaturist, an excellent raconteur, and, above all, a wit.

* * *

THERE seems to be something of a revival of interest in Nietzsche, if we may judge from the fact that several volumes of selections and translations from his works have been published during the last few years. As yet, however, no book giving an unbiased estimate of his philosophy as a whole has appeared in English, but possibly this want may be supplied by the translation of Dr. A. M. Mügge's "Nietzsche and his Philosophy" which Mr. Fisher Unwin announces. Dr. Mügge's book will contain a full biography of Nietzsche, a summary and exposition of his works, together with a selection of the chief criticisms, both hostile and appreciative, that have been made upon it, and a complete bibliography. There is room for a book which will give a dispassionate estimate of Nietzsche, since most of those who have hitherto written about him have been either ardent disciples or vehement opponents.

* * *

ALTHOUGH a large number of works bearing upon different aspects of the Bank of England have been published, we are still without anything in the nature of an exhaustive history of that unique institution. This gap will shortly be filled, as Messrs. P. S. King & Sons are preparing an English translation of the very full and well-informed "History of the Bank of England," by M. A. Andréadès—one of the most brilliant of the younger school of Continental economists. The book is, of course, primarily concerned with the development of the Bank of England, which it traces from its incorporation in 1694 down to the Baring crisis of 1890, and the effect of Lord Goschen's criticisms of the 1844 charter. But M. Andréadès does not neglect the influence of the Bank on general English history, and he gives a good account of the weighty part it played at the time of the English Revolution. A useful appendix gives a concise history of the relations between the Bank and the Treasury.

* * *

"THE DIARY OF DR. POLIDORI," edited by his nephew, Mr. W. M. Rossetti, which is to be published by Messrs. Brown, Langham & Co., is certain to contain some interesting references to Byron and Shelley. Dr. Polidori became secretary and physician to Byron in 1816, but returned to England the following year, though he parted with Byron on friendly terms. In 1819 he published "The Vampire," which he attributed to Byron, and in spite of the poet's disclaimer, the work gained great celebrity on the Continent.

* * *

AMONG Messrs. Longmans' announcements for the early spring are several works of great importance dealing with political and social history. We have already given particulars of the next instalment of Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Webb's survey of English Local Government. It is to be issued almost immediately, in two volumes, with the title "English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporation Act: The Manor and the Borough." We are also to have the two final volumes of the late Sir Spencer Walpole's "History of Twenty-five Years." They deal with the history of the ten years 1871-1881, and thus complete Sir Spencer Walpole's original project of a history of England during the sixty-six years that followed the battle of Waterloo. A third announcement is that a number of lectures on "Germany in the Dark and Middle Ages," delivered by Bishop Stubbs as Regius Professor of History at Oxford, have been prepared for the press by Mr. Arthur Hassall. Dr. Stubbs's work has little charm of style or literary finish, but he is always solid and informing.

* * *

THE object of Mr. Gordon Craig's new magazine, "The Mask," is to bring before the public many ancient and modern aspects of the Theatre's Art which have too long been disregarded and forgotten. Its aim is not to reform the theatre, but to announce a vitality which already begins to reveal itself in a beautiful and definite form based upon noble tradition. Among the contributions to the first number (which will be issued immediately) are: "A Letter to a Young Artist of the Theatre" and "The New Theatre," by Gordon Craig; "Yvette Guilbert," by Haldane Macfall; "The French Tragedy, 1689-1787," by Jean-Jacques Olivier; "A Note upon Marionettes," by Adolf Furst; and "The Dance," by Isidora Duncan. Each number will contain designs for theatres, stage scenes, costumes, masks, &c.

* * *

THE social question excites as keen an interest in Germany at it does among ourselves. Ecclesiastical circles there are much concerned at the rise and growth of social democracy, which is an anti-religious as well as a revolutionary movement. For this the ultra-conservative attitude of the Lutheran Church is seriously to blame. A new volume will shortly be published by Pfarrer G. Traub on "The Clergy and the Social Question" (Der Pfarrer und die Sociale Frage), in which the author points out the right attitude which should be adopted by the teachers of religion in dealing with the social problems of the day. Herr Traub is a competent and experienced writer on these subjects, and the book will no doubt be a serious contribution to the literature of the social question.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. V. The Age of Louis XIV." (Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.)
- "The Dynasts: A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars." Part Third. By Thomas Hardy. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)
- "The Reminiscences of Albert Pell." Edited by Thomas Mackay. (Murray. 15s.)
- "Modernism: A Record and Review." By A. L. Lilley. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
- "My Life in the Open." By W. H. Ogilvie. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- "The Duchess of Padua. A Play." By Oscar Wilde. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- "Old Paths and Legends of the New England Border." By Katherine M. Abbott. (Putnam. 15s. net.)
- "Religion and Theology." By E. Ménégoz. (Williams and Norgate. 1s. net.)
- "Small Holdings and Allotments Handbook." By Corrie Grant, M.P. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Earl Carrington. (Arrowsmith. 1s. net.)
- "The Nun." By René Bazin. (Nash. 6s.)
- "A History of the Jews in England." By A. M. Hyamson. (Chatto and Windus. 4s. 6d. net.)
- "La Philosophie de l'Inconnaissable." Par J. Laminne. (Paris: Dewitt. 5fr.)
- "La Crise Socialiste." Par Eugène Fournière. (Paris: Fasquelle. 3fr. 50.)
- "La Lutte Contre les Microbes." Par Dr. Etienne Burnet. (Paris: Colin. 3fr. 50.)
- "Le Port d'Attache." Roman. Par Léon de Tinseau. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy: 3fr. 50.)

Reviews.

THE AGE OF LOUIS XIV.*

Nobody will quarrel with the title given to the latest volume of the Cambridge Modern History. The phrase consecrated by custom calls up a very definite picture, and it stands for a unity, at any rate, in our imagination. The editors, apologising for it in their preface, point not only to the part Louis XIV. played in the great affairs of the period, but also to the development of absolutist systems in Europe, in imitation of the great example at Versailles, which marked this generation of history. It was appropriate that the culminating stages of the power of the French monarchy should have coincided with the triumph of Peter the Great over the rivals to the Czardom and the transformation of the Elector of Brandenburg into the King of Prussia. Both those momentous events are described in this volume. Professor Bury leads up to the reforms of Peter the Great with a sketch of earlier Russian history, and the reforms themselves are discussed by Mr. Nisbet Bain. Dr. Ward writes on the origins of the Kingdom of Prussia—a phrase that conjures up before our eyes the spectacle of the most remarkable of the achievements that have been due to unremitting concentration on national aggrandisement. Even the mystical piety of the Kaiser can scarcely hallow the unspiritual proceedings of the coronation of 1701, but the House which then received its crown amid the sneers of the Great Powers has raised itself in a comparatively short time to a position of equality with the mightiest dynasties in the world.

Certainly, if any man was to give his name to this period, there was nobody to dispute the claims of Louis XIV. France was the centre of Europe, the centre of her storms and the centre of her pleasures, and who else can stand for French history, with all its aggressions and vicissitudes, during his long reign of seventy-two years? The statesmen of the first years of his reign can represent French prosperity; those of the last years of his reign can represent French adversity. Louis XIV. represents both. He saw the French monarchy in its vigour and strength, and he saw it in its decay and ruin. The history of that decline is traced by Professor Grant in a particularly interesting chapter in this volume. The French monarchy, as it was created by Richelieu and Mazarin, was the most striking example of centralised power. The two Cardinals had destroyed the great pretensions of the nobility, and, though there still remained a great mass of the débris of feudal administration and feudal justice, survivals which were only swept away by the Revolution, and perhaps could have been abolished by nothing less violent, the unification and concentration of France had been made the capital object of the persistent policy of the two singularly astute minds that had directed French politics for forty years. The first acts of Louis XIV., when he found himself his own master, went to show that he meant to push still further the policy of his predecessors. He attacked particularist abuses that Mazarin had left alone, and he co-operated with Colbert in cleansing judicial procedure of certain of its worst partialities. But the continuity of Richelieu's policy demanded conditions which were not easily satisfied. It was essential that France should have a brilliant Minister. It was essential, also, that she should have a king sagacious enough to understand the virtue of resignation. If the King had the right Minister, and was content to leave him in power, his own personal qualities ceased to matter very much. He could combine with that one virtue of well-placed obedience a good many vices and weaknesses without inflicting any injury on the system. But Louis XIV., like George the Third, did not so conceive his rôle. He announced that he meant to be his own Minister, and he soon showed, by the zeal and industry with which he flung himself into the business of government, that he was going to be as good as his word.

The result was that the State, instead of being kept within the lines of a scientific and impersonal continuity, was exposed to risks against which Richelieu's system for arbitrary government provided no security whatever. Richelieu's system was a government not of laws but of men. Louis XIV. was not an incompetent ruler. Lord Acton called him by far the ablest man who was born in modern times on the steps of a throne. If he made some terrible mistakes he achieved some great successes. But, from the moment he began to rule his Minister instead of obeying him, it began to matter enormously what sort of man he was. The monarchy ceased to be a machine, and the play of his personal passions and character destroyed the creations of the cold and collected statesmanship of Richelieu. His natural arrogance, fed on intoxicating success, made him carry his policy of aggression to a point at which it recoiled on France and upset all the careful and deliberate diplomacy which had given France her commanding position. (It must be admitted that Colbert, as pacific Minister, deluded by his economic fallacies, shares the responsibility for the fatal invasion of Holland.) At home the consequences were not less manifest. The revocation of the edict of Nantes is the chief example. Richelieu had dealt with the religious question as a State question. When the Huguenots conspired against the State he fought them without mercy; when they ceased to be a faction and became a sect his quarrel with them was at an end. Louis XIV. was never confronted with a Huguenot sedition, and his problem was far simpler. The Huguenots were not only in his time harmless citizens; they were citizens of considerable public spirit. But in an unhappy moment for the peace of France, Louis XIV. took to virtue and Madame de Maintenon, and in the irreparable losses which followed the Revocation, the State paid its heavy price for the religious gloom which had settled on the conscience of the King and oppressed the gaiety of Versailles.

Versailles itself is perhaps the greatest monument of Louis' decadence. The compass of this volume admits only of a bare mention of that stupendous defiance of nature, prudence, and compassion. Mr. Bradby has well called it in his book a Pharaoh-like achievement, for it was built in violent despite of nature, out of the lives and substance of exhausted France, on a site which had only been meant to support a few miserable houses. Colbert did his utmost to prevent it, but the King preferred to listen to the flatteries of Louvois, and in the mighty palace which was built out of the reach of the remembered laughter of Paris, but not, as the event proved, beyond the reach of her revenges, Louis XIV. recorded for the warning of kings the isolation of the monarchy and its inevitable doom. The monarchy did not settle down into its stagnant selfishness without some warning protests. Vauban, the great soldier, published his Dime Royale to prove that a third of the population of France lived by begging, an act of independence for which he suffered disgrace. Fénelon inspired the young Duke of Burgundy with his own liberal but aristocratic ideas. The small-pox that carried off Burgundy with his wife and children certainly changed the history of France, for Fénelon had made him a rebel against the doctrine of Versailles that kingdoms only existed for the pleasure of kings. If he had come to the throne he would probably have tried, as Professor Grant suggests, to restore the power of the nobles. Could such a policy have succeeded? We cannot say. All that we know is that the form, as well as the method, of the Great Revolution were dictated by the events which had undermined that power, and that it owes its conspicuous successes to the atrophy of the leadership of the nobles. Nowhere, as M. Sorel said, was the nobility reduced to such political insignificance.

* "The Age of Louis XIV. Cambridge Modern History, Vol. V." Cambridge University Press. 16s. net.

This is, of course, one great difference between France and England. The one kind of Revolution that became impossible in France was the Revolution that happened in England in 1688. Mr. Timperley describes it as a revolution initiated by the great nobles, effected by the aid of a foreign ruler, and consummated by a constitutional settlement made by country gentlemen in the House of Commons. The success of that Revolution had been made possible by the signal blunder of James the Second, whose policy had reinforced the political elements opposed to him with the religious sympathy of the nation, and had thrown away in four years all that had been gained to the Crown since the Restoration. Professor Firth shows what those powers were in 1660, while Mr. Pollock analyses in one of the most brilliant chapters in the volume the means whereby Charles emancipated himself from Parliamentary control. Mr. Pollock argues that Charles's ability in projecting a great scheme and pursuing it with tenacity, entitles him to a place among statesmen of the first rank, and he shows that however little reason Englishmen have to like his ends or his methods, the strategy which ended by making him absolute and uncontrolled King deserves the highest admiration. Fortunately James II., of whom Mr. Pollock says that he owed to the ungraciousness of his manners a wholly undeserved reputation for probity and veracity, was destitute of his brother's gifts, and he threw his country into the arms of the Whigs and William. But though the Revolution gave the country a constitutional settlement, it remained to simplify the executive machinery of government, and it is not surprising that some eyes were turned in the chaos of administration to French examples. Dr. Warner published in the "English Historical Review" last year a paper which was written by Defoe, apparently for the instruction of Harley, when he was Secretary of State in 1704. In that paper Defoe pointed out all the evils of divided and dilatory government, and urged his patron to build up a position like that once held by Richelieu and Mazarin. Such a venture, as Defoe saw, meant a breach with all English tradition. As a matter of fact, it was impossible as a permanent system of government, on account of the strength of the aristocracy. But Defoe was, of course, quite right in thinking that it was essential to simplify and concentrate English Government. He wanted to simplify it by overthrowing Cabinet Councils, which he called "modern and eccentric," and to substitute a Secretary of State powerful enough to act on his own judgment. As it happened, Government was simplified in Defoe's lifetime, only it was simplified by the consolidation of the Cabinet system which he wanted to see abolished. However, Walpole's important, though not very sublime career is only beginning in this volume.

It is only possible to touch on the main features of the new volume in a review. We may perhaps mention, in addition to the articles to which we have already drawn attention, a very interesting chapter by Lord St. Cyres on the Gallican Church, and the composite chapter on "European Science" in a century remarkable for the progress of scientific ideas. It was in 1660 that the Royal Society received its charter, and four years later Dryden, carried away in the general enthusiasm of the hour, prophesied that science would soon lead us to the extreme verge of the globe and then delight us with a better view of the moon. The disappointment of the volume is M. Faguet's chapter on French 17th century literature. The chapter was to have been written by M. Brunetière, and the distinguished critic who has taken his place has confined himself to an elegant summary of his subject. Mr. J. C. Bailey has remonstrated with his countrymen in the extremely interesting volume of essays he has just published for their neglect of French poetry. M. Faguet, we fear, must think that neglect past forgiveness and past cure. Otherwise he would have allowed himself more than seven meagre pages in which to give us his ideas on Corneille, La Fontaine, Molière, and Racine.

ANCIENT BRITAIN.*

BARELY half a century ago few antiquaries would have challenged Dr. Johnson's contention that "all that is really known of the ancient state of Britain is contained in a few pages. We can know no more than what the old writers have told us." In secular as in sacred matters, the written document was held to be the final court of appeal; the canon was closed. Hence, a couple of generations back, our school-books began with the Roman invasion, when the legions of the Empire encountered semi-barbarous tribes who fought in scythed chariots and stained their faces and limbs with the purple woad. But now the early ages of British history are entirely rewritten. The antiquary who busied himself over coins, medals, and chronicles, as the sole sources of that history, is superseded by the archæologist whose larger horizon includes the vast body of material of which the eighteenth century, and even still later times, knew nothing. The historic period merges into the dateless prehistoric, with its revelation about races compared with whom the ancient Britons are parvenus—races whose relics are not so much in their actual remains, for these, through well-ascertained causes, are very rare, as in the enormous number of rudely-shaped stone tools and weapons unearthed from old river-beds, limestone caverns, and burial-places. And the several series of implements witness to a gradual increase of skill in workmanship, pointing to successive stages of civilisation. It is with "the story of man's life in our island from the earliest times in detail" that the larger part of Dr. Rice Holmes's volume—scholarly, acute, not without streaks of humour and an element of cocksureness—is concerned. The book justifies its existence. Lord Avebury's "Prehistoric Times" covers much of the same ground, but it needs bringing up to date. The late Charles Elton's "Origins of English History," published in 1882, valuable as it is for its redaction of the scattered fragments of the diary of Pytheas, a Massilian Greek explorer of the fourth century, B.C., and for the light which it throws on customs of inheritance and superstitions, gives little space to the races and relics of the Old and New Stone Ages.

Although Dr. Holmes necessarily deals with materials as to the significance of which there is agreement, save in unessential detail, there remains a margin for speculation on several questions, the treatment of which is a test of the author's sense of proportion and of his acquaintance with facts to be used for purposes of comparison. In these fundamentals Dr. Holmes is not lacking. The obscurity which hangs round the probable time of man's arrival in north-western Europe invests with interest any evidence indicative of his presence earlier than that supplied by the implements of the Paleolithic or Ancient Stone Age. Hence controversy centres round the numerous flints found embedded in gravel patches, chiefly in Kent, deposits whose existence ante-dates present river systems. These flints, named Eoliths, are much ruder in shape than the typical palæoliths, of which, some contend, they are the prototypes, the result of man's 'prentice hand in chipping the primitive implement. If this be so (and "flints of Eolithic form have been found even in Tertiary beds in France") the antiquity of man in these parts is thrown back enormously, and consequently, with that, his origin in the Indo-Malayan region, to which evidence points as his cradle. Dr. Holmes skilfully balances the pros and cons, with a certain tilt of the beam in favour of the theory that the eoliths may not be older than the palæoliths. There we must leave it. After all, it is man as thinker more than as toolmaker that fascinates us most, and in surveying the several stages of culture Dr. Holmes gives space to consideration of the problem of man as a religious being at periods of incalculable antiquity. He finds analogies between Palæolithic man and the now extinct Tasmanian, who, at an equally low, or perhaps lower, plane, "certainly believed in a spiritual world." His remarks under this section cannot well be shortened for quotation, but one sentence gives the key to his conclusions:—

"Although the orthodox may refuse the name of religion to an animism begotten of fear and unconnected with ethics; although idealists may scoff at the conception of spiritual beings which invests them with bodily form, and ponderable, and mortal, albeit ethereal, substance, that animism was the seed out of which their own faith—its framework, but not its nobler part—was evolved."

*"Ancient Britain and the Invasions of Julius Caesar." By T. Rice Holmes, Litt.D. Clarendon Press. 21s. net.

Here we have the modern endorsement of shrewd old Hobbes's dictum, that "the feare of things invisible is the naturall Seed of Religion." But with the proof of mental continuity between the human and the animal, surely there is warrant for assumption that there never was a period in his evolution when man can be said to have become religious, because the elements of which religion is composed are implicit in his nearest congeners. To study his psychology apart from theirs is to misinterpret it; we thereby reject the key to knowledge of his intellectual and spiritual history. In treating of the evidence concerning the concrete forms which religion has taken, Dr. Holmes is at his best. He dissociates himself from such fatuous theories as that formulated by Sir Norman Lockyer on the origin and purpose of Stonehenge. Much nonsense had been written about the noble old pile in former days, but it was left for the astronomer just named to assert that it was built by priest astrologers who came from the East, and who designed it as a solstitial temple—that is, for observation of the length of the year by observing the rise of the sun on the longest day of the year as a key to farming operations. Despite the demolition of this fantastic theory by an Edinburgh Reviewer, its author persists in applying it to other stone circles; but it is to be hoped that Dr. Holmes has given it the "coup de grace." He mercifully refrains from comment on Sir Norman Lockyer's droll equations of Thoth with the Celtic "god of the people," Teutates, and of Balder with the Semitic "Bel," equations as groundless as Dean Swift's chaffing derivation of "ostler" from "oat-stealer." Dr. Holmes reserves his philological battery for attack on the theories of race and language which are the outcome of what he tartly calls Principal Sir John Rhys's "powerful but erratic" mind. That scholar has shown himself the readiest to acknowledge how tentative are theories on these complex subjects, and we regret that he meets with scant respect from a critic who cannot lay claim to the same erudition.

In summarising the "ethnology of the ancient Britons," Dr. Holmes focusses the evidence of the continuity of races in the survival "in greater or lesser proportion of the pre-Roman stocks." There are no unmixed peoples in Europe, and therefore no warrant for the assumption of the "undivided Aryan stock" of which he speaks. The term "Aryan" has no ethnological justification, and its use should be limited to what, on another page, is correctly called "the Aryan-speaking peoples."

No space is left for other than brief reference to the long-debated question as to the port in Gaul whence Cæsar sailed to invade this island. To this, as its place in his title implies, Dr. Holmes gives space which, some may think, is out of proportion to the importance of the problem. He cogently decides in favour of Boulogne, and there, for our part, we are willing that the matter be laid to rest. His book, written in the fitful intervals of duties making more demand on brain than on muscle, further proves the saying that the busy man has the most leisure, the use of which has complement in an index of commendable fulness.

E. C.

A MINOR "PRELUDE."

THE Poet Laureate recently mentioned, in "The Times," that motor cars, a serious nuisance in many parts, gave but little trouble in the neighbourhood of his own Manor. Even his carriage horses regarded them with high-bred disdain. This manifesto on motor cars illustrates Mr. Austin's outlook on modern life at large. High-bred disdain is his habitual mood. It must not, however, be assumed that he has been dehumanised by the many causes for vexation which he finds on a survey of the mind and manners of the time. In his latest book there are evidences that he is really ingenuous and joyous as a high-spirited child. When he forgets the vulgar world all is well. This was shown one October night which threatened frost.

"Veronica tells how the Poet, when once allowed to occupy the out-door bedroom, rising in the middle of the night to saunter in the Garden, since the full moon was smiling sweetly on every bank, suspected the intentions of that fascinating female luminary. Thereupon he carried out from his bedroom every chair that was in it, placed them round about the beds containing the most tender things, and then stretched all the newspapers he could lay his hands on in the adjoining lumber-room, then his dressing-gown, and finally his quilt, and some say the sheets over these again, and prolonged the existence of the fragile for some time."

* "The Garden That I Love." Second Series. By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate. Macmillan. 5s. net.

This action, characteristic of a generous child of nature, led to a permanent good result. One day soon afterwards the housemaids were discovered in earnest argument with the Poet, "to whom, I really don't know why, they always give in at last." "Veronica, overhearing the Poet pleading in his most persuasive manner, 'Oh, but you'll let me have them!' said 'Have what?'" and "then the dreadful truth came out." The Poet wanted the dust-sheets! He did not get them, it is true; but his naughtily good intention was accomplished. Lamia had come "to the rescue." She had reminded the Poet of a certain "première danseuse," and had allowed him to write asking where she found "all those short but delicate gossamer flounces that satisfy the Lord Chamberlain and Censor of Plays and Morals"; and now flower coverings, made of "cunningly adjusted gauze and tiffany," "dance and swing in the wind, with all the innocence of our blameless rural life."

It is not always that the ladies and gentlemen of the Old Manor are free to think and feel and act in such unmitigated felicity. Sometimes they are in contact with fellow creatures beyond the Garden, and then opportunities for high-bred disdain become the rule. While the Poet and his companions were seated in the dining-room of a country hotel "there slowly streamed in to the other tables a number of as respectable-looking persons, mostly of the more impeccable sex, as I ever saw." These people were very awkward. It would seem that they talked but little, and uneasily, and that they did not smile at all. It was painfully obvious that they were unfamiliar with the ways of good society. Lamia wondered whether they had all been to church, and had to be reminded that the time was neither Sunday nor Lent. "Then let us rejoice," she cried, "though I fear that will make us rather exclusive." Next day, being "unable to meet so many well-behaved people three times a day," she had luncheon in her own room. The Poet, of course, was much less agitated; but it is recorded that he was seen to smile, behind his unfolded napkin, at "the irreproachable deportment of uncongenial British respectability."

Thus far we have explored only the fringes of the Poet's mind, no more than the thoughts which are casually stirred in it during playful or social hours. It is by his poetry and his theory thereof that we must ultimately judge a poet. There is not much poetry in the book, and only one snatch of it, the closing set of verses, is flawless; but there is much discourse on the art. The Poet is a singularly good witness. He is never in the slightest doubt as to his own mind or as to the mind and the fame, or the misfortune, of any singer. His philosophy is simplicity itself. It is, in effect, that to be popular in his lifetime a poet must be of a temperament which is in tune with the temperament of his time. If a bard is not in this sympathy he need not hope to be successful there and then.

"Though probably no writer can wholly escape the influence of the age in which he happens to live, I doubt if that influence will be of much help or advantage to him if it be not in harmony with his own temperament. The more he yields to it, unless it be congenial to him, the more he sacrifices of himself; and to be oneself, in writing or in anything else, is to give one the best chance, not of popularity, but of doing the best work, and the best sort of work, for which one is by nature endowed. The Man does not necessarily chime with the Hour."

This is consolatory doctrine. True, it puts an end to the notion that the great occasion calls forth the great man, obliges us to perceive that many a great man may be great in vain, and thus deprives us of a useful working hypothesis as to how mortal affairs are engineered by the Force that underlies phenomena; but think of the compensation for disturbance which is in view. Henceforth, no poet need die because reviewers are unkind. Does the theory explain the philosophical indifference and amused resignation which aroused the ladies of the Garden to sympathy with their Poet and scorn of the public? Does his high-bred disdain for most aspects of the Hour spring from a feeling that he is not estimated according to merit? Although we are taken very liberally into the confidences of the ladies and gentlemen of the Garden, we must not go into these questions. There is the less need to discuss them inasmuch as they are practically answered in this amazingly frank book. "How about the sympathetic assistance given by men to intellectual women?" asked Lamia. "Is not that easily answered?" said the Poet. "Women are interested in men; men are interested in themselves." Mr. Austin's interest of this kind is sufficiently candid. Lamia had recited a lyric. "The lines are very musical," said Veronica, and the Poet agreed. "As for me," said Mr. Austin, "I thought them beautiful beyond words." Unable to ignore the fact that they were Mr. Austin's own, we ourselves felt a pang similar to that which afflicted the wayfarers in the country hotel.

A TOUR DE FORCE.*

ACROSS the burning desert, silent, solitary, bowing down at every third step to kiss the ground, the penitent of the East pursues his way to the Holy City. In a leather suit and blue spectacles, amidst a cloud of dust and roar of noise, the up-to-date pilgrim steers his automobile in the direction of Paris. Both are worshippers of a powerful and exacting deity. Whether his name be Buddha or the Advancement of Civilisation, the goal Nirvana or the offices of the "Matin," the sacrifices wrung from each are equally sublime, heroic and irrational. The Pekin-to-Paris race was noble, because it was useless, it proved nothing except its impossibility. The practical may scoff, but the idealists sympathise. We take off our hat with deepest reverence to the three devotees of the Motor God, the Prince Borghese, his chronicler, and his chauffeur.

On June 10th last, the "Itala" motor car, in company with five others, started from Pekin on its voyage through the unknown. What became of the others we do not greatly care, but the adventures of the "Itala," as set forth by the vivid and dramatic pen of Signor Barzini, absorb us irresistibly. The car develops, as the narrative progresses, a personality forcible and peculiar. At first cumbersome, intractable, a trifle farouche, it attains, after many desperate adventures and painful injuries, a kind of majestic apathy, a stubborn indifference to accident and disease, a cynical recklessness that is almost divine. We understand and share the devotion of Ettore, the chauffeur; an entire ignorance of mechanical engineering only heightens our agony as we read of sprained chassis or fractured clutch, and it is with a sigh of real regret that we say farewell on the last page, when, be-flagged and be-garlanded, we leave the "Itala" on the Boulevard Poissonière.

There is real romance in this wild adventure across two continents. From the start, witnessed by the immobile, unemotional Chinese, to the finish, amidst the frenzied embraces of an excited Parisian mob, the three travellers experienced a sensation that was wholly novel. They felt again the glamour of childhood, the joy of doing a thing that had never been done before.

"We experience the inebriation of conquest, the exaltation of triumph, and with it all a kind of astonishment, a sense of unreality, because of the strange thing this is—the running of such a race in such a country. We feel the pride of a civilisation and a race . . . the great longings of the Western soul, its strength, the true secret of all its progress, is resumed in the short word—Faster!"

These are the good moments, but there are also moments of gloom, of agitation, of physical pain, intense anxiety; long hours of endurance and fatigue. In the desert of Gobi the travellers experience the inevitable tortures of thirst and heat; their faces swell and crack, the skin blisters, bleeds—the slightest touch is unendurable. Painful and harassing in its monotony, their flight across the burning sand taught the Western minds the two great secrets of the East—its silence and its patience. Desert silence, says Signor Barzini, is like nothing else in the world. What the European understands by silence is only the cessation of certain sounds; this was a silence positive. "I heard nothing. There was no vibration, no life. There was the sensation of, I know not what, fabled emptiness, of an unearthly void. . . . I felt the impression of an infinite isolation." The most cruel part of the desert is a tract about forty miles long. The way is marked by whitening bones, for few and tough are those that reach the end. All old, tired or footsore animals fall here. It is a "place of agonies"; there breathes about it an "indescribable spirit of death." Crossing this desolate region, the mind becomes torpid and inert, the soul is "drowned in an unconquerable sadness," all sensations fade away, and nought is left but the very dregs of consciousness, a stagnant strength—dull, deep, and persistent—the power of patience. Yet there were occasional enlivening incidents. Drove of squat Mongolian horses would rush towards them, stop short in amazement, and gallop off in a wild "desperada"; a herd of antelopes would flash across the horizon, mad with terror of the grey, snorting monster, who chased them with a speed as swift as their own. Strange and dreamlike was the finding of the monastery of the desert. From above a great pile of rocks and boulders the travellers suddenly espied four golden globes shining in the sun. They were the same height, symmetrically disposed, and seemed to be "balancing themselves on the crest of stormy waves." Next they perceived a broad, empty space among the boulders, and the confused image resolved itself into a fabulous and singular city. A silence covered it as deep as of the desert outside. It was a city of prayer. Into this still shrine of the ancient Lamist religion bursts the uncouth apparition of the modern motor-car. What does it seek—the interpretation of some obscure passage in the Sacred Books? No, the way to the nearest telegraph station.

At Urga the desert ends and Siberia begins. Here a warm greeting in their native language, banquets, and a committee warn the travellers of the advent of civilisation. They are regarded no longer with barbaric fear and laughter, but with reverence, interest, and affection. The Grand Lama condescends to survey them; the Governor-General requests the pleasure of a ride.

On the way to Kiakhta the car sinks abruptly in a bog, and the travellers are faced by the certainty that unless help arrives immediately their chariot will be swallowed up. But the adventures of the "Itala" read like a fairy tale; help always does arrive just at the last moment. The sudden apparition of a line of telegas, the strength of oxen, the kindness of Mongolian or Mujik, fifty roubles, some wooden beams, and the car is once more ready for its travels. There is no end to the perils of the way and no end to the wit, ingenuity, and courage of the travellers. At one moment the car is up to its neck in water, the next the brake is on fire; once it tumbles backwards head over heels off a broken bridge, all but crushing its riders to death. It is three times bogged, the wheel breaks twice; yet it survives always as by a miracle.

Through the vast pine forests of Siberia, dark, primordial, wolf haunted, the car puffs on. In the Province of Irkutsk they pass a great gang of men in grey uniforms working on the new railway. At first they take them for soldiers, but looking closer see that each has a chain from his waist to his feet.

"When we passed near them the grey-cloaked men halted in their work, and all of them raised their heads to look at us in silence. Then they gave us greeting, raising their caps. Half of their heads was shaven; they looked like clowns with a wig and gave one a sense of horror. We had a feeling in our hearts like the grip of an iron hand as we stood before this sad revelation, and murmured, 'The Convicts!'"

Moscow and St. Petersburg fêted the travellers luxuriantly—almost too luxuriantly for constitutions strained by long fasts and fatigue. At length Russia is left, Germany traversed in a twinkling, and the car speeds through the country of its goal. "Oh les laids!" is the spontaneous welcome of æsthetic Gaul. Black-faced, ragged, and begrimed, the crew of the "Itala" have scarcely the aspect of heroes. Paris is reached amidst cheering, clamorous, intense, and continuous.

Here, amidst embraces, roses, champagne, Italian bands, and flashlight photography, the adventures of the Itala come to an end. Two hours later and the cry of the street vendor is changed, "Un sou, le Prince Borghese!" and Signor Barzini concludes his very entertaining book.

* "Pekin to Paris. An account of Prince Borghese's Journey across Two Continents in a Motor-Car." By Luigi Barzini. Grant Richards. 16s. net.

THE PRESS ON THE LITERARY FOUR-IN-HAND

LOVE AND THE IRONMONGER

Crown 8vo, 6s.

By F. J. RANDALL.

"Since the gay days (now nearly twenty years ago) when Mr. F. Anstey was writing his inimitable series of humorous novels from 'Vice Versâ' to 'Tourmalin's Time-Cheques' we can recall no book of purely farcical imagination so full of excellent entertainment as this first effort of Mr. F. J. Randall. . . . Certain to be a success; it will add refreshingly to the gaiety of the nation. If the author can sustain this level of high spirits, he will soon be amongst the most widely read and appreciated of contemporary humorists."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"The novel-reading public will be grateful to Mr. John Lane for introducing to their notice a new and genuine humorist. It is unquestionably a fact that if Mr. Randall gives us only three or four books half as funny . . . his will be a wit to reckon with in the future."—STANDARD.

APOLOGIA DIFFIDENTIS

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

By W. COMPTON LEITH.

"It is a hard thing for an author to be introduced to the world by the reiterated statement of his publisher that 'here is a new classic.' . . . The author is master of a style at once fluid and distinguished . . . his work is a genuine contribution to literature . . . a sincere and often beautiful attempt to depict the character of a sensitive, self-conscious Ishmael. . . In a way remarkable."—TIMES.

"Striking work. . . Of the excellence of his English there can be no question. He can express himself with nicety and excellence; he can turn a metaphor with any man from Browne to Stevenson."—OUTLOOK.

" . . . Real excellence . . . exquisite writing. The style is that of Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson polished and made precious to an unusual degree. It will not surprise me if we learn by-and-by that Mr. Benson is in truth the author. I imagine I recognise a free and easy use of the conjunction reminiscent of him there; also a reference to Fairfield Church and its stained glass windows familiar to readers of 'Cornhill,' and who else but Mr. Benson could have so faithfully and so truly confessed to this tendency of Mr. W. Compton Leith: 'As my reading is incessant, so is my writing. For the happiness of man is in his fertility, and of barrenness comes the worst despair.'"—GLASGOW NEWS.

MODERNISM AND ROMANCE

Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

By R. A. SCOTT-JAMES.

"A sane, reasonable, and thoughtful analysis of contemporary English literature, not of the facts, but of the meanings in it."—MR. ARTHUR SYMONS in DAILY NEWS.

"Mr. Scott-James has written round this great subject a book of real interest and value . . . he shows noteworthy insight and the gift of analysis."—TRIBUNE.

JUST OUT.

INTERLUDES AND POEMS

Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

By LASCELLES ABERCROMBIE.

¶ Some weeks ago the well-known editor of a distinguished weekly declared he had discovered a new poet—a real genius. On his being asked if the poet's name was Abercrombie, his astonished reply was "Yes." "I thought so," was the retort of the present publisher; "I have just accepted a volume from him entitled INTERLUDES AND POEMS, and one of the most distinguished living writers wrote me a spontaneous letter drawing attention to Mr. Abercrombie as 'not only a poet, but a poet of very great and original powers. . . . I mean, this is really that rara avis, a man of genius.'" Mr. Abercrombie, perhaps, has more marked development of form than any of his predecessors since Whitman. It is because he is treating of ideas forced upon him by his generation.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING PUBLICATIONS.

CEYLON: THE PARADISE OF ADAM

THE RECORD OF SEVEN YEARS RESIDENCE IN THE ISLAND.
With Illustrations from Photographs.

By CAROLINE CORNER.

Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

¶ "Mrs. Corner has courage and frankness, and above all a sense of humour. . . . The book is merry, witty, observant. . . . observation in lighter vein, with a serious note of information and experience . . . a deal of enlightenment as well as entertainment."—DAILY CHRONICLE.

DEBUSSY

By Mrs. FRANZ LIEBICH.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

¶ Mrs. Liebich's critical and biographical account of the great composer appears at a particularly opportune moment, seeing that Debussy has just arrived in London and is conducting his own works at various concerts. The volume gives an exceptionally intimate impression, for the composer is allowed to speak for himself whenever possible. [Living Masters of Music.]

EDWARD MACDOWELL

By LAWRENCE GILMAN.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

¶ The recent inclusion of Edward Macdowell in the same Series serves to emphasise how sudden and untimely was the death of the great composer. Mr. Lawrence Gilman's charmingly sympathetic story of Macdowell's life and artistic career will be appreciated by every lover of music. With Portrait.

NEW POEMS

By STEPHEN PHILLIPS.

Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

¶ "The old qualities are here with a finer feeling than before for the point where enough has been said. He has mastered his materials, he can do almost as he pleases with words."—TIMES.
"A remarkable volume, rich in the pure gold of poetry."—STANDARD.

THE WINE OF LIFE

By MAUDE ANNESLEY.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

¶ "A powerful novel . . . originality of treatment . . . a really close study of human nature. . . . A live woman drawn for us so carefully, whose emotions seem as real as her actions are natural."—EVENING STANDARD.

"The story is full of life and interest, and the startling dénouement is led up to with considerable skill."—PALL MALL GAZETTE.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

THE FINANCES OF SIR JOHN KYNNEERSLEY

By A. C. FOX-DAVIES, Barrister-at-Law, Author of "The Mauleverer Murders," "The Dangerville Inheritance," &c.
Crown 8vo, 6s.

¶ This book creates an arch type of the clever swindler, and represents the series of episodes by which he amasses an enormous fortune. The episodes are so cleverly devised as to seem not only possible but probable.

VELASQUEZ

By A. F. CALVERT.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

A Biography and Appreciation. Illustrated with 142 Reproductions from Photographs of his most celebrated Pictures.

GOYA

By A. F. CALVERT.

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

An historical and biographical appreciation. With 600 Illustrations.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

THE KING'S GENERAL IN THE WEST.

BEING THE LIFE OF SIR RICHARD GRENVILLE, BARONET (1600-1659).

By ROGER GRANVILLE, M.A., Sub-Dean of Exeter Cathedral. With Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

READY FEBRUARY 18.

THE CHICHESTER INTRIGUE: a Novel.

By THOMAS COBB.

6s.

By THOMAS COBB.

AUTHOR OF "MRS. ERRICKER'S REPUTATION."

JOHN LANE, THE BODLEY HEAD, LONDON AND NEW YORK.

NOVELS.

If "R. Macaulay," who is probably a woman, but possibly an American man, is still young at the novel writing craft, "The Furnace" (Murray, 6s.) is of good omen. It has individuality, perception, a due measure of artistic detachment, and an agreeable well-bred style. Of course, it has its resemblances to the work of other writers: it recalls both James and Howell, and is very clearly in the same line of descent as the stories of Mrs. Wharton. Like these writers the author of "The Furnace" deals less with external events than with human developments. In one sense nothing happens in "The Furnace." A young brother and sister, English, but Italianised, are living, at the beginning of the book, carelessly and happily in a Neapolitan Bohemia. At its end they are left, at a pause in the ways, broken off from their old life and not yet embarked upon a new one. Intercourse with a group of prosperous and scrupulous English people has shown them other standards, awakened other perceptions. The gulf has been too deep for crossing from either side; with a pang the Venables have gone away; with a pang the Credequers remain. It is all admirably rendered and all inexorably true to real human nature. Yet the Venables are not quite English; Mrs. Venables, Warren and Prudence have all a savour of Boston, and Miranda, who has the tastes and habits of the British school-girl, wears them rather like badges than like unconscious characteristics. Naples furnishes exactly the right background; figures and setting form a complete picture that remains as a picture in the memory.

Undeniably the author of "Wee MacGregor" has a charm. His new tale, "Thou Fool" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), is that of a young tradesman resolved to "get on" regardless of any sufferings he may inflict. He grows very wealthy and finds his wealth powerless to win the woman without whom it is but dust and ashes. Rather the theme of a Sunday School story. Yes, but vastly different in treatment and atmosphere. Full, too, of Mr. J. J. Bell's aforesaid charm that is so warm and friendly, so artless, and so curiously national.

The hero of Mr. Vincent Brown's new novel, "The Fashionable Christians" (Chapman & Hall, 6s.), is the Rev. Peter Kermond, who has, at its opening, just become vicar of a fashionable London Church with a wealthy and worldly congregation. He creates a sensation there by his method of preaching, which is, indeed, remarkable enough. He denounces from his pulpit the various doings of persons present before him, and so describes the persons that they must be recognisable to everybody in the church. To Mr. Brown this plan seems apparently commendable; but even he perceives that it tended to harden rather than soften the hearts of the sinners, and it does not seem to strike him that upon the rest of the hearers the effect must have been closely akin to that of a bull-baiting.

The epithet "admirable" would appear to possess some peculiar applicability to men-servants. To a member of that class it is applied in Mr. Ronald Legge's "The Admirable Davis" (Cassells, 6s.). The achievements of Davis are great and diverting; but if his employers had not been phenomena of folly there would have been no demand upon his cleverness. When two gentlemen entrusted with a secret mission choose to make a détour through Eastern Europe on their way to an island in the Pacific, when, having escaped from a despot's prison, they immediately return to that despot's headquarters, what can be said except that the English statesman who gave them their mission was a bad judge of men? Davis accomplishes it; and even Davis would have failed but for the benevolent fraud of a wily sea-captain. The moral is that Cabinet Ministers should select their agents from among the ranks of able seamen and of soldier servants.

Mr. Frank Savile's "The Desert Venture" (Arnold, 6s.) is just what its name indicates—a story of African adventure, with Moors and negroes in it, and captured slaves and bloodshed and hairbreadth escapes. The English villain is a little too uniformly despicable, and the addition of the heroine to the expedition strains probability a good deal; but the story goes at a stirring pace, the characters are well enough indicated, and, finally, there is one element that deepens and strengthens what might otherwise be rather a flimsy subject. The figure of Saint Serrèze, with his humane and wide ambitions, is both fine and true, and the ending which leaves him isolated upon a little oasis of civilisation, that may or may not become the germ of an empire, haunts the imagination.

If Miss Emily Pearson Finnemore, the writer of "A Brummagem Button" (Nutt, 6s.), had courage to step beyond the ordinary conventions, she might produce work of high quality. She manages to impart an atmosphere, and to give solidity to her characters. But one feels, in reading, that the development of these people is regulated, not by unswerving truthfulness, but by the necessity of conducting them along certain lines. Hardy or Gissing would have made a great book of her subject. Miss Finnemore has made a pleasant one, which nobody will denounce and nobody will remember. It may be read with impunity by the most timid, and will disturb no reader by the forcible intrusion of a new thought.

Mrs. Baillie Reynolds' new novel, "Broken Off" (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.), is, to speak plainly, a fairy tale. Its persons profess to belong to modern England, but their world is quite remote from real life. Their actions, and still more their words, are all in falsetto. Many readers, however, prefer novels in falsetto, and "Broken Off" is likely enough to be popular.

In "A Charming Girl" (Greening, 6s.), Miss Esmé Stuart has found an excellent central idea upon which a diverting light comedy might be built, and has presented her central figure with considerable skill and humour. The other figures, however, are mere pasteboard; the South African War scenes are irrelevant, and Captain Norgate an excrescence that should have been ruthlessly cut out. So should the preposterous and farcical child, Tiny. The language employed is that of the half-educated school-girl, who believes "appreciate" to be a synonym of "admire." Some of the sentences are funny in their badness; for example: "His beard was darker than his hair, but there was a subtle air of hardly disguised pride about him which prevented young people from being quite at ease in his presence."

The persons of Mr. Herbert Wales's "Cynthia in the Wilderness" (Long, 6s.) have a curious code of morals. That a woman whose husband is unfaithful should consider herself free to follow his example is a defensible theory; but the woman who acts upon it, and accepts her husband's standard, has lost the right to despise him; and when she suffers her lover to visit her under her husband's roof, she descends to a level considerably lower than his. Mr. Wales's animosity towards the worthless (and admirably drawn) husband seems to have blinded him to certain inexorable laws of common honesty. Even a worm should be treated decently—not for the worm's sake so much as for our own. None of the characters in the book, however, entertain this view; and one of them murders the unhappy husband with as little remorse as though he were a black beetle.

"The Black Butterfly," by W. A. Mackenzie (Ward & Lock, 6s.), is an ingenious and successful blend of the fairy tale and the detective story. English police-officers appear in it, and princes from the regions of Ruritania, also foreign spies, a French maid, a Chinese magician able to make beautiful women out of lumps of clay, and a beautiful woman, so fashioned, whose life depends upon the lives of certain butterflies linked together in a fluttering chain around her slender neck. So skilful is the brew that few readers will stop to ask how the magician's creation came to resemble precisely a baroness who had just been murdered. Yet that likeness is the basis of the whole fantastic erection. Mr. Mackenzie's invention is quite equal to an adequate explanation, and he should have provided us with one.

Everyone interested in the Revival of Country Life and the Land Club System should read

MOTHER EARTH

By MONTAGUE FORDHAM. PRICE 5s. NET.

With a Preface by J. A. HOBSON.

Press Opinions: General.

The Morning Leader.—A book so temperate and sane that all thoughtful people should read it.

The Globe says: Students will find much sense and ability in this short practical treatise.

The Church Times says: His book should be read by all who are concerned with the problem. It has the advantage of being a real book, written with a style.

The Yorkshire Observer says this book should be studied by land reformers of all shades of opinion.

The Outlook.—"Mother Earth" has a flavour about it, which makes the reader linger over its pages.

The Manchester Guardian.—This beautifully printed essay has, as Mr. Hobson says, the conspicuous method of outlining a "large, bold, comprehensive and genuinely organic reform."

The Inquirer.—It is one of the most strikingly original and startlingly wise volumes I have read for many a day. It is full of pregnant sayings, which breathe the very spirit of an equal justice.

The Field, while disapproving in part, points out that there are sections of the work, notably that dealing with education in rural schools, which are well worthy of notice.

The Land Club Movement.

Sir Edward Strachey, in the House of Commons, said of land clubs: We shall watch their development with interest.

The Queen says: The most far-reaching and important instrument in the author's constructive programme is the Land Club.

The Daily News says: The movement is so full of promise, because it has sprung voluntarily from the country people themselves. It is one of the very few efforts in modern rural England that can be called truly democratic. Homes and land—that is the talisman that has called these clubs into being.

The Labour Leader writes: The heart of the enterprise, the vital organ of the whole, is the Village Land Club. Mr. Fordham's constructive scheme is comprehensive, ingenious, and well worked out. His ideal is admirable, and its methods are practical.

The Book and the Author.

The Cambridge Chronicle says: The book indeed seems characteristic of its author, who appears to have an equal sympathy with the poetic and practical sides of life, a combination of great importance in dealing with practical matters.

SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & CO., LTD., LONDON.

TWO IMPORTANT BOOKS JUST PUBLISHED.

MODERNISM

A Record and Review.

By the Rev. A. LESLIE LILLEY, M.A.,

Vicar of St. Mary's, Paddington.

With Epistle Dedicatory to the Rev. Father G. TYRRELL.

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

DURING the few years in which the Modernist movement has been in progress Mr. Lilley has carefully watched its various phases, and reported on them in The Guardian, the Commonwealth, and other journals and periodicals. Moreover, he has been in close personal touch with prominent Modernists, and is therefore in a position to present a trustworthy version of the facts.

NEW ZEALAND REVISITED

In demy 8vo, cloth gilt,
gilt top,
12s. 6d. net.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE DAYS OF MY YOUTH

By

The Right Hon. Sir JOHN
ELDON GORST.

What lends particular interest to this book is the contrast between the New Zealand of the early sixties and that of a year ago when Sir John again visited this colony.

With sixteen illustrations.

LONDON: SIR ISAAC PITMAN & SONS, LTD., No. 1, Amen Corner, E.C.

Published February 19th.

15/- Net.

A GREAT LABOUR LEADER.

Life of Right Hon. Thomas Burt, M.P.

By AARON WATSON.

"The finest gentleman I ever knew was a working miner in England, whose gentleness, absolute fairness, instinctive horror of anything underhand or mean, or anything that was not the strictest fair-play, gave him a character that enabled him to rise to the position of Privy Councillor."—Earl Grey, Governor-General of Canada.

JUST PUBLISHED.

5s. net.

GOING THROUGH THE MILL.

By Mrs. GERALD PAGET.

"This is the story of a lady of the world, well connected and with much intelligence and readiness of speech, who was 'bankrupt in soul and circumstance when the fame of the Great Teacher reached me.' . . . There is much humour in the book; there are also varied types of character and life; while a genial mood pervades its seriousness and commends it to the reader."—Times.

NEW FICTION.

6s.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF WISDOM.

By FRANCES J. ARMOUR.

"A strongly conceived story of the occult, partly in England, partly in scenes—visited by astral bodies—in India."—Times.

JUST OUT.

2s. 6d. net.

AUCTION BRIDGE.

By VANE PENNELL.

A book dealing with this new variation of Bridge which is so rapidly superseding the original form of the game at all the chief London clubs is one of the necessities of the hour. Mr. Pennell's book gives a complete exposition of the principles of Auction Bridge, with the rules both as usually played and also with the chief variations. It should prove invaluable to all who are seeking a guide to this fascinating game.

Mr. Lacon Watson's two amusing books, BENEDICTINE and REFLECTIONS OF A HOUSEHOLDER, are now ready in new and cheaper form, paper boards with coloured cover design, at 1s net each.

BROWN, LANGHAM, and CO., LTD.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

IN "No. 10, Downing Street, Whitehall: Its History and Associations" (Duckworth, 21s. net), Mr. Charles Eyre Pascoe shows himself happier in his choice of a subject than in his treatment of it. The book contains a great deal of irrelevant matter, and Mr. Pascoe's style, while sometimes sober and even dignified, occasionally assumes a vein of egotistic moralising which is quite unsuited to the subject. Downing Street, as well as Downing College, Cambridge, takes its name from a certain Sir George Downing, who has been described as "a doubly perjured traitor, but a most capable official." He was born in America, and graduated at Harvard, but came to England in the middle of the seventh century. He took service under Cromwell, and became ambassador to the Netherlands. On Cromwell's death he passed over to the service of Charles II., and rose to be Secretary to the Treasury Lords, and was, among other rewards, granted certain lands "with power to build thereon, but not to build further westward towards His Majesty's Park of St. James's, than the westernmost part of where His Majesty's house called the Cockpit is now built." Mr. Pascoe traces the history of No. 10, Downing Street down to 1735, when Sir Robert Walpole, who having previously refused to take the house as a gift from George II., accepted it for his office of First Lord of the Treasury. Since that date it has remained the official residence of the Prime Minister, and it has been the ambition of nearly every English statesman to live in this house, in exterior so like an ordinary "respectable dwelling-house of eminently respectable Bloomsbury." In a concluding section called "Some Past Associations," Mr. Pascoe collects a number of anecdotes about such men as Walpole, the Pitts, Fox, Melbourne, Peel, Beaconsfield, and Gladstone. Among the illustrations are a number of plans and diagrams of the house, and also an excellent series of portraits of the Prime Ministers, from Sir Robert Walpole to Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

* * *

It is impossible to deal in a short space with the theory of art expounded in Professor Loewy's essay, "The Rendering of Nature in Greek Art," which Mr. John Fothergill has translated into English (Duckworth, 5s. net). The theory in its main outlines amounts to a statement that the early artists attempted to reproduce "memory pictures" of the different objects which they wished to picture. What Professor Loewy means by a "memory picture" can be best put in his own words. "We have seen numberless times a leaf, a wheel, an ear, an eye, an outstretched hand, and so on, from every point of view, but nevertheless so often as we thoughtlessly picture to ourselves a leaf, a wheel, &c., there appears in our mind only one image of each, and in the case of the objects named, the images will be those in which they show us their broadest aspect. . . . The aspect which is selected by the memory is that which shows the form with the property that differentiates it from other forms, makes it thereby most easily distinguishable, and presents it in the greatest possible clearness and completeness of its constituent parts." This theory is worked out with considerable ingenuity as an explanation of the stereotyped poses which run through nearly all primitive art. A number of illustrations help the reader to follow Professor Loewy's argument. Mr. Fothergill's task in translating the work was not easy, but he has performed it with marked success.

* * *

THE difficulties that beset the maker of an anthology are manifold, but probably when his work deals with living writers the most serious of them is the law of copyright. It is, we conclude, from this cause that Mr. Walter Jerrold's "The Book of Living Poets" (Alston Rivers, 7s. 6d. net) leaves, among others, Mr. Meredith, Mr. John Davidson, Mr. W. B. Yeats, Mr. Stephen Phillips, and "A. E." entirely unrepresented." Still, there are in the volume sixty-two poets to choose from, so that the reader has no serious ground for complaint, especially as among these are Mr. Swinburne, Mr. Hardy, Mr. Austin Dobson, Mr. Herbert Trench, Mr. Robert Bridges, Mr. Newbolt, Mrs. Shorter, Mr. Kipling, and Mr. Chesterton. In most cases Mr. Jerrold is happy in his selections, though some poets seem to have been given a disproportionate amount of space. The book, which is beautifully printed and bound, will be welcomed by those who care for poetry, but from want of time or some other reason are unable to keep pace with the crowd of slim volumes that appear with such persistent regularity.

* * *

THE dog, who is not, in the eyes of his master, endowed with some special qualities and capacities over and above those of his kind would be difficult to discover. But such is our inordinate vanity that we account for any special intelligence in a pet by the fact of his human environment, and we reason that the wilder creatures, not having had the inestimable benefit of our social usages, are necessarily incapable of showing individual traits. The latter is a thesis that is vigorously combated by the Rev. William J. Long in his "Whose Home is in the Wilderness" (Ginn & Co., 5s. net), the latest volume of a series of nature books by this well-known American naturalist and author. His purpose, briefly, is to prove, as the result of twenty-five years' personal experiment and observation, that wild animals of the same genus and species differ from each other in their degree of mental capacity, and that human intercourse, so far from being responsible for making them clever, tends to blunt their faculties and make them dull. The set of observations recorded in the chapter entitled "Wild Folk One by One" dispose one to accept this heretical but exceedingly common-sense view. At all events, the book is a strong encouragement to the student of animal nature to put aside what he has learnt from psychologists and scientists about several phenomena that are speciously ascribed to instinct and go forth to study the animal at home. The author endows his wild beasts with names as well as mental attributes, and the names inevitably recall the Jungle Books, but otherwise there is little that is not absolutely fresh and thoughtful. It is the book of a sportsman who prefers not to kill and of a scientist who is also something of a mystic. The illustrations by Mr. Charles Copeland are sympathetic and profuse.

* * *

MESSRS. MACMILLAN have issued a useful handbook of geography, "The International Geography" (15s.), written by no fewer than seventy different authors under the general editorship of Dr. H. R. Mill. Although the book runs to over a thousand pages it is a marvel of skilful compression and the number of facts given is enormous. The contributors are all specialists, who speak with authority about the countries allotted to them. There is a good index, and short but useful bibliographies are added to each chapter. The plan of issuing a geography, written on lines similar to such works as "The Cambridge Modern History," was a good one, and it has been well carried out.

* * *

MR. ELIOT STOCK has issued a reprint of "A Brief Discourse of the Troubles at Frankfort, 1554-1558" (5s. net), as the first volume in a new series called "A Christian Library," under the general editorship of Professor Arber. The book, which is attributed to William Whittingham, Dean of Durham, throws considerable light on the early history of English Nonconformity and on the history of the English Prayer-book. Frankfort was, in the sixteenth century, a home of refuge for fugitive Protestants from every European country, and the English exiles who fled there carried with them their theological differences, which gave rise to the "troubles" related in the book. Professor Arber contributes an introduction, and also reprints the anonymous "Life of Whittingham" which Mrs. Everett Green edited for the sixth volume of the Camden Society's Miscellany in 1871.

* * *

AMONG recent new editions are a re-issue of Dom Gasquet's "The Black Death" (Bell, 6s. net), containing a short preface in which the author compares the fourteenth century epidemic with the present bubonic plague in India, and accepts the theory that it was disseminated through the agency of rat fleas; a second edition of Mr. A. C. Benson's "The Schoolmaster" (Murray, 2s. 6d. net); and a further instalment of ten volumes in "The People's Library" (Casell, 1s. net each), comprising Borrow's "Bible in Spain," De Quincey's "Opium Eater," Mrs. Gaskell's "Cranford," and novels by Thackeray, Jane Austen, George Eliot, Lytton, Ainsworth, and Fennimore Cooper.

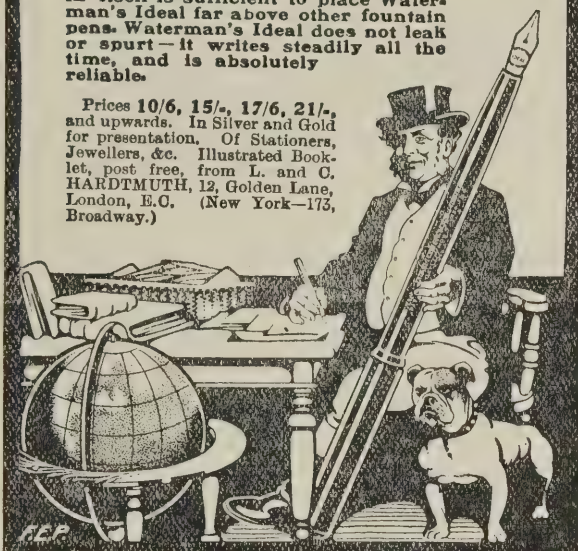

Waterman's Ideal Fountain Pen

Incomparably Best!

The position Waterman's Ideal has gained in the esteem of the writing public is that position which is gained by any article which stands as a standard of its type—a commanding lead through sheer merit.

The Waterman Patent Spoon-Feed in itself is sufficient to place Waterman's Ideal far above other fountain pens. Waterman's Ideal does not leak or spurt—it writes steadily all the time, and is absolutely reliable.

Prices 10/6, 15/., 17/6, 21/., and upwards. In Silver and Gold for presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c. Illustrated Booklet, post free, from L. and C. HARDTMUTH, 12, Golden Lane, London, E.C. (New York—173, Broadway.)

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."
SHORT STORIES,
BOOK REVIEWS,
LITERARY ARTICLES,
PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,
SURVEY OF THE WEEK,
BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTOGRAPHY.
NATURE AND SCIENCE,
Etc., Etc.
(One Penny Weekly.)

JUST PUBLISHED.

A LIFTED VEIL 6s.

A NEW NOVEL BY
J. G. STEVENSON.

Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards, with four illustrations on art paper.

This remarkable novel is largely a study of the relations between Church and Dissent in a country district of England. Apart from the attractiveness of its narrative, no one interested in the Education Question can afford to overlook it.

JAMES CLARKE & Co., 13 & 14, Fleet St., London, E.C.

ELKIN MATHEWS' NEW LIST

THIRD EDITION IN THE PRESS.

POEMS by MARY E. COLERIDGE ("Anodos")
Edited by Henry Newbolt. Pott 8vo., 4s 6d net.

MEMORIES AND MUSIC: Letters to a Fair Unknown. By AN ANONYMOUS WRITER. Fcap 8vo., 3s. 6d. net. [Just out.

"The work is delightfully written, and holds the mirror to a hundred attractive and arresting moods of a man of uncommon feeling and depth. The writer is a genuine musician—an enthusiast of sound knowledge . . . and he puts to himself the task of revealing his most intimate impressions of a season of Covent Garden opera."—Standard.

"A delightful book, which ought to be in the hands of Covent Garden habitués."—Stage.

THYRSIS AND FAUSTA, and other Plays and Poems. By ROSALIND TRAVERS. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net. [Just out.

"All are distinguished by the austere exaltation of feeling and stateliness of diction which attracted the attention of the critics some two years ago when their author's first book appeared."—Scotsman.

A LOVE IN ANCIENT DAYS.

By TRUDA H. CROSFIELD. With 8 Illustrations by W. B. WOLLEN, R.I. Crown 8vo., 6s.

A romantic Tale of the Sixth Century concerning the struggle between Celts and Saxons in the South of England.

"This story of the love of a Romano-British girl for Cerdic, one of the pirate invaders, is of deep interest in itself. For the creation and delineation of striking characters, for the manner in which the plot is evolved, for the grip of incident, this book is highly to be commended . . . and as to that colouring, that atmosphere, of which we have spoken, it is all harmonious as if done by one having confidence and a clear imagination."—Liverpool Courier.

"A careful study of the period."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE HEIR'S COMEDY. By ARTHUR DILLON. Royal 16mo., 3s. 6d. net. [Just out.

"The subject is here treated in scenes now of gay and dignified prose, now of sweet blank verse made freshly in the Elizabethan spirit, all of which are animated by a pleasant spirit of high comedy and wrought with much artistic accomplishment."—Scotsman.

THE DAYS OF A YEAR. By M. D. ASHLEY DODD. Royal 16mo., 2s. 6d. net.

"A friend of mine has sent me a New Year's Gift in the shape of this charming little book. . . . It consists of a Nature lover's Notes on each day of the year—quite short Notes, but written in most delightful language such as only a real Artist, in colour and in words, could employ."—Schoolmistress.

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, Vigo Street, W.

Our Land

Edited by

George Radford, M.A.

¶ The first, the February Number of "Our Land," is now ready at all Bookstalls, price 3d. net.

¶ "Our Land" is a monthly journal devoted to the interests of Agriculture and Land in Britain. The central feature will be Co-operation, but Land Tenure, Housing, Taxation, Railway Freights and Local Traction, Sanitation, Purity of Food, Education, and other subjects will be discussed.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 3d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation, the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

PROFESSOR VON SCHUBERT is already well known in the theological world as the author of an admirable work on the History of the Ancient Church. His "Outlines of Church History" (Williams & Norgate, 10s. 6d. net.) is a translation of the very interesting series of lectures on church history which he delivered a few years ago at the University of Kiel. It is intended to give the reader a general outline of the development of ecclesiastical history from the origins of Christianity up to the present time. In order to make the work complete in all respects, a supplementary chapter has been added by Miss Alice Gardner, of Newnham College, Cambridge, on Religious Thought and Life in England during the Nineteenth Century. In the variegated web of church history, with its multitudinous and complicated threads, nothing is more acceptable to the student, or even to the expert, than to have the essential facts placed before him in a clear and concise summary. Professor Schubert has performed this task with a masterly hand. It is no exaggeration to say that this compendium of church history is immeasurably ahead of any other in the English language. It is indispensable to all who wish to make themselves acquainted with the most recent results of historical inquiry into the origin and growth of the church, and the influence this great institution has exercised on the development of Western civilisation. Professor Schubert helps us to understand the part played by the church in moulding the destinies of the West. His volume is a worthy addition to the Theological Translation Library, of which it forms the twenty-fourth volume.

The Week in the City.

PERHAPS the two most interesting financial events of the week are the resignation of Freiherr von Stengel and the banking crisis in Copenhagen. The former is suspended until a successor can be found; but the ugly fact is that the most skilful financier in Germany is unable to find means acceptable to the Reichstag of making up a huge deficit that is variously estimated at from ten to sixteen millions sterling. The best financial writers in Germany agree that the situation is perilous and humiliating, and it looks as if German credit will fall still further before the year is out. Well-informed City men say that the difficulties in Copenhagen and other towns within the Hamburg sphere of influence are by no means over. Danish and Swedish enterprises have been largely financed with German money; and now, owing to the monetary strain and banking difficulties of her own, Germany has had to call in her loans. It will be interesting to see how affairs progress. Obviously the plan of calling in the State to guarantee weak banks is not a very satisfactory one. In other respects the week has been rather uneventful. There has been less speculation and less investment business on the London Stock Exchange than was expected. Hopeful men were disappointed to find no change in the bank rate on Thursday. But a reduction cannot be expected so long as the revenue is being collected at the present rate. In a few weeks, when the funds are let loose, we may see a spell of really cheap money, especially if the gold begins to return from America.

DIAMOND SHARES.

A good deal of nervousness is felt about diamond shares. In the first place, the market has for a long time been very artificial, and therefore wanting in permanence. It is hardly likely that De Beers could go on for ever monopolising the supply, and so restricting it as to keep prices up at a ridiculously fancy level. The present slump is generally attributed to the sudden cessation of the American demand, and to the heavy sales of secondhand jewellery by embarrassed millionaires in New York. But another cause is no doubt the French chemical discoveries, which go to show that real diamonds absolutely indistinguishable from the natural ones can be manufactured. According to a correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph," the great diamond cutting industry of Amsterdam is almost at a standstill, some 5,000 artificers being out of work.

MORE BANK FAILURES.

This week has shown that the strain on banking institutions is by no means at an end. England and France seem to be almost the only countries where banks have not been caught in the collapse of the speculative boom. "Over-loaned" has been written over the doors of many credit institutions in Europe and America. I hear that the painful process of weeding out is not yet over in New York, and that several more weak banks and trust companies will have to go. One of the largest suspensions in America was the Sovereign Bank of Canada, which had seventy-six branches. The immediate cause of suspension, says "The Financier" of New York, was the refusal of Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan, acting for himself and the Dresdner Bank, to make any further advances. "The sum of 500,000 dol. would have enabled the bank to continue. The present debt of the Sovereign Bank to the Morgan Interests is 2,241,000 dol. The indebtedness has been steadily growing since the reorganisation, when the loans scattered among the banks of Europe amounted to over 3,300,000 dol. As these fell due Mr. Morgan advanced the money for their payment, until he was a creditor for over 2,000,000 dol." The Danish crisis, which came to a head last week in Copenhagen, is attributed, like the Dutch crisis of last autumn, to speculation. I suspect that it may also be an echo of the Hamburg failures.

WALL STREET HUMOUR.

Although the Stock Exchanges everywhere are dull, and speculation out of fashion, the wits are as busy as ever, and perhaps more successful; for they have a larger crowd of idle fellows to amuse. Here is a recent specimen from the "Wall Street Journal":—

A rich and proud Bear walking down Wall Street was surprised to see a Bull actually occupying the sidewalk and manifesting no fear, nor stepping aside to let the Bear pass.

"What do you mean, you beggar, by getting in my way?" said the Bear angrily.

"I know very well," retorted the Bull, "that I have lost money and character by reason of my dissipations, but I have been taking the Gold Cure lately, and as soon as I regain confidence I'll give you a licking for your insolence."

The Bear pushed the Bull into the gutter, but in doing so slipped up on a piece of Easy Money.

Since this was written the gold cure and easy money have ceased to work, and American Railways have again declined. Probably an investment spread over a number of securities in this market would ultimately turn out very well. But the individual stock is risky, owing to the straits in which many of the railways are for money. The dearth of loanable capital is a disease which can only be cured by time and economy. According to New Yorkers, the business situation now lies between a rapid accumulation of reserve money in the international financial centres on the one hand, and severe industrial depression, with declining railroad earnings, on the other. These two conditions are closely related to each other. The accumulation of reserve money is largely the result of the industrial depression; but, on the other hand, it should work for the ultimate revival of trade and enterprise. Thus it is both a bear and a bull argument. Whether this revival will be early or late in arriving, depends, we are told, upon three contingencies: First, the Presidential campaign; second, the crops; and third, the attitude of the American people toward capital.

LUCELLUM.

ABOUT AN IDEAL.

There are many claimants for Fountain Pen favour, but there is no doubt the most popular Fountain Pen in the world is Waterman's Ideal, which enjoys an international reputation for excellence. The outstanding quality of Waterman's Ideal is its simplicity. People who know fountain pens as devices full of complicated patents only too likely to get out of order, are astonished at the simplicity of Waterman's Ideal, which cannot get out of order. The spoon feed supplies a direct flow to the nib from the reservoir, and regulates it so that the pen point never carries more ink than is needed by the writer. It does not leak, blot, or spurt, and an even ink-flow is invariably maintained. Apart from its perfection as a writer, with a Waterman's Ideal any writing man or woman can get an exact duplicate of the steel nib he or she most favours. As this iridium-tipped gold pen lasts very many years, this is an immense comfort in itself, as the pen point is always the same. It never needs breaking in like a steel pen, nor does it give out just as you have got used to it. The lowest price for a Waterman's Ideal is 10s. 6d., but there are many varieties, including handsomely mounted pens in silver and gold, and some which make choice ornaments for a lady's chatelaine. They form attractive presents, none the less valued because they are strictly practical and useful, forming permanent mementoes of the giver's thought.—[Advt.]

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST

allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

Nervous Disorders

A deficiency of the phosphates causes a lowering of nervous tone, indicated by exhaustion, restlessness, headache or insomnia.

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic)

supplies the nerve cells with health-giving life force, restores strength and induces restful sleep without the use of dangerous drugs.

An Ideal Tonic in Nervous Diseases

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

Rowntree's

ELECT COCOA

This cocoa will warm you.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

OPPOSITE THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

THACKERAY HOTEL

Great Russell Street, London.

NEAR THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

KINGSLEY HOTEL

Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.

Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout,
Bathrooms on every Floor,
Spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard
and Smoking Rooms. Heated throughout.

Fireproof Floors, Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.

BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.

Inclusive Charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, from 8/6 to 10/6 per day.

FULL TARIFF AND TESTIMONIALS ON APPLICATION.

Telegraphic Addresses { Thackeray Hotel—"Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel—"Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

Our Offer THE S.S. WORKER'S BIBLE

6/- for 3/6

Containing a selection of the best Aids to Bible Study, most suitable for a Young Teacher or Elder Scholar. Good, clear type, portable size. Size, 5½ by 4½ by 1½ inches, with references, concordance, atlas, illustrations of antiquities, etc. Handsomely bound in limp Morocco, overlapping edges, round corners, red under gold edges, elastic band, each Bible in box. This Bible can be had with new thumb index on edge, at 1s. extra.

Postage 4d. THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
Abroad 8d. 53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.[And at READING.]
MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE.

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

406 pages, 8vo, cloth, 2s. post free.

HEAVEN AND HELL:

Things Heard and Seen.

By EMANUEL SWEDENBORG.

JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER wrote:—"There is one grand and beautiful idea underlying all Swedenborg's revelations or speculations about the future life. His remarkably suggestive books are becoming familiar to the reading and reflecting portion of the community."

LONDON: SWEDENBORG SOCIETY, 1, Bloomsbury St.

JUST PUBLISHED. Demy 8vo, 536 + xxiv. pp. 10s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.By James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., D.Litt.

(Late Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.)

The Contents include the following: The Rights and Limitations of the Intellect; The Moral Nature and Revelation; The Religious Element in Man; The Bible; The Church; Primary Conceptions of God; The Doctrine of the Trinity; Agency and Attributes of God; Doctrine of Man; Reconciliation; The Person of Christ; The Work of Christ; Means of Grace; Rise and Progress of Religion in the Individual.

PHILIP GREEN, 5, Essex Street, Strand, W.C.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc. 30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.

Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye. Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR-YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL.

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM-ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell. Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the post of HEAD MISTRESS of the Chelsea Secondary School for Girls, Hortensia Road, Chelsea, in which will be incorporated the Secondary Girls' School of the South-Western Polytechnic. The school will open in September, 1908, when there will probably be over 300 girls.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £400 a year, and will rise by annual increments of £20 to a maximum of £600 a year.

Applications should be made on the official form, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, L.C.C. Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C., to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, March 16th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

If a written application is made for a form, it must be marked outside "Application for form for appointment, Head Mistress, Secondary School," and must be accompanied by a stamped and addressed envelope.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's services are given in the "London County Council Gazette," which is published weekly, and can be obtained from the Council's Publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a prepaid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.
February 5th, 1908.

COUNTY OF LONDON.

The London County Council invites applications for the following post:—

MISTRESS OF METHOD at the Clapham Day Training College for women to commence work at Easter, 1908, or as soon as possible after.

The salary attaching to the post will commence at £180 a year and rise, subject to satisfactory service, by annual increments of £10 to a maximum of £250 a year.

Applications should be made on Form T.S. 56, to be obtained, together with particulars of the appointment, from the Clerk of the Council, London County Council Education Offices, Victoria Embankment, W.C. to whom they must be returned not later than 11 a.m. on Monday, March 9th, 1908, accompanied by copies of three testimonials of recent date.

All communications on the subject must be endorsed "Mistress of Method," and a stamped addressed envelope must be enclosed.

Canvassing, either directly or indirectly, will be held to be a disqualification for employment.

Full particulars of appointments in the Council's service are given in the "London County Council Gazette," which is published weekly and can be obtained from the Council's publishers, Messrs. P. S. King & Son, 2 and 4, Great Smith Street, Westminster, S.W., price (including postage) 1½d. an issue, or, for the year, a pre-paid subscription of 6s. 6d.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the London County Council.

Education Offices,
Victoria Embankment, W.C.,
February 13th, 1908.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.

THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors.
Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.

Telegrams: "TRIFORM, LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.

SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.

BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.

Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

LEIGHTON PARK SCHOOL (Near Reading).

Under the Management of the Society of Friends.

Boys from this PUBLIC SCHOOL have done well at the Universities and in business careers.

The School stands in its own grounds of about 45 acres, high above the town and the Thames Valley.

For Honours List, Prospectus, particulars of Scholarships, and other information, apply to the Head Master, JOHN RIDGES, M.A., at the School.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been Opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.
(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters," Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Scale of Charges for Advertisements.

	FULL PAGE.	½ PAGE.	¼ PAGE.	Narrow Column.
Back Page, or Page facing matter ... }	£10 0 0	£5 10 0	£3 0 0	£3 10 0
Other Pages ...	8 0 0	4 10 0	2 10 0	3 0 0

Hotels, Hydros, and Educational:

13 Insertions ...	8d. per line.
52 ,, ...	6d. ,,

MESSRS. METHUEN'S NEW BOOKS

In Twelve Volumes.

THE WORKS OF OSCAR WILDE. Messrs. METHUEN have much pleasure in announcing that they have commenced the publication, in 12 Volumes, of a uniform edition of the works of OSCAR WILDE. The books are reprinted from the latest editions issued under the superintendence of the author, and in many cases they contain his last corrections. They are published by the authority of his literary executor. "THE DUCHESS OF PADUA" is a new Play, and the other books have been out of print for some years, and are now practically unobtainable.

The edition is limited to 1,000 copies for Great Britain and America, and is printed on hand-made paper, demy 8vo. The price of each volume is 12s. 6d. net. There is also an edition, limited to 80 copies for Great Britain and America, on Japanese vellum, 42s. net. each volume. The first six Books are :—

THE DUCHESS OF PADUA. A long play hitherto unpublished.

SALOME, AND OTHER PLAYS. This volume includes a lately discovered play, "A FLORENTINE TRAGEDY," and "VERA," an early work. "SALOME" is in the original French.

THE LIFE OF NAPOLEON BONAPARTE. By S. BARING-GOULD. With over 150 Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece, royal 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

This is an Abridged and Cheaper Edition of the magnificent "Life of Napoleon" issued several years ago.

"Taken as a whole, we do not hesitate to say that this combined product of narrative writing and art will give the English reader a clearer and more complete idea of the complicated and colossal personality of Napoleon than it is possible to gather from any other work of equal extent."—St. James's Budget.

ON NOTHING AND KINDRED SUBJECTS. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.P. Fcap. 8vo, 5s.

The Essays in this book are concerned with Nothing, and though it is impossible that they should exhaust such a subject, they consider many of its aspects, especially as they are to be discovered in travel and in the observation of men. They deal with the Loss of Youth, of Manuscripts, with Death, with the Sufferings of the Rich, the Love of Dogs, Winged Horses, Fools, Politicians, and the Art of coming to an End.

FLOWER O' THE ORANGE, and other Tales. By AGNES and EGERTON CASTLE, Authors of "Incomparable Bellairs," "Rose of the World," &c. With a Frontispiece in Colour by A. H. BUCKLAND. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE BAD TIMES. By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM. Crown 8vo, 6s.

EARLY WOODCUT INITIALS. Containing over 1,300 Reproductions of Pictorial Letters of the Fifteenth and Sixteenth Centuries. By OSCAR JENNINGS, M.D., Member of the Bibliographical Society. Demy 4to, 21s. net.

The first serious attempt that has been made to reproduce the ornamental initial letters with which the best printers of Germany, Italy, Switzerland, France, and Spain beautified their books.

THE COMPLETE MOUNTAINEER. By G. D. ABRAHAM. With over 70 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

"The title of this book is no exaggeration. To climbers of all kinds and conditions it will be all but indispensable."—Morning Leader.

A SWAN AND HER FRIENDS. By E. V. LUCAS. With 24 Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A narrative of literary Lichfield in the great days of Anna Seward.

A PRINCESS OF THE OLD WORLD. By ELEANOR C. PRICE. With 21 Illustrations, 12s. 6d. net.

This volume deals with the life and surroundings of Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans, known as La Grande Mademoiselle. "Altogether a brilliant volume, which must not be missed by students of French history."—Daily Telegraph.

THE QUEEN OF LETTER WRITERS. By JANET ALDIS. With 20 Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

A Life of Madame de Sévigné, abounding in vivid interest. "A most readable book; as fascinating as an old romance."—Liverpool Courier.

REGNUM DEI. By A. ROBERTSON, D.D., Lord Bishop of Exeter. The Bampton Lectures of 1901. A New and Cheaper Issue. Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

RICHARD KENNOWAY AND HIS FRIENDS. By KATHARINE STEUART. A Sequel to "By Allan Water." Demy 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

FLORENCE AND NORTHERN TUSCANY. By EDWARD HUTTON, Author of "The Cities of Umbria." With 32 Illustrations, of which 16 are in Colour, by WILLIAM PARKINSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

GEORGE MEREDITH: NOVELIST, POET, REFORMER. By M. STURGE HENDERSON. With a Portrait, crown 8vo, 6s. [Second Edition in the Press.]

A careful study of Meredith's work as novelist, poet, critic, and essayist.

"A fine and stimulating book for those who love the great man."—Manchester Guardian.

"Of all Mr. Meredith's expositors, none has been more admirably dispassionate and earnest and large-minded than Mrs. Sturge Henderson."—Daily Mail.

THE CRIMES OF BRINVILLIERS AND OTHERS. By ALEXANDRE DUMAS. Illustrated, crown 8vo, 6s.

THE GENTLEST ART. An Anthology of Entertaining Letters. By E. V. LUCAS. Fcap 8vo, 6s.

"The 'Gentlest Art' is, of course, the art of letter-writing. Mr. Lucas is himself an expert in this branch of letters, and he has the true spirit of the anthologist, a good eye for colour, a delicate palate for taste, a good nose for perfume, and, above all, a keen sense of quiet humour. A charming, graceful book."—Daily Telegraph.

LADY WINDERMERE'S FAN.

A WOMAN OF NO IMPORTANCE.

AN IDEAL HUSBAND.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BEING EARNEST.

INSTRUCTION IN COOKERY. By Miss A. P. THOMPSON, Instructress to the London County Council. With 10 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. [Text-books of Technology].

RICHES AND POVERTY. By L. G. CHIOZZA MONEY, M.P. Fourth and Cheaper Edition. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.

This is a popular edition of a book which, though published two and a half years ago, has had remarkable success and a considerable influence. Requests for its publication in a cheap form have come from many quarters, and it is in answer to these that the publishers are issuing this edition.

FICTION.

THE LADY OF THE BARGE. By W. W. JACOBS. A New Edition. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

This volume, uniform with Mr. Jacobs' other famous books, has been transferred to Messrs. Methuen.

MAN AND THE CASSOCK. By Mrs. DAVIE G. RITCHIE, Author of "The Truthful Liar." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"This novel is a striking achievement . . . impossible to skip a single page of a singularly engrossing book. It is not long, yet there is more wit than is to be found in twenty. Mrs. Ritchie is extraordinarily sensitive to the lighter side of the human comedy."—Spectator.

"The finish shown on every page lifts it out of the ruck of fiction. The author shows that she can paint with a sombre brush as well as touch off the comedy of things."—Nation.

"This is a novel of curious brilliance and distinction. It stands head and shoulders over the ordinary fiction of our time, and is the product of genuine thought and inspiration."—Standard.

THE SCOURGE. By WARRINGTON DAWSON. Author of "The Scar." Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The story is largely and finely conceived."—Times. "Mr. Dawson shows us a picture of Virginian life which for breadth of composition, finished detail, and firm, delicate workmanship, could hardly be bettered. The handling is fresh and masterly. This is a well-written, uncommon, and even distinguished novel."—Morning Leader.

A SHEAF OF CORN, By MARY E. MANN, Author of "The Sheep and the Goats." Crown 8vo, 6s.

Stories of town and country, of grave and gay, of rich and poor, of natural and supernatural.

"The art of them is well-nigh flawless. Each one secures its full effect; they begin with sufficient clearness and interest, they end with the most finished suggestiveness."—Morning Leader.

"They are dramas in miniature."—Scotsman.

"Mrs. Mann has the art intimately and sincerely to write of the life of the very poor without alienating sympathy."—Manchester Guardian.

THE MAGISTRATE'S OWN CASE. By Baron ROSENKRANTZ. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"A study in criminal investigation of considerable originality and constructive skill."—Times.

"The plot is full of ingenious surprises, and the book is altogether likely to be popular."—Daily News.

THE YOUNG COLUMBINE. By DOROTHEA DEAKIN. With a Frontispiece by LEWIS BAUMER. Crown 8vo, 6s.

A POPPY SHOW. A Volume of Stories. By H. B. MARRIOTT WATSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

COLONEL KATE. By K. L. MONTGOMERY. Author of "The Cardinal's Pawn." Crown 8vo, 6s.

METHUEN & CO., 36, Essex Street, London, W.C.

The Nation

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1908.

MACMILLAN & CO.'S NEW BOOKS.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

Rambling Recollections.

BY

SIR HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, G.C.B.,
G.C.M.G.

With Photogravure and other Illustrations. Two Vols. 8vo, 30s. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"Sir Henry has returned from his travels laden with good stories, gathered in every part of the civilised and uncivilised world. . . . It is really impossible to do justice to the variety and ubiquity of these yarns. One is almost bound to suspect—it is a terrible accusation—that Sir Henry has kept a note-book. There is scarcely any side of life that he does not touch."

Westminster Gazette.—"An exceedingly readable record of the recollections of one who has had the good fortune to be 'in the swim' for more years than most of his contemporaries. It is full of good stories."

Truth.—"Sir Henry Drummond Wolff's 'Rambling Recollections' are of the most varied and vivid interest."

Guardian.—"Into the further details of Sir Drummond Wolff's varied career we need not go. They are for the most part intertwined with the politics of this generation, and include some of their most stirring phases. But to be studied to any advantage they must be read at length, and this our readers would be well advised to do, for they will find much to reward them."

Punch.—"A shrewd observer, a delightful raconteur, endowed with the gift of retentive memory, Sir Henry's 'Rambling Recollections' rank among the most interesting books of the still young year."

Times.—"Few people have lived a more varied life than this veteran diplomatist, politician, and traveller; few have been in contact with so many people of mark, so many diverse interests, or, to employ a vulgar phrase that exactly expresses the situation, have had a finger in so many pies. . . . At every turn the Recollections bring us into contact with people and things that must interest all who care for character and political history. . . . The book, as we have said, well deserves to be read, and it is certain to interest a large public."

Pall Mall Gazette.—"Full of good things about all the prominent people in Europe during the past sixty years."

Globe.—"This book is one of the most delightful and entertaining reminiscences that have been published for a long time, and Sir Henry has done well to give to a wider public the stories of wit and knowledge which have hitherto been confined to a more limited circle."

THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON.

Annotated by ALFRED, Lord TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, Lord TENNYSON.

In 9 vols. Globe 8vo. Vol. I. Poems. Vol. II. Poems. Vol. III. Enoch Arden & In Memoriam. [Tuesday.]
Globe 8vo, 4s. net each.

THE POCKET KIPLING.

Scarlet limp leather, 5s. net per vol.

From Sea to Sea.—Vol. I.

THE THRESHOLD OF MUSIC.

An Inquiry into the Development of the Musical sense.
By WILLIAM WALLACE. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

IS MARS HABITABLE?

A Critical Examination of PROFESSOR PERCIVAL LOWELL'S BOOK, "MARS AND ITS CANALS," with an Alternative Explanation. By ALFRED RUSSEL WALLACE, F.R.S. Extra Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

A HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH SINCE THE REFORMATION.

By S. CHERTHAM, D.D., Archdeacon and Canon of Rochester. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

CANON HENSLEY HENSON'S NEW BOOK.

THE NATIONAL CHURCH.

Essays on its History and Constitution, and Criticisms of its Present Administration. By H. HENSLEY HENSON, B.D., Hon. D.D. Glasgow; Canon of Westminster. With an Introduction by the Rev. J. LLEWELYN DAVIES, D.D. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SIXTY YEARS OF PROTECTION IN CANADA, 1846-1907.

Where Industry Leans on the Politician. By EDWARD PORRITT. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

Tribune.—"Mr. Edward Porritt's complete, detailed, and most instructive history of 'Protection in Canada.'"

PUTNAM WEALE'S NEW BOOK.

THE COMING STRUGGLE IN EASTERN ASIA.

By B. L. PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "Manchu and Muscovite," "The Re-Shaping of the Far East," "The Truce in the East." With numerous Illustrations and Maps. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

The Times.—"Mr. Weale's new book is a storehouse of fresh knowledge about the later developments in the Far East, and no student of Asiatic affairs can afford to ignore it."

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT.

By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. 8vo, 10s. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"Mr. Hall has placed us newly in his debt by giving us a further work of remarkable freshness and great literary charm, one which most sympathetic readers will find, as we have said, really fascinating."

THIRD AND CONCLUDING PART.

THE DYNASTS.

A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars. By THOMAS HARDY. Part III. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

 Previously published—Parts I. and II. 4s. 6d. net each.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Volume.

JAMES THOMSON.

By G. C. MACAULAY. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Volume.

APHORISMS & REFLECTIONS FROM THE WORKS OF HUXLEY

Selected by HENRIETTA A. HUXLEY. Pott. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. Also cloth elegant, 2s. 6d. net; limp leather, 3s. 6d. net.

A NEW VOLUME OF ESSAYS.

CONFESSIO MEDICI.

By the Writer of "The Young People." Extra Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

Daily Telegraph.—"This thoughtful, cultivated, and delicately written study."

MACMILLAN & CO, LTD., LONDON.

No. 3. NOW READY. 1/- Net.

The International

A Review of the World's Progress.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS.

THE EXTENT OF BRITISH UNEMPLOYMENT. By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P.

THE BELGIAN PARLIAMENT AND CONGO ANNEXATION. By Emile Van der Velde.

THE CONFLICT OF WHITE AND NEGRO RACES. By L. Haden Guest.

CHURCH AND STATE IN FRANCE: The First Year of Separation. By Abbé Paul Naudet.

PROSPECTS OF THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION. By George Khronstaleff.

THE FUTURE OF SOCIOLOGY. A Discussion by Leading Sociologists of Europe and America.

THE POSSIBILITIES OF SOCIOLOGY. By The Editor.

Correspondents' Reports from all parts of the World on important Progressive Movements.

NOTE.—A Specimen Copy of No. 1 of the "International" will be sent free to any reader of the "Nation" on receipt of 3d. to cover postage.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1 Adelphi Terrace, London.

A Reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X.

THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM. Translated from the Italian. With an Introduction by the Rev. A. L. LILLEY, M.A. 5s. net.

This work is the fullest statement of the Modernists' position and aims that has yet appeared, and as such is a document of the utmost importance for the understanding of the new movement.

CRIMINAL APPEAL AND EVIDENCE. By N. W. SIBLEY, B.A., LL.M., Joint Author of "International Law as Interpreted during the Russo-Japanese War." 15s. net.

HISTORY OF CIVILISATION.

By CHARLES SEIGNOBOS. 5s. net each.

Vol. I. HISTORY OF ANCIENT CIVILISATION.

Vol. II. HISTORY OF MEDIÆVAL CIVILISATION.

A concise review of the development of European civilisation since the downfall of the Roman Empire.

MY LIFE IN THE OPEN.

By WILL. H. OGILVIE, Author of "Fair Girls and Grey Horses," with an Introduction and Portrait. 5s. net. Vivid Pictures of open-air life in many parts of the world.

ARTIST SONGS.

By E. RICHARDSON, LL.A., Author of "Songs of Near and Far Away." Illustrated. Fcap 8vo. 3s. 6d. net.

NOTABLE 6s. NOVELS.

THE BLUE LAGOON.

By H. DE VERE STACPOOLE. (Second Impression.)

EVE'S APPLE.

By ALPHONSE COURLANDER.

The TERROR of the MACDURGHOTTS.

By C. E. PLAYNE.

FATHER ALPHONSUS.

By H. A. HINKSON.

LEGIONS OF THE DAWN.

By ALLAN REERTH.

T. FISHER UNWIN—LONDON.

THE DE LA MORE PRESS.

NIGHTS AT THE OPERA.

Edited by WAKELING DRY.

An analysis of the music, together with a running commentary on the dramatic element in the opera to which it is devoted 1s. net each.

1. Lohengrin.
2. Tannhäuser.
3. Tristan and Isolde.
4. Meistersinger.
5. Rheingold and Walkure.
6. Siegfried and Götterdämmerung } Ring des Nibelungen.
7. Bizet's Carmen.
8. Gounod's Faust.
9. Mozart's Don Giovanni.
10. Verdi's Il Trovatore.
11. Verdi's Rigoletto.
12. The Flying Dutchman.

French Music in the XIXth Century.

By ARTHUR HERVEY. Small crown 8vo, cloth.

5s. net.

THREE ESSAYS OF MEREJKOWSKI.

Translated from the Russian by G. A. MOUNSEY.

Fcap. 8vo, boards, 1s. 6d. net each.

The Life-Work of Hendrik Ibsen.

The Life-Work of Pliny the Younger.

The Life-Work of Montaigne.

Logic, Deductive and Inductive.

By CARVETH READ, M.A., Professor of Logic at University College Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Crown 8vo. 6s.

The Study of Plant Life.

By M. C. STOPES, D.Sc. London. Illustrated with Plates and numerous Diagrams. Designed Cover. Royal 8vo, cloth. 2s. 6d. net.

Latin Picture Stories.

For Original Latin Prose Composition. A Series of Twelve Cards, each containing 6 Illustrations with Short Sentences in Latin as Keys to the Story depicted. 1s. net per set.

Latin Grammar Rules.

With an Introduction by W. H. D. ROUSE, M.A., D.Litt., Head Master of the Perse School. Interleaved. In paper wrappers. 6d. net.

Hypnotism: Its History, Practice, and Theory.

By J. MILNE BRAMWELL, M.B., C.M. Demy 8vo, cloth. New Edition. 18s. net.

A Manual of Costume, as Illustrated by Monumental Brasses.

By HERBERT DRUITT. Profusely Illustrated. Demy 8vo, gilt top. 10s. 6d. net.

English Church Needlework.

By MAUD R. HALL. Illustrated. Crown 4to, cloth gilt. 10s. 6d.

The Heart of a Garden.

By Mrs. MARRIOTT WATSON. With numerous fine Illustrations. Royal 8vo. New Edition. 7s. 6d. net.

Etiquette for every day.

By Mrs. HUMPHREY ("Madge" of Truth). Designed Cover, fcap. 8vo, cloth. 1s. 6d. net.

FICTION.

DOYLE, SIR A. CONAN.

A DUET

3s. 6d.

NORRIS, FRANK.

THE OCTOPUS. Crown 8vo, cloth

6s.

THE PIT. Crown 8vo, cloth

6s.

WHITEING, RICHARD.

No. 5, JOHN STREET. Fcap. 8vo, cloth gilt

6s.

A Complete Catalogue will be forwarded on application.

ALEXANDER MORING, LTD.,

32, George Street, Hanover Square, London, W.

The Nation

Reviews.

BONAPARTE AND EGYPT.*

THE chief interest of this work lies in the personality and point of view of the author. It is not often that a European has set himself the task of diving into the inner life of an Oriental people with the thoroughness that has characterised Haji Browne's efforts. Indeed, one cannot imagine a greater contrast between his standpoint with regard to Egypt and that of the European official or casual sojourner. He has striven to live the life of the Egyptians, to enter into their inmost thoughts, to realise their beliefs, aspirations, ways of thinking, and prejudices. The task, he assures us, is not impossible; but, to overcome the difficulties, the European must start life anew. To quote his words:—

"With this slaying of his own individuality he must in all things strive to identify himself with those alien to him, ever seeking to see, hear, think, and act as they do. And he must do this not for a week, a month, or a year, but for many years. Not in one city, town, or country, but in several; not merely mixing as best he may with the wealthy and the poor, the illiterate and the learned, but learning to be at home in the abodes of the prosperous and the haunts of the miserable, becoming equally so with the merchant in the bazaar and the wandering fakir in the desert."

This is the task which Haji Browne set himself thirty years ago; and he pathetically exclaims that for him the West can never again be home. He seeks to emphasise the contrast between East and West by reviewing firstly the salient facts in the history of Egypt which have influenced her character; and he throws into abrupt relief the leisurely devout life of the Cairenes at midsummer, 1798, when they were first brought into contact with the life of modern Europe in one of its most aggressive phases. This method is effective; but he must pardon us for reminding him that the life of the Orient has not always been one of serene and self-satisfied calm. The East has poured its desolating hordes upon Europe; and European life is not quite fairly personified in the career of the great Corsican condottiere.

But let that pass. In sketching the outlines of Egyptian history, the author enforces the fact that the life of the cultivators has been essentially the same despite all the waves of conquest that have rolled over them. In the seventy centuries that make up the stately procession of the annals of Egypt, he finds only six events which have had an appreciable influence on the life of its people to-day. These are the conquest of the land, first by the Arabs, then by the Turks; and in more modern times the French invasion of 1798, the rise of Mahomed Ali, the British occupation, and the evacuation of Fashoda by the French. Of course, he would not deny that the national character was slowly moulded in the long ages of the Pharaohs and Ptolemies; but, for his purpose, it is correct to single out the Arab conquest as the event which first made the beliefs and ways of thought of the Nile-dwellers what they are to-day. Indeed, he seems to us somewhat to underrate the importance of that event. It may be true that Christianity had not laid vital hold of the Egyptians, and that Greek culture did not penetrate very deep; but the introduction of Islam, though it may not have altered the lives of the people as much as it did those of Arabia and Persia, yet surely must profoundly have modified their beliefs and thoughts. Religion, which before had been an uncertain factor, thenceforth became the dominant fact of life. It is therefore an exaggeration for Haji Browne to say (p. 28):—

"Such as the fellaheen, or peasantry, were when Cheops was building his pyramid, such they remained in almost all respects down to the arrival of the French."

*"Bonaparte in Egypt, and the Egyptians of To-day." By Haji A. Browne Fisher Unwin 10s. 6d. net.

Elsewhere he insists that loyalty to Islam is the first of all considerations for Egyptians, and that their loyalty to the Sultan of Turkey springs solely from the fact of his being the most powerful ruler in Islam. Should a more powerful Islamic ruler arise, they would, he asserts, transfer their allegiance to him. Haji Browne's advocacy of Pan-Islamism (in no sense hostile to British interests in India) makes this statement specially noteworthy.

Such was the quiet, introspective, religious life of Egypt when Bonaparte's armada arrived off Alexandria. Already the people had shown their desire to be left alone when they besought or commanded Nelson to refrain from any intervention.

Far greater were their fears when Bonaparte landed his troops at Marabout and carried Alexandria by assault. Haji Browne then explains why the natives received with quiet scorn Bonaparte's proclamation in Arabic that he came to overthrow the Mamaluks and restore the rule of the Sultan of Turkey; that he himself was a good Moslem, having destroyed the Pope and the Knights of Malta; and that he would give them good government. He certainly hoped that the promise of overthrowing the oppressive rule of the Mamaluk military caste would allure the natives; for he had brought thousands of cockades for them to don. Haji Browne asserts that his miscalculation was the same as that of Lord Dufferin and other British administrators in and after 1882. The Egyptians in a vague and passive way desired the righting of their ills; but these they ascribed, not to the Sultan, or even to the Mamaluk chiefs, but rather to subordinate officials. Even these could obliterate any sense of hatred to them by acts of timely generosity, on which Orientals set more store than rigid justice. As for Bonaparte's promise of good government by a Dewan (Divan), it was meaningless to them; for the Dewan of Cairo was the chief source of oppression. Still worse was his assertion that all men were equal in the sight of God. This was rank blasphemy; for the Koran emphatically distinguishes between Moslems and non-Moslems. Among the former, as Haji Browne explains, there is a good deal of, at least, theoretical equality, while the latter are relegated to an inferior position. As, finally, Bonaparte gave no proof of any authorisation from the Sultan, the Egyptians regarded him as a sacrilegious imposter, and longed for his destruction by the Mamaluks. At most the oppression of the last was fitful, and whenever the storm swept by, the people settled down to the enjoyment of their usual careless and indolent existence. Haji Browne tries to prove that their lot was better than that of the average Englishman of that day. The attempt is as futile as to seek to compare the existence of a cat, occasionally troubled by dogs, with the life of a schoolboy.

It is needless to dwell on the events of the French campaign. When master of Cairo, Bonaparte sought to conciliate the populace by attending mosques on great occasions, but incidents occurred which showed that he knew nothing of the thoughts of these outwardly calm and docile people. French fussiness imposed passports for travellers, strict sanitary regulations, the registration of births, marriages, and deaths (with a fee in each case), without any visible result; but when the new ruler conferred tricolour sashes on members of his Dewan, he had them angrily rejected. Untaught by this, he sought to impose the wearing of tricolour cockades by the Cairenes as a proof of amity. The last straw was the imposition of a house-tax. By no means unfair in itself, it yet aroused to fiery resentment a people that had endured much already in the way of improvement; and a chance circumstance brought about the revolt of October 21st at Cairo and its savage repression. Thenceforth reconciliation was impossible. Haji Browne does full justice to the material and intellectual benefits conferred by Bonaparte on Egypt, and admits that the library and the laboratory opened at Cairo were generally appreciated. Not by all, it seems, for a sheikh, after stolidly witnessing all the marvels of Western science, questioned the French demonstrators as to their ability to cause him to be in two places at once; and on their reply in the negative, expressed his contempt for such lamentably imperfect science. The author bids us beware of laughing at the sheikh, for not so long ago he saw a fine old Arab saint who was credibly affirmed to have on many occasions attended prayers at mosques far apart at the very same time. But these things belong to "Borderland" and the higher Brahminism.

On a more mundane plane, Haji Browne accumulates enough evidence to prove how complete was the severance between the French and Egyptians. He sums up the chief cause of this in the statement, on page 256, that the nations of Europe are secular bodies with secular Governments, while the Eastern peoples are essentially religious communities. The ideas of the latter on justice and mercy are far removed from those of the practical Occidentals. He admits that the Englishman's idea of justice is practical, though sometimes hard and unsympathetic, and that he does try to live up to it; while the Oriental is too apt to cherish an ideal of justice "as a standard whereby to judge the merits and failings of others, rather than as a guide of his own actions." For the most part, however, Haji Browne dwells severely on the failings of European administration in Egypt, especially on those of Frenchmen; he quotes with gusto the jingling Turkish proverb, "Franiz imansiz" ("faithless Frenchmen"). Probably this proverb grew out of the unprincipled invasion of Bonaparte, who, under the guise of recovering Egypt for the Sultan, sought to seize it for France. This it was, as the author remarks, which proved the greatest difficulty in the way of British administrators after 1882. The French occupation left comparatively few permanent traces behind, as has been shown in a British official report on Egypt in 1802, printed in "Napoleonic Studies."

Will the same be said a century hence concerning the British occupation? Haji Browne touches on the question of the durability of the work done by Britain in Egypt; but, while remorselessly pointing out its weak points and our inability to conciliate native opinion, he shows how different is our position from that of Bonaparte. The enterprise of the French General was essentially one of conquest, and civilisation was only his handmaid. Native opinion, though still largely hostile to us on religious grounds, has come to regard us as administrators rather than conquerors. "John Bull is a beast, but a just beast"; that is the opinion of the ordinary fellah. Our position was indefinitely strengthened by the Fashoda incident. The withdrawal of Colonel Marchand from the Upper Nile, exactly one hundred years from the time of Bonaparte's arrival off Alexandria, showed the Egyptians that they could no longer hope to play off France against England. Even the acrid Turkish party in Egypt began to accept the situation. The prospects, therefore, are, on the whole, hopeful; and though the author strongly holds that yet he recognises facts, and believes in the possibility of a working alliance between English administrators and the Egyptian people. The sine qua non of success is the recognition of the truth of Burke's warning, that a political system must be suited to man's nature as modified by his habits.

"East is East, and West is West"

J. HOLLAND ROSE.

OLD GOLD AND SILVER WORK.*

It is a little difficult to tell precisely the mark at which Mr. Nelson Dawson aims in his "Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Work." Written for the Connoisseurs' Library, we naturally expect to find it suited to readers who have to some extent already studied the subject. Yet the first part is taken up with a mass of elementary information such as would be common knowledge in a Board School. With the exception of some amusing extracts from ancient writers, the whole of this might be omitted without in any way lessening the value of what follows. Later, as though in apology, technical terms are used without explanation, and occasionally a considerable amount of knowledge on the part of the reader is taken for granted.

On the face of it the subject of gold and silver work in all countries and of all periods is far too large to come within the scope of a single volume, unless the author rigidly ties himself down to handbook form. And this Mr. Dawson has not done. He seems a little overwhelmed with the magnitude of his undertaking, and uncertain as to what limits he shall impose upon himself in dealing with it. The book contains subject matter enough to furnish a vast amount of interesting study, but there is some unnecessary repetition—as when two paragraphs in different parts of it are devoted to the supposed derivation of the word sterling—not in itself a matter of great importance, and probably to be found in any dictionary. And occasionally space is wasted in remarks which have no bearing upon the subject, and remind one of the gentle platitudes which help to fill up a youthful essay when ideas run short. There is no excuse for this kind of thing; Mr. Dawson has plenty to say and a wide knowledge of his subject, but he has a way of surrounding his opinion with a wrapping of less value to the student, and sometimes he leaves us in doubt as to what that opinion really is.

The book is illustrated with a succession of beautiful reproductions from photographs taken by the author, and on which he is greatly to be congratulated. These alone would make it worth having. The example of the several periods are well chosen and thoroughly representative; the details are clear, and a very full description is given in every case. Some of the explanations, however, are so naïve that again we wonder for what class of student the book was written. As, for instance, in describing a teapot already illustrated: "The shape is very pleasing, and suitable for its original purpose—that of making and pouring tea." And later: "Apostle spoons are so called because of the figure of an apostle which formed the termination of the handle to each spoon." Here at least are plain statements, dispersing at a blow any possible theories to the effect that teapots were originally made to hold wine or coffee; or that apostle spoons were so called because they had seal heads or rat tails.

Mr. Dawson has produced a book, valuable, if not as a volume of reference, at least as a work which is calculated to arouse our appreciation of his subject. It teaches us something, and makes us anxious to learn a great deal more. He is obviously an artist and enthusiast rather than a teacher, and is at his best in the last chapter, where he traces the reasons for the steady decadence of beauty and real artistic feeling in modern silver work. He voices very clearly the complaint of artists and collectors in all branches of art, that the present cry for cheap goods is the ruin of artistic excellence. Formerly the silversmith made his own design, knowing to a hair's breadth the possibilities of the material with which he had to deal. Afterwards he carried out the work with his own hands and in his own workshop, dwelling on every touch with infinite appreciation of its value, until the piece, in some subtle way, became instinct with human expression. Lastly, he probably carried it himself to the patron for whom it had been designed, so that he might miss none of the appreciation which was to him in great part the reward of his labour.

To-day, designs are turned out by the score by men whose business it is to do nothing else, and who probably never see the completed articles. The work passes through a dozen hands, each workman responsible only for the work he superintends, so that all individual pride in the result is next to impossible. Above all, the mechanical processes which have taken the place of the skilled hand labour impose hard and fast limitations of form and design, producing a hundred inferior articles differing not at all from each other, and all equally wanting in expression and character.

We do not, however, agree with Mr. Dawson's concluding remarks which inveigh against the copying of old designs in modern work, unless he means the fraudulent passing off of such work as genuinely old. If the old designs are both beautiful and suitable (and the book has taken much pains to impress their excellence in these respects upon us), it would surely be better frankly to educate the modern workman until he is skilful enough to reproduce them, than to collect them, keep them in cabinets, catalogue them, write of them, and admire them—and then deliberately make something different.

* "Goldsmiths' and Silversmiths' Work." By Nelson Dawson. Methuen. 25s.

The Pick of the Publishing Season.

The following is a selection of the more interesting Books appearing in the Publisher's Spring Lists, grouped under different subject headings.

ART.

- Sandro Botticelli. By Herbert P. Horne. (Bell. Ten guineas net.)
- Miniature Series of Painters. Botticelli. By R. H. Hobart Cust. Da Vinci. By R. H. Hobart Cust. (Bell. 1s. net each.)
- Early Painters of the Netherlands. By Pol de Mont. In ten parts. Part III. (Chatto & Windus. Five guineas net.)
- The Early German Painters. From Meister Wilhelm of Cologne to Adam Elsheimer. By Max Friedländer. In 10 parts. Part II. (Chatto & Windus. Five guineas net.)
- Italian Painters of the Quattrocento and Cinquecento. By Wilhelm Bode. In 15 parts. Part II. (Chatto & Windus. Five guineas net.)
- In the Medici Series of Coloured Reproductions after the Old Masters—two new plates. Plate VII. Filippino Lippi (ascribed to). The Virgin in Adoration. (15s. net.) Plate VIII. Botticelli. The Birth of Venus. (25s. net.) (Chatto & Windus.)
- A History of Art. By Dr. Giulio Carotti. In 4 vols. (Duckworth. 5s. net each volume.)
- Madrid. An Historical and Descriptive Account of the Spanish Capital. Ed. by A. F. Calvert. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Goya. A Biography and an Appreciation. Ed. by A. F. Calvert. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Leon, Burgos, and Salamanca. An Historical and Descriptive Account. Ed. by A. F. Calvert. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Valladolid, Oviedo, Segovia, Zamora, Avila, and Zaragoza. An Historical and Descriptive Account. Ed. by A. F. Calvert. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Royal Palaces of Spain. An Historical and Descriptive Account of the Seven Principal Palaces of the Spanish Kings. Ed. by A. F. Calvert. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)
- A History of Engraving from its inception to the time of Thomas Bewick. By S. E. Austen. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Cathedrals and Churches of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, including the Island of Gottland. By T. F. Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 16s. net.)
- London Churches Ancient and Modern. By T. F. Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Abbeys of Great Britain. By H. Clairborne Dixon. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Engraved Work of J. M. W. Turner, R.A. By W. G. Rawlinson. (Macmillan. 3 vols.)
- Jewellery. By H. Clifford Smith. (Methuen. 25s. net.)
- Early Woodcut Initials. By Oscar Jennings, M.D. (Methuen. 21s. net.)
- English Costume. By George Clinch, F.G.S. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Saints in Art. By Margaret E. Tabor. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Our Lady in Art. By Mrs. H. L. Jenner. (Methuen. 2s. 6d. net.)
- London: Passed and Passing. A Pictorial Record of Destroyed and Threatened Buildings. About 70 Illustrations by Hanslip Fletcher. (Pitman. One guinea net.)
- Fifty Years of Modern Painting: Corot to Sargent. By J. E. Phythian. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Japanese Wood Engravings. By Professor W. Anderson. (Seeley. Cloth, 2s. net.)

- Memoir of the Life and Military Services of Viscount Lake, Baron Lake of Delhi and Laswaree. 1744—1808. By Colonel H. Pearse. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)
- A Great Labour Leader, being the Life of the Rt. Hon. Thomas Burt, M.P. By Aaron Watson. (Brown, Langham. 15s. net.)
- Letters of Christina Rossetti. With Memoir and Introduction by W. M. Rossetti. (Brown, Langham. 15s. net.)
- Diary of Dr. Polidori. Edited by W. M. Rossetti. (Brown, Langham. 6s. net.)
- Marie de Medicis and the Court of France in the XVII. Century. Authorised English Version from the French of Louis Batiffol, by Mary King. (Chatto & Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Edward Fitzgerald and "Posh," "Herring Merchants," including a number of Letters from Edward Fitzgerald to Joseph Fletcher, or "Posh," not hitherto published. By James Blyth. (Digby, Long. 5s. net.)
- George Bernard Shaw. By G. K. Chesterton. Edited by J. T. Grein. (Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Sir Halliday Macartney, K.C.M.G. By Demetrius C. Boulger. (Lane. 24s. net.)
- The Diary of a Lady-in-Waiting. By Lady Charlotte Bury. Edited by A. Francis Steuart. (Lane. 16s. net.)
- The Daughter of Louis XVI.: Marie-Thérèse-Charlotte of France, Duchesse D'Angoulême. By G. Lenôtre. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The King's General in the West, being the Life of Sir Richard Grenville, Baronet (1600-1659). By Roger Granville, M.A. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- César Franck: A Study. Translated from the French of Vincent d'Indy. (Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Paul Verlaine. By E. Lepelletier. (Werner Laurie. One guinea net.)
- The Love Story of Empress Josephine. By W. J. Roberts. (Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Letters of Martin Luther. Selected and Translated by Margaret A. Currie. (Macmillan.)
- Rambling Recollections. By Sir Henry Drummond Wolff. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 30s. net.)
- The Autobiography of Montagu Burrows. Edited by his son, S. M. Burrows. (Macmillan.)
- Lancelot Andrewes. A Life. By the Rev. D. Maclean. (Masters. 3s. 6d.)
- The Lives of St. Francis of Assisi. By Thomas of Celano. Translated into English by A. G. F. Howell. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- The Romance of George Villiers, First Duke of Buckingham, and some Men and Women of the Stuart Court. By Philip Gibbs. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- The Life and Letters of Herbert Spencer. By David Duncan, D.Sc., LL.D. (Methuen. 15s.)
- Tragedy Queens of the Georgian Era. By John Fyvie. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Famous French Salons. By Frank Hamel. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)
- The Brave de Lauzun. By M. F. Sandars. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Madame de Lafayette. By Lilian Rea. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Bonaparte and the Consulate. By A. C. Thibaudeau. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Trials of Five Queens. By R. Storry Deans. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- A Star of the Salons. By Camilla Jebb. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Richard Kennoway and his Friends. By Katharine Steuart. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- My Memoirs. By Alexandre Dumas. Vols. III. and IV. (Methuen. 6s. each.)

BIOGRAPHY AND MEMOIRS.

- Garcia the Centenarian: and His Times. By M. Sterling Mackinley, M.A. (Blackwood. 15s. net.)

MODERN SPANISH NOVELISTS.*

I HAVE on more than one occasion hazarded in print the opinion that the very limited acceptance gained in Europe generally by modern Spanish fiction is owing to the provincialism which is its main characteristic. The patriotism of the village spire, as the French saying runs, is, indeed, the determining factor in Spanish life generally; and it is not strange that the purely national literature should partake of this, the strongest feature in the character of the people. For the first half of the nineteenth century Spain had no purely native fiction at all, the novels that appeared having been but feeble reflections of the romantic school of French writing popularised by Dumas and his disciples. The first signs of a realistic revival in Spain came from a lady of German parentage, Mme. Böhl de Fabre (Fernan Caballero), whose works, overpraised at the time of their production, in the fifties, are now deservedly relegated to a respectful obscurity. But Fernan Caballero's stories were instinct with the ardent local patriotism which appealed to her readers. The old traditions, the folk tales, the rustic memories, the scenery of Andalusia, were all enshrined in them lovingly; and although Fernan Caballero has been followed by novelists and romancers of immensely greater power, by writers as brilliant as any other country of Europe can show in the time, they have rarely departed from the provincial example she set, except on the occasions when they have been content to work on obviously French models.

But, even though the desire of the Spanish novelists to crystallise in their pages the rapidly disappearing life of the various provinces has restricted their public outside Spain, there is so much of power, so much of deep psychological insight, in many of their works that it behoves the student of contemporary literature to make himself acquainted, even at second hand, with some of the masterpieces of modern Spanish fiction. M. Vézinet in a series of essays upon the principal works of Juan Valera, Perez Galdós, Pereda, Palacio Valdés, Pardo Bazan, Blasco Ibañez, and Echegaray, now enables the reader unacquainted with Spanish to follow the plots and philosophy of most of the outstanding Spanish novels of the last thirty years, and to appreciate the qualities which differentiate them from the work of contemporary writers of other countries. It is only by reading the essays together in the collected form now presented in the book before us that the reader to whom the original works are unknown can readily understand what are the distinguishing characteristics of modern Spanish fiction, in addition to the persistently provincial model upon which it is usually constructed. Whatever may be the human drama presented in a book by Mme. Pardo Bazan, for instance, we may almost be certain that the background will be the green, rainy valleys of Galicia; and that, like a refrain, will run through the story an undertone of Gallego-Celtic love of home and poetic resignation to toil and hardship. We know beforehand that a story by the strongest of the new generation of Spanish novelists, Blasco Ibañez, will dwell lovingly in the intervals of the fierce turmoil of his tale upon the white granges set amidst the rice fields, and riotous vegetation of the Garden of Valencia, beneath its sapphire sky. Whatever story Jose Maria Pereda may have to tell us, we can guess with confidence that he will tell us also a great deal about the life and thought of the Cantabrian highlanders. The taste of the soil, as the Spaniards say, is dear to them all, the soil upon which their early years were passed; and dreams of mi pueblo, some crumbling brown village upon a brown plain perhaps, or a dazzling white town set in tropical greenery, will haunt longingly the author, artist, or politician, in his brilliant Madrid prosperity, and follow the successful merchant or planter across the Atlantic to his South American home.

But provincialism, strong as it is in the Spanish novel, is mainly a question of background and accompaniment. The plots and arguments of the stories present other distinguishing peculiarities, which just as certainly mark them out as springing from a different race and environment from the novels of other European countries. M. Vézinet in his minute, and sometimes not over kind, analysis of the work of each author separately, does not attempt a general review of the conclusions to be drawn with regard to the main tendencies of Spanish fiction. But the deductions are so clear that he who runs may read them. From the amiable opportunist, the lately deceased Juan Valera, to the fiery Republican, still very much alive, Blasco Ibañez, from the "Comendador Mendoza" of the former to the "Horda" of the latter, the story turns upon the struggle between the old and the new. It is usually the fierce contest between the fervent mysticism of Spain's religion and modern thought, between the clericalism that has held Spain so firmly and so long and the intelligence that demands freedom of thought and judgment. Such are the forceful polemical novels and plays of Perez Galdós, the Republican nonconformist, and of the Carlist Catholic, Pereda.

But the old and the new have other battlefields beyond those of religion. Modern material progress in Spain is face to face with the instinctive Conservatism and distrust of a backward people, and the fight here between old and new is bitter and cruel. Blasco Ibañez, splendidly impetuous, sets forth in his tales this phase of the contest; and Mme. Pardo Bazan, as realistic as Zola, with none of Zola's coarseness, makes her Galician heroes and heroines act the drama which tells of the struggle between love of the old land and its poverty and the new claims of modern life and prosperity in cities far away. The old morality and the new, old acres and new factories, old parchments and new money bags, these are some of the phases of the well-nigh universal theme of Spanish novelists, and in this insistence also they differ from the novelists of other lands. The types, moreover, are nearly always purely Spanish, and are not to be found elsewhere. The strange mixture in one person of exalted mysticism and practical realism is exclusively Spanish, and it is reproduced quite truly in nearly every great story of Spanish life, whereas in a novel of English life it would be utterly untrue to nature. The morality depicted in the Spanish stories, too, though perhaps as depraved as that described in French novels, is invariably covered with forms of decency. This, again, is true to Spanish life, where, however low the morality may be, an almost puritanical decorum in appearance testifies to the traditional influence of the priest in the outward conduct of society. The analysis of the works dealt with by M. Vézinet is acute, and the criticism in the main is just, though too full of limitations and qualifications; inasmuch as the French standpoint is not necessarily the only one from which a Spanish work is to be regarded, and a true and intimate acquaintance with the Spanish character is desirable for a just appreciation of works written primarily for a Spanish public. It is a pity that M. Vézinet did not include in his work some consideration of the recent novels of one of the most promising of the younger Spanish writers, Francisco Acebal, even though he had omitted his description of the three plays of Echegaray, which, indeed, hardly finds an appropriate place in a critical book on Spanish novelists. On the whole, however, M. Vézinet's book will be useful as a trustworthy guide to modern Spanish fiction.

MARTIN HUME.

In "Sidelights on Golf" (Sisley's, 3s. 6d. net), Mr. Garden G. Smith touches upon most of the aspects of the ancient and entrancing game. The touch of this practical exponent is light, but authoritative. He treats of the cheapening of championships, pokes fun at the lengthiness of putting operations, which is a recognised feature of important events; discourses eloquently and amusingly of the "waggle," and, in sketching the "duffer," makes sinister reference to the term having originally signified a cheat! His historical dissertation is welcome, and Scotsmen, who might object to being told that they did not introduce the game into England, will find comfort in the assurance that they did not owe it to the "pottering ice croquet" played by the Dutchmen. Mr. Garden Smith theorises that both the Dutch and Scottish varieties grew, independently of each other, out of a common parent—the French game "chole," or "crosse." One could have put up with a little more history. The average golfer is as ignorant of and indifferent to the history of his pastime as the cricketer is to that of his. These "Sidelights" should shed both instruction and laughter on many a club-house, since the information is sound and the "stories" are almost uniformly good.

* "Les Maîtres du Roman Espagnol Contemporain." Par F. Vézinet. Paris: Hachette. 3fr. 50.

A Family Chronicle, from Notes and Letters Selected by Barbarina, the Hon. Lady Grey. Edited by Mrs. John Lyster. (Murray. 12s. net.)

Catherine of Bragança, Infanta of Portugal and Queen Consort of England. By Lillias Campbell Davidson. (Murray.)

The Religious Life of William Ewart Gladstone. By A. C. Lathbury. (Murray.)

Memoir of Lettice, Lady Falkland. Edited by Miss M. F. Howard. (Murray.)

John Thadeus Delane, 1817-1879. Editor of "The Times." By his nephew, A. I. Dasent. 2 vols. (Murray.)

Correspondence of George Canning and Some Intimate Friends. Edited by Josceline Bagot. 2 vols. (Murray.)

The Reminiscences of the late Albert Pell, Sometime M.P. for South Leicestershire. Edited, with a Memoir, by T. Mackay. With an Appreciation by the Rt. Hon. James Bryce. (Murray.)

Beau Brummell and His Times. By Roger Boutet de Monvel. (Nash. 10s. net.)

Leaves from a Life. (Nash. 12s. 6d.)

The Life of an Empress: Eugène de Montigo. By Frédéric Loliée. (Nash. 15s. net.)

Heroes of the Nations. Charles the Bold, Last Duke of Burgundy, 1433-1477. By Ruth Putnam. William the Conqueror, and the Rule of the Normans. By F. M. Stenton, M.A. (Putnam. 5s. each.)

The Life of Goethe. By Albert Bielschowsky. Vol. III. From the Congress of Vienna to the Poet's Death, 1815-1832. (Putnam.)

An Apostle of the North. By the Rev. H. A. Cody, Rector of Whitehorse, Yukon. (Seeley. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Life and Letters of George Jacob Holyoake. By Joseph McCabe. 2 vols. (Watts.)

CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

Guesses at Truths. By D. Christie Murray. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

French Novelists of To-day: Maurice Barrès, René Bazin, Paul Bourget, Pierre de Coulevain, Anatole France, Pierre Loti, Marcel Prévost, and Edouard Rod. By Winifred Stephens. (Lane. 5s. net.)

Limbo, and Other Essays. To which is now added "Ariadne in Mantua." By Vernon Lee. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Shakespeare Problem Restated. By George Greenwood, M.P. (Lane. 21s. net.)

Orthodoxy. By Gilbert K. Chesterton. Uniform with "Heretics." (Lane. 5s. net.)

Types of Tragic Drama. By C. E. Vaughan, M.A. (Macmillan.)

History of English Prosody from the Twelfth Century to the Present Day. By G. Saintsbury. Vol. II. (Macmillan.)

English Pastoral Drama from the Restoration to the date of the publication of the Lyrical Ballads (1660-1798). By Jeannette Marks, B.A. (Methuen. 5s. net.)

On Nothing and Kindred Subjects. By Hilaire Belloc, M.P. (Methuen. 5s.)

Four Poets: Clough, Arnold, Rossetti, Morris. A Study. By Stopford A. Brooke. (Pitman. 6s. net.)

Shelburne Essays. Fifth Series. By Paul Elmer More. (Putnam. 5s. net.)

A Literary History of Russia. By Professor A. Brückner, of Berlin. (Unwin. 15s. net.)

A Short History of Scottish Literature. By J. H. Millar, B.A. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Novels of George Meredith. By E. E. J. Bailey. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

Heralds of American Literature. By Annie Russell Marble. (Unwin. 6s. 6d. net.)

DRAMA.

The Duke of Gandia. By Algernon Charles Swinburne. (Chatto & Windus. 6s.)

John the Baptist: A Play by Hermann Sudermann. Translated by Beatrice Marshall. (Lane. 5s. net.)

The Vision of St. Agnes' Eve: A Mystery Play. By Marie E. J. Hobart. (Longmans. 4s. 6d. net.)

Faust. A Drama. By Stephen Phillips. (Macmillan.)

The Dynasts. A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars. By Thomas Hardy. Part III. (Macmillan.)

The Duchess of Padua. A Play by Oscar Wilde. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net.)

The Tragedies of Seneca. By F. Justus Miller. (Unwin. 12s. 6d. net.)

Within Four Walls, and Children at Play. Two Plays. By L. S. Schuller. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

EDUCATIONAL.

Æschylus. The Eumenides of Æschylus. With Introduction, Commentary, and Translation. By A. W. Verrall, Litt.D. (Macmillan.)

Herodotus. Books VII.-IX. With Introduction and Notes by R. W. Macan, M.A. 3 vols. (Macmillan.)

Examples in Elementary Mechanics. By W. J. Dobbs, M.A. (Methuen. 5s.)

A History of Great Britain: From the Coming of the Angles to the Year 1870. By E. M. Wilmot-Buxton. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

A School Latin Grammar. By H. G. Ford, M.A. (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)

Outlines of Physical Chemistry. By George Senter, B.Sc. (Lond.). (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)

An Organic Chemistry for Schools and Technical Institutes. By A. E. Dunstan, B.Sc. (Lond.). (Methuen. 2s. 6d.)

Elements of Plane and Spherical Trigonometry. By James H. Gore, Ph.D. (Putnam. 6s. net.)

FICTION.

The Fly on the Wheel. By Katherine Cecil Thurston. (Blackwood. 6s.)

The Grain Carriers. By Edward Noble. (Blackwood. 6s.)

Richard Langhorne: The Story of a Socialist. By E. Ashmead-Bartlett. (Blackwood. 6s.)

The Brotherhood of Wisdom. By Frances J. Armour. (Brown, Langham. 6s.)

An Engagement of Convenience. By Louis Zangwill. (Brown, Langham.)

The Human Boy Again. By Eden Phillpotts. (Chapman & Hall.)

The Death Man. By Benjamin Swift. (Chapman & Hall.)

Sally Bishop: A Romance. By E. Temple Thurston. (Chapman & Hall.)

The Garden of Eden. By Alice M. Diehl. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

The Love of Susan Cardigan. By L. T. Meade. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

The Goal. By May Wynne. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Second Selves. By Algernon Gissing. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

An Empty Heritage. By Violet Tweedale. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Demos Awakes. By David Christie Murray. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

A Woman's Aye and Nay. By Lucas Cleeve. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

Rachel Chalfont. By Sophie Cole. (Duckworth. 6s.)

Isle Raven. By Owen Vaughan (Owen Rhoscomyl). (Duckworth. 6s.)

Emotional Moments. By Sarah Grand. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

An Actor's Love Story. By Alice M. Diehl. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

Miss Lucy. By Christabel Coleridge. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

Mystery Island. By E. H. Hurst. (Hurst & Blackett. 6s.)

The High Adventure: A Novel. By Hugh de Selincourt. (Lane. 6s.)

A Man of Genius: A Novel. By M. P. Willcocks. (Lane. 6s.)

The Chichester Intrigue: A Novel. By Thomas Cobb. (Lane. 6s.)

The Child of Chance: A Novel. By Maxime Formont. (Lane. 6s.)

Absolution: A Novel. By Clara Viebig. (Lane. 6s.)

Sir Jeremy's Intervention. By Thomas Cobb. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)

The Cottage on the Fells. By H. de Vere Stacpoole. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)

Before Adam. By Jack London. (Werner Laurie. 5s. net.)

The Queen's Friend. By Hélène Vacaresco. (Werner Laurie. 6s.)

Mr. Crewe's Career. By Winston Churchill. (Macmillan. 6s.)

The Primadonna: A Sequel to "Soprano." By F. Marion Crawford. (Macmillan. 6s.)

Mamma. By Rhoda Broughton. (Macmillan. 6s.)

Scarlet Runner. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. (Methuen. 6s.)

Flower o' the Orange, and Other Tales. By Agnes and Egerton Castle. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Duke's Motto. By J. H. McCarthy. (Methuen. 6s.)

Sheaf of Corn. By Mary E. Mann. (Methuen. 6s.)

A Poppy Show: A Volume of Stories. By H. B. Marriott Watson. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Sentimental Adventures of Jimmy Bulstrode. By Marie Van Vorst. (Methuen. 6s.)

The Bad Times. By G. A. Birmingham. (Methuen. 6s.)

Colonel Kate. By K. L. Montgomery. (Methuen. 6s.)

Graham of Claverhouse. By Ian Maclaren. (Murray.)

Dominy's Dollars. By B. Paul Neuman. (Murray.)

Caroline. By Clementina Black. (Murray.)

The Three Miss Graemes. By Miss MacNaughtan. (Murray.)

The Nun. By René Bazin. (Nash.)

The Magic of May. By "Iota." (Nash.)

The Fifth Queen Crowned. By Ford Madox Hueffer. (Nash.)

Prisoners of Chance. By Randall Parrish. (Putnam. 6s.)

Eve's Apple. By A. Courlander. (Unwin. 6s.)

The Blue Lagoon: A Romance. By H. de Vere Stacpoole. (Unwin. 6s.)

Father Alphonsus. By H. A. Hinkson. (Unwin. 6s.)

Draga. By A. G. Hales. (Unwin. 6s.)

HISTORY.

State and Family in Early Rome. By C. W. L. Launsbach. (Bell.)

A Century of Political Development. By Hector Macpherson. (Blackwood. 3s. 6d. net.)

A History of Babylon and Assyria from the Earliest Times until the Persian Conquest. By L. W. King, F.S.A. In 3 vols. (Chatto & Windus. 18s. net.)

The English People Oversea. A History by A. W. Tilby. Vol. I. (Griffiths. 16s. net.)

A History of the Bank of England. By Professor A. Andreades, of the University of Athens. Translated from the French into English by Mrs. H. O. Meredith. (King. 10s. 6d. net.)

A History of the English Agricultural Labourer. By Dr. W. Hasbach. Translated from the German into English by Ruth Kenyon. (King.)

The "Londons" of the British Fleet. Events and Deeds of Arms in the Annals of a Name of old renown at Sea. By Edward Fraser. (Lane. 6s.)

The History of Twenty-five Years. By the late Sir Spencer Walpole. Vols. III. and IV. (Longmans.)

Germany in the Dark and Middle Ages: Lectures. By William Stubbs, D.D. (Longmans.)

The Russian Conquest of the Caucasus. By J. F. Baddeley. (Longmans.)

English Local Government from the Revolution to the Municipal Corporations Act: the Manor and the Borough. By Sidney and Beatrice Webb. (Longmans. 25s. net.)

The Political History of England. Vol. VIII., 1660 to 1702. By Richard Lodge, M.A. (Longmans, 7s. 6d. net. Vol. IX., 1702 to 1760. By I. S. Leadam, M.A. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

A History of the Christian Church from the Reformation to the Present Time. By S. Cheetham, D.D. (Macmillan.)

Civil War and Rebellion in the Roman Empire, A.D. 69-70. By B. W. Henderson, M.A. (Macmillan.)

Studies in Irish History. By Alice S. Green. (Macmillan.)

General History of Western Nations from 5000 B.C. to 1900 A.D. By Emil Reich. Part I. Antiquity. In 3 vols. (Macmillan.)

The Russian Court in the Nineteenth Century. By E. A. Brayley Hodgetts. (Methuen. 24s. net.)

Woman Through the Ages. By Emil Reich. (Methuen. 21s. net.)

A History of Germany, from 1713 to 1815. By C. T. Atkinson, M.A. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

The Flight of the King. By Allan Fea. (Methuen. 7s. 6d.)

The Thirteen Colonies of North America. By Reginald W. Jeffery, M.A. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

The History of the Royal Scots Greys. By Edward Almack, F.S.A. (Moring. Hand-made paper edition, £2 12s. 6d. net.)

Handbooks of English Church Expansion. Edited by the Rev. Canon Dodson, M.A., and the Rev. Canon Bullock-Webster, M.A. Japan. By Mrs. E. Bickersteth. Western Canada. By the Rev. Canon Norman Tucker, M.A., D.C.L. China. By the Rev. F. L. Norris, M.A. (Mowbray. 2s. net each.)

Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England. By Professor J. Churton Collins. (Nash. 7s. 6d. net.)

A History of Nursing. By Lavinia L. Dock, R.N., and M. Adelaide Nutting, R.N. 2 vols. (Putnam. 21s. net.)

The History of Wexford Town. From the Earliest Times to the Rebellion of 1798, with a chapter on the Village of Taghmon. Edited by P. H. Hore. (Stock. 50s. net.)

The History of the Cabinet, and other Studies Biographical and Literary. By Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

Modern England. Being a Record of Opinion and Action from the Time of the French Revolution to the Present Day. By A. W. Benn. (Watts.)

COUNTRY LIFE.

Fox Hunting Past and Present. By R. H. Carlisle. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

Remarks on the Condition of Hunters, the Choice of Horses, and their Management. By Nimrod. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)

An English Gardening Book. By K. L. Davidson. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)

Roses, their History, Development, and Cultivation. By the Rev. J. H. Pemberton. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Summer Garden of Pleasure. By Mrs. Stephen Batson. (Methuen. 15s. net.)

The Complete Lawn Tennis Player. By A. Wallis Myers. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

Advanced Golf. By James Braid, Open Champion, 1901, 1905, and 1906. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)

The Lore of the Honey Bee. By T. Edwardes. (Methuen. 6s.)

From GINN & COMPANY'S LIST

Ready February 25th.

LETTERS OF THE WORDSWORTH FAMILY.

Edited by WILLIAM KNIGHT LL.D.

Three Volumes. Cloth. 1646 pages. Boxed £1 11s. 6d. net.

The collection comprises more than seven hundred letters, many of which are here first printed. The prefatory introduction will be a revelation and an interesting addition to Wordsworthiana. It is practically a new life of the poet.

WILLIAM J. LONG'S LATEST BOOK.

WHOSE HOME IS THE WILDERNESS.

With Frontispiece in Colour and Full-page and Marginal Illustrations by Charles Copeland. Price 5s. net.

By the same Author and Artist. Price 6s. net.

A LITTLE BROTHER TO THE BEAR.
NORTHERN TRAILS. SCHOOL OF THE WOODS.
BEASTS OF THE FIELD. FOWLS OF THE AIR.
BRIER-PATCH PHILOSOPHY.

Price 4s. 6d. net.
FOLLOWING THE DEER.

Catalogues sent Post Free on application.

GINN & COMPANY, 9, St. MARTIN'S STREET, W.C

CASSELL & COMPANY'S NEW NOVELS

NOW READY.

6/- Vayenne

By PERCY J. BREBNER
(Christian Lys)

3/6 The Pauper of Park Lane

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX

6/- Concerning Belinda

By ELEANOR HOYT BRAINERD

IN PREPARATION.

6/- The Wheels of Anarchy

By MAX PEMBERTON

6/- The Lost Millionaire

By LILLIAS CAMPBELL DAVIDSON

6/- A Millionaire Girl

By A. W. MARCHMONT

An Illustrated List of Spring Books
and Periodicals will be sent post free on application

CASSELL & CO., LTD., La Belle Sauvage, LONDON

MR. MURRAY'S NEW BOOKS.

A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF SOCIALISM.

By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "The Veil of the Temple,"
"Property and Progress," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"We have not met with a more able statement of the points at issue, and everyone should read the book, whether is an opponent or a defender of Socialistic theories. By this book Mr. Mallock resumes the position he held twenty years ago as one of the shrewdest thinkers and most lucid writers in our midst."—Sheffield Independent.

FOUR NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS. GRAHAM OF CLAVERHOUSE.

IAN MACLAREN'S LAST WORK.

First Edition nearly exhausted. Second Impression in the Press.

"This novel will surely be accounted one of his best. It is a stirring, splendidly told tale. . . . It is a grand historical novel. Is likely to rank as one of Ian Maclaren's greatest successes."—Daily Telegraph.

"It is good, honest, stirring romance, and one of the best tales ever told by the late Ian Maclaren. A story of strong and stirring incident, written with a swinging style which carries one through to the finish."—Tribune.

"A historical novel into which Ian Maclaren put his very soul. This is Ian Maclaren's triumph."—Liverpool Post.

THE SILVER ZONE.

A Hindu Novel. By KATHLEEN P. EMMETT (Mrs. Foley).
Dedicated by permission to H.R.H. the Princess of Wales.

CAROLINE.

By CLEMENTINA BLACK, Author of "High Treason," &c.

"The book is written throughout with firmness and delicacy. The characters are handled with much skill. . . . 'Caroline' is unusually strong, tender, well proportioned, and in every sense artistic."—Liverpool Post.

"The portrait is an excellent piece of work . . . a charming story, with plenty of brisk typical incident."—Sheffield Independent.

RODWELL.

By Miss V. HAWTREY, Author of "Suzanne."

MOTHERS IN ISRAEL.

By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "Daniel Quayne," "The Ivory God," &c. [Ready Feb. 19.]

OUR FIRST AMBASSADOR TO CHINA.

An Account of the Life of George, Earl Macartney, with Extracts from his Letters and the Narrative of his Experiences in China as Told by Himself, 1737-1806. By Mrs. HELEN H. ROBBINS. With Portraits and other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 16s. net.

THE REMINISCENCES OF THE LATE ALBERT PELL,

Sometime M.P. for South Leicestershire. Edited, with a Memoir, by THOMAS MACKAY, Editor of the "Life of Samuel Smiles," &c. With an Appreciation by the Right Hon. JAMES BRYCE. With Portraits and other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 15s. net.

A FAMILY CHRONICLE.

From Notes and Letters selected by Barbarina, the Hon. Lady Grey. Edited by Mrs. JOHN LYSTER. With Portraits and other Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. net.

This book is a history of three generations of Englishwomen: Barbarina, Lady Dacre, well-known in social, literary, and artistic circles during the first half of the last century; her daughter, Mrs. Sullivan; and her grand-daughter, Lady Grey. It covers a period of about 100 years, and includes many reminiscences and unpublished letters from Fanny Kemble, Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, Lord Lynedoch, Mr. "Bobus" Smith, and other people of interest and note.

A CHEAP EDITION.

LIFE OF ISABELLA BIRD

(MRS. BISHOP).

By Miss ANNA M. STODDART. With Portraits, Maps and other Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

OFFICIAL ACCOUNT OF THE SECOND AFGHAN WAR, 1878-1880.

Produced in the Intelligence Branch, Army Headquarters, India. Abridged Official Account. With Maps and Illustrations, medium 8vo, 21s. net.

"Will be eagerly read by all interested in the preservation of our Indian Empire, and by none more carefully than British officers. . . . The book is founded on the best possible information, and the maps and illustrations are quite good. There are valuable appendices."—Globe.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

- The Birds of the British Islands. By Charles Stonham, C.M.G., F.R.C.S. (Grant Richards. Five vols. 36s. net each.)
- The Perfect Garden. By W. P. Wright. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)
- My Life in the Open. By W. H. Ogilvie. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Miniature Series of Musicians. Grieg. By E. Markham Lee, M.A. (Bell. 1s. net.)
- Bridge Catechism. By R. H. Brydges. Chatto & Windus. 2s. 6d. net.)
- A Short History of English Cathedral Music. By J. T. Bumpus. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
- Fights Forgotten: The History of some of the Chief English and American Prize Fights. By John Sayers. (Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians. Edited by J. A. Fuller Maitland, M.A. In 5 vols. Vol. IV. q-s. (Macmillan. 21s. net.)
- The Complete Cook. By Miss L. Whitling. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Crimes of Brinvilliers and Others. By Alexandre Dumas. (Methuen. 6s.)
- The Crimes of Ali Pasha and Others. By Alexandre Dumas. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Secret Chambers and Hiding-Places. By Allan Fea. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Law of Hospitals. By A. T. Murray. (Murray.)
- The King's Customers. By Henry Atton and H. Hurst Holland. (Murray.)
- Greek Dress. By Miss E. B. Abrahams. (Murray.)
- The Statutes of Wales. Collected, arranged, and edited by Ivor Bowen. (Unwin. 21s. net.)
- Criminal Appeal and Evidence. By N. W. Sibley, B.A. (Unwin. 15s. net.)

NEW EDITIONS AND REPRINTS.

- Les Classiques Français Illustrés. Edited by Daniel O'Connor. Les Maîtres Sonneurs. By George Sand. La Mare au Diable. By George Sand. The Chouans. By Honoré Balzac. (Bell. 5s. net each.)
- Ranke's History of the Popes. With Chapters on Pius IX. and the Vatican Council, never translated before. Bell. 2 vols. 3s. 6d. each.)
- Lucretius. A Prose Translation. By H. A. J. Munro. (Bell. 5s.)
- Mignet's History of the French Revolution. (Bell. 3s. 6d.)
- Goethe's Autobiography. Revised translation by M. Steele Smith. (Bell. 2 vols. 2s. net each.)
- The Idylls of Theocritus and the Eclogues of Virgil. Translated by C. S. Calverley. (Bell. 2s. net.)
- Stephens' Book of the Farm. By James Macdonald, F.R.S.E. (Blackwood. 6 vols. 10s. 6d. each.)
- Benedictine: Sketches of Married Life. By E. H. Lacon Watson. (Brown, Langham. 1s. net.)
- Reflections of a Householder. By E. H. Lacon Watson. (Brown, Langham. 1s. net.)
- My Life: A Record of Events and Opinions. By A. R. Wallace. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- The Florence Press Books. Dialogus Johannis Ottovi Anglica in Arte Musica. By John Hothby. (Chatto & Windus. Probable price, 10s. 6d. net.)
- The New Mediæval Library. The Babe's Book: Mediæval Manners for the Young. From Dr. Furnivall's texts. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)
- The King's Classics. Edited by Professor I. Collancy. George Pettie's Pettite Pallace of Pettie His Pleasure. Sir Thomas More's Utopia. Edited by R. Steele.

- Swift's Battle of the Books. Edited by A. Gutkelch.
- The Four Last Things. By Sir Thomas More. Edited by Daniel O'Connor.
- Dante's Vita Nuova.
- The Song of Roland. Translated from old French by Mrs. Crosland. (Chatto & Windus. 1s. 6d. net.)
- The Old Spelling Shakespeare. Edited by F. O. Furnivall.
- The Comedy of Errors. (Chatto & Windus. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Shakespeare Classics. Edited by Professor I. Collancy.
- Brooke's Poem of Romeus and Juliet. Edited by P. A. Daniel.
- The Taming of a Shrew. Edited by F. S. Boas. (Chatto & Windus. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Works of Jane Austen. Edited by R. Brinsby Johnson. Vols I. and II. Pride and Prejudice. (Chatto & Windus.)
- The Open Air. By Richard Jefferies. (Chatto & Windus. 5s. net.)
- The St. Martin's Library.
- Jerusalem. By Sir Walter Besant and E. H. Palmer. (Chatto & Windus. 2s. net.)
- Wanderings in Arabia. By Charles M. Doughty. In 2 vols. (Duckworth. 16s. net.)
- Every Man in his Humour. By Ben Jonson. Edited by F. J. Cox. (Griffiths. Paper covers, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net.)
- The Maid's Tragedy. By Francis Beaumont and John Fletcher. Edited by F. J. Cox. (Griffiths. Paper, 6d. net; cloth, 1s. net.)
- The Wessex of Romance. By Wilkinson Sherren. (Griffiths. 6s. net.)
- Veterinary Pathology. Friedberger and Fröhner. Edited by Captain Hayes. (Hurst & Blackett. 2 vols. 21s. net.)
- Plays of Aeschylus: The Suppliant Maidens—The Persians—The Seven against Thebes—The Prometheus Bound. Translated into English verse by E. A. Morshead, M.A. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Life of Richard Cobden. By John Morley. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 8s. net.)
- Epic and Romance. By W. P. Ker, M.A. (Macmillan. 4s. net.)
- Town Life in the Fifteenth Century. 2 vols. By Alice S. Green. (Macmillan. 20s. net.)
- The Diary of John Evelyn, 1620-1706. With Introduction and Notes by Austin Dobson. (Macmillan. 3s. 6d.)
- Lyrical Poems of T. E. Brown. Selected by H. F. Brown and H. G. Dakyns. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Works of Oscar Wilde. 11 vols. (Methuen. 12s. 6d. net each.)
- The Poems of William Wordsworth. By N. C. Smith. Methuen. 15s. net.)
- The Life of Napoleon Bonaparte. By S. Baring-Gould. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Voyage of the "Fox" in the Arctic Seas in Search of Franklin and his Companions. By the late Admiral Sir F. Leopold M'Clintock, R.N. A cheap edition. (Murray.)
- Lectures on the History of the Eastern Church. By the late Dean Stanley. A cheap edition. (Murray.)
- Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. By A. R. Ropes. (Seeley. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Mrs. Thrale. By L. B. Seeley. (Seeley. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Round My House. By P. G. Hamerton. (Seeley. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Fanny Burney and Her Friends. By L. B. Seeley. (Seeley. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Dictionary of National Biography. Edited by Leslie Stephen and Sidney Lee. In 22 vols. (Smith, Elder. Cloth, gilt top, 15s. net each, or half-morocco, marbled edges, 21s. net each.)
- Courses of Study. By J. M. Robertson, M.P. A cheaper and greatly amplified edition. (Watts.) reprints series.) (Watts.)
- Man's Place in Nature. By T. H. Huxley. (R.P.A. cheap

"MIRACULOUS FOR THE PRICE"is what the Westminster Gazette says ofEVERYMAN'S LIBRARY.

CLOTH 1/- net.

LEATHER 2/- net.

On FEBRUARY 24th

the Sixth Issue, containing 50 Volumes will be published including:—

BLACKMORE'S LORNA DOONE.

By exclusive permission.

CARLYLE'S LETTERS and SPEECHES OF CROMWELL. 3 vols.

Introduction by W. A. SHAW, D. Litt.

CARY'S DANTE.

Specially edited, with fresh notes, by EDMUND GARDNER.

LANE'S MODERN EGYPTIANS.

With all the Illustrations.

PARKMAN'S CONSPIRACY OF PONTIAC. 2 vols.

Introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE, M.A.

PRESCOTT'S CONQUEST OF PERU.

Introduction by THOMAS SECCOMBE, M.A.

KINGSLEY'S WATER BABIES AND GLAUCUS. Introduction by ROSE KINGSLEY.SEELEY'S ECCE HOMO.

Introduction by Sir OLIVER LODGE.

CHAUCEER'S CANTERBURY TALES.

Specially edited by Principal BURRELL, M.A., with antiquity and quaintness of the text preserved.

MARCO POLO'S TRAVELS.

Introduction by JOHN MASEFIELD.

TACITUS. 2 vols.

Introduction by E. H. BLAKENEY.

THE FALL OF THE NIBELUNGS.

New Translation.

DICKENS' WORKS. 5 more vols.

Edited by G. K. CHESTERTON.

VOLTAIRE'S LIFE OF CHARLES XII.

Introduction by Rt. Hon. JOHN BURNS, M.P.

THACKERAY'S VANITY FAIR.

Introduction by Hon. WHITELAW REID.

CARLYLE'S SARTOR RESARTUS, &c.

Introduction by PROF. HUDSON.

AND MANY OTHERS.Full Lists now ready.

Ask your Bookseller for one, or will be sent post free by

J. M. DENT & Co.

ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA.

By EDMUND G. GARDNER.

Author of 'Dukes and Poets in Ferrara,' 'The Story of Florence,' &c. With an Appendix containing some hitherto Unpublished Letters of St. Catherine. A Study in the Italian Religion, Literature, and History of the Fourteenth Century. Illustrated in Photogravure, 18s. net.

"St. Catherine has been the theme of a good many recent books.....But the most elaborate and comprehensive biography is that of Mr. Edmund G. Gardner, who writes with obvious sympathy and with a full knowledge of all the materials.....An interesting book."—Daily Telegraph.

J. M. DENT & Co., Aldine House, Bedford Street, W.C.

"One of the great books of our own time."WANDERINGS IN ARABIA.

By CHARLES M. DOUGHTY, Author of "The Dawn in Britain."

With a Portrait and Map, in 2 vols. royal 8vo, 16s. net.

"One of the classics of travel, our chief author on Arabia, and one of the rare and curious masterpieces of English prose."—Observer.

LEGEND AND FOLKLORE OF THE HOLY LAND.

By J. E. HANAUER. With an Introduction by MARMADUKE PICKTHALL. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.

ETHICS OF REVOLT. By Dr.

GREVILLE MACDONALD. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

A book of essays on subjects of present-day interest.

THE PRE-RAPHAELITE BROTHERHOOD.

By FORD MADDOX HUEFFER. With 50 Illustrations, leather binding, 2s. 6d. net.; cloth, 2s. net.

A handy popular volume on the work of the well-known circle of English painters.

STOPFORD BROOKE'S NEW VOLUME.STUDIES IN POETRY. With a

Photogravure Portrait, crown 8vo, 6s. net.

*[Second Impression.]REMBRANDT. By BALDWIN BROWN.

With 46 Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

THOUGHTS OF LEONARDO DA VINCI AS RECORDED IN HIS NOTE BOOKS.

Edited by EDWARD MCCURDY. Uniform with "The Road-mender." With a Frontispiece, fcap. 8vo. cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

"For the thinker there can be no more delightful book."—Daily News.

GOD'S THOROUGHFARE. By

ARTHUR BUCKLEY. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net.

A way of new dimensions. Being an investigation made by a Logician, a Scientist, and a Theologian in the Forest of Science and other places, resulting in a discovery of New Dimensions, which form a way of being leading to the Spiritual.

MEMOIRS OF A SURREY LABOURER.

By GEORGE BOURNE, Author of "The Bettsworth Book." Crown 8vo, 6s.

This is a book that deals with a real character, and is in no sense fiction. What the author has done is to render a faithful portrait of an old gardener of his who is, to lovers of the country, the most interesting acquaintance that it is possible to meet. The Spectator says:—"He [the author] tells his story simply, in its simple setting of garden sights and sounds, springing crops, cloudy skies, sweltering sunshine; and his picture is of the real English peasant labourer."

MUIRHEAD AND GERTRUDE BONE'S NOTABLE WORK.CHILDREN'S CHILDREN. By

GERTRUDE BONE. Illustrated with upwards of 60 Drawings by MUIRHEAD BONE. Ordinary Edition, 6s. net; Limited Edition on Japanese Vellum (200 copies), 25s. net.

"With its gleams of humour, its gentleness, its reverent pity, it is a very tender study of country life, written by one who must know that life well, and sees it closely linked with the earth that moulds it. The author is fortunate in having for interpreter and commentator (rather than illustrator) Mr. Muirhead Bone. In these sensitive and tender drawings of fields and farms and their inhabitants the artist takes us far from the towns. Landscapes and figures alike are full of the atmosphere of the story; they catch the very spirit of country places, and of the people, unbeautiful save to the sympathetic eye, whose hearts the author lays open."—Times.

"Mrs. Bone's tale of peasant life is marked by a fine quality of restraint and a remarkable simplicity, which make the realism of its tragedy intensely impressive, while there is no jarring note to disturb the effect."—Athenæum.

THE CRESTED SEAS. By J. B.

CONNOLLY. With 8 Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

"These West Newfoundland tales, humorous, pathetic, stirring, are all redolent of that strange scent that seems to cling to the things of the sea. Perhaps none is more characteristic than the story called 'The Blasphemer,' in which Mr. James Connolly reflects so perfectly the sailor's religious sense—his belief in the supernatural."—Globe.

RACHEL CHALFONT, a novel.

By SOPHIE COLE. Crown 8vo, 6s.

*[Shortly.]ISLE RAVEN, a romance. By

OWEN VAUGHAN (Owen Rhoscomyl). Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Shortly.]

London:

DUCKWORTH & CO., 3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

PHILOSOPHY.

- Do the Dead Depart? and Other Questions. By E. Katharine Bates. (Werner Laurie. 6s. net.)
- The Development of Greek Philosophy. By Robert Adamson, LL.D. (Blackwood.)
- Thinking, Feeling, Doing. An Introduction to Mental Science. By E. W. Scripture, Ph.D., M.D. (Putnam. 9s. net.)
- Christian Science. By Lyman P. Powell. (Putnam. 5s. net.)
- Origin and Development of the Moral Ideas. By Edward Westermarck, Ph.D. In 2 vols. Vol. II. (Macmillan.)

SCIENCE.

- The Origin of Vertebrates. By Walter H. Gaskell. (Longmans.)
- A Study of Splashes. By A. M. Worthington, C.B., F.R.S. (Longmans.)
- Lathe Design for High and Slow-Speed Steels. By John T. Nicolson, D.Sc., and Dempster Smith. (Longmans.)
- Thermochemistry. By Julius Thomsen. Translated by Katharine A. Burke, B.Sc. (Lond.). (Longmans. 9s.)
- A Treatise on Chemistry. By H. E. Roscoe, F.R.S., and C. Schorlemmer, F.R.S. Vol. II. The Metals. (Macmillan. 30s. net.)
- The Origin of a Land Flora. By F. O. Bower, D.Sc. (Macmillan.)
- Comparative Anatomy of Vertebrates. Adapted from the German of Dr. Robert Wiedersheim by W. N. Parker, Ph.A. (Macmillan.)
- Diseases of Occupation. By Thomas Oliver, M.A. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Causation and Prevention of Tuberculosis (Consumption). By Arthur Newsholme, M.D., F.R.C.P. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Folk-Lore as an Historical Science. By G. L. Gomme. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Functional Nerve Diseases. By A. T. Schofield, M.D. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Pearls and Parasites. A series of Essays on Scientific Subjects. By A. E. Shipley, M.A. (Murray.)
- The Duty and Practice of Health. By C. W. Saleeby, M.D. (Grant Richards. 6s. net.)
- The Childhood of Man. By Dr. Leo Frobenius. (Seeley. 16s. net.)
- Astronomy of To-day. By Cecil G. Dolmage, M.A. (Seeley. 5s. net.)
- The Motor Car and its Engine. By John Batey. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

SOCIOLOGY AND POLITICS.

- A History of the 1900 Parliament. By James F. Hope. (Blackwood. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The New Order; a Forward Policy for Unionists. Edited by Lord Malmesbury. (Griffiths. 12s. 6d. net.)
- J. J. Rousseau: And Education by Nature. By Gabriel Compayré. (Harrap. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Herbert Spencer: And Scientific Education. By Gabriel Compayré. (Harrap. 2s. 6d. net.)
- Pestalozzi: And Elementary Education. By G. Compayré. (Harrap. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Japanese Nation in Evolution. By W. E. Griffis, D.D. (Harrap. 6s.)
- Time Limit and Local Option. A Review of the Licensing Questions. By Charles Roberts, M.P. (King. 1s. net.)
- The Causes of Poverty. By Callaghan McCarthy, B.A. (King. 2s. net.)
- Paraguay on Shannon. The Price of a Political Priesthood. By F. H. O'Donnell, M.A. (King. 6s. net.)
- Co-operation at Home and Abroad. By C. R. Fay, B.A. (King. 10s. 6d. net.)

- Infantile Mortality. Report of the Proceedings of the National Conference on Infantile Mortality held in Caxton Hall, Westminster, March, 1908. (King. 1s. 6d. net.)
- The Story of Crime. By H. L. Adam. (Werner Laurie. 12s. 6d. net.)
- India and the Empire. By the Hon. M. de P. Webb. (Longmans.)
- The Economic History of the United States. By Ernest Ludlow Bogart, Ph.D. (Longmans. 9s. net.)
- Work and Wages: in continuation of Lord Brassey's "Work and Wages" and "Foreign Work and English Wages." Vol. II. Wages and Employment. By Sydney J. Chapman, M.A. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Modern Egypt. By the Earl of Cromer. (Macmillan. 24s. net.)
- The Coming Struggle in Eastern Asia. By B. L. Putnam Weale. (Macmillan.)
- National and Social Problems. By Frederic Harrison. (Macmillan.)
- Charity and Social Life. By C. S. Loch, of the Charity Organisation Society. (Macmillan.)
- International Commercial Policies. With Special Reference to the United States. By George Mygatt Fisk, Ph.D. (Macmillan.)
- The Negro Races. By Jerome Dowd. Vol. I. (Macmillan. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Social and Industrial Problems. By L. G. Chiozza Money, M.P. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- Old Age Pensions. By W. Sutherland. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Humanity and its Problems. By A. Hook. (Methuen. 5s. net.)
- Indian Problems. By S. M. Mitra. With Introduction by Sir G. Birdwood, K.C.I.E., C.S.I., LL.D. (Murray.)
- A Critical Examination of Socialism. By W. H. Mallock. (Murray. 6s.)
- Problems of the Middle East. By Angus Hamilton. (Nash. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Swiss Democracy. By H. D. Lloyd and J. A. Hobson. (Unwin. 6s. net.)
- Electoral Reform. By Joseph King. (Unwin. 2s. 6d. net.)
- German Education, Past and Present. By F. Paulsen, Ph.D. Translated by T. Lorenz, Ph.D. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- The Socialist Movement in England. By Brougham Villiers. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

THEOLOGY.

- The Four Gospels in the Earliest Church History. By T. Nichol, D.D. (Blackwood.)
- Credo. By R. F. Horton, D.D. (Clarke. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The Infinite Affection. By C. S. Macfarland. (Clarke. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Social Paradise: A Vade-Mecum of the Theocracy. By R. de Bary. (Griffiths. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Catholicism of the Church of England. By The Hon. and Rev. James Adderley. (Griffiths. 2s. 6d. net.)
- The Creed of Buddha. By the Author of "The Creed of Christ." (Lane. 5s. net.)
- The Re-Birth of Religion. By Dr. A. S. Crapsey. (Lane. 5s. net.)
- Buddhism, Primitive and Present. By the Most Rev. Reginald Stephen Copleston, D.D. (Longmans.)
- Missions to Hindus: A Contribution to the Study of Missionary Methods. By Louis George Mylne. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Cardinal Newman and the Encyclical Pascendi Dominici Gregis. An Essay of the Most Rev. E. Thomas O'Dwyer. (Longmans. 1s. net.)
- A Ritual and Ceremonial Commentary on the Occasional Offices of Holy Baptism, Matrimony, Penance, Communion of the Sick, and Extreme Unction. By the Rev C. P. A. Burnett, B.D. (Longmans. 7s. 6d. net.)

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.NEW NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. net; post free, 5s. 4d.
SEAS BETWEEN; or, Called to the East and Claimed by the West. By ANNIE M. WOOD.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.
RUPERT BRETT. The Story of a Modern Experiment. By HARRY FORRESTER.

NEW BOOKS FOR CHILDREN.

Crown 8vo, cloth, Illustrated, 5s.
SIGN POSTS FOR CHILDREN. By A GRANDMOTHER, with a preface by the BISHOP OF GLASGOW AND GALLOWAY. Illustrated by Miss E. A. IBBS.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.
THE SOLDIERS OF THE QUEEN. By E. MARY DIXON. A Volume of Sketches, Fairy Stories, and Short Tales, written for boys and girls.

Crown 8vo, paper cover, 6d.
JAMES ANTHONY FROUDE. A Lecture delivered at the Richmond Athenæum, Surrey, on November 18th, 1907, by the Rev. ASTLEY COOPER.

NEW VOLUME OF VERSE.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d. net; post free, 2s. 9d.
THE TAKING OF QUEBEC, and Other Poems. By SIDNEY SAMSON.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW, LONDON, E.C.

Mr. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.MEMOIRS OF THE*COMTESSE de BOIGNE.

The THIRD Volume (1820-1830), completing the Work, is now ready. Demy 8vo, 10s. net.

"The second and third volumes are even more interesting than the first. The excellent translation will introduce these to a large number of readers."—Spectator.

Uniform with the above, 10s. net each:

Vol. I. (1781-1814) and Vol. II. (1815-1819).

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.MR. DE MORGAN'S NEW NOVEL.*SOMEHOW GOOD.

By WILLIAM DE MORGAN. Author of "Joseph Vance" and "Alice-for-Short."

A second large impression is ready of this delightful story.

"Mr. De Morgan is an institution."—Times.

MRS. BELLOC-LOWNDES'S NEW NOVEL.THE PULSE OF LIFE.

By Mrs. BELLOC-LOWNDES, Author of "Barbara Rebell," &c.

"A book of quality. The story is of unflagging interest; the characters are truly alive; their psychology is excellent; they are presented with a quite uncommon insight."—Vanity Fair.

SHEAVES.

By E. F. BENSON. Author of "The House of Defence."

[3rd Impression.

"Mr. Benson has never done anything better."—Truth.

WHITE ROSE OF WEARY LEAF

By VIOLET HUNT.

THE HISTORY OFAYTHAN WARING.

By VIOLET JACOB, Author of "The Sheepstealers."

"A supremely good novel."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE EXPLORER.

By W. S. MAUGHAM. Author of "The Merry-go-round."

[2nd Impression.

WM. HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

The FEBRUARY "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net.CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs; the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND! Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS! Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED! Some Book Pictures that we know no more.

A LONDON LETTER. New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor.

ANNALS OF PRINT. Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES. The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topographer—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classical Catalogue of the Noteworthy Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who, on application, will send a Specimen Copy free.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATEFIRST SPRING ANNOUNCEMENT LIST.*THEOLOGICAL TRANSLATION LIBRARY.*FORTHCOMING VOLUMES.

In One Volume, Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE.

By THEODOR HAERING, Professor of New Testament Exegesis, Dogmatics and Ethics at Tubingen.

Vol. II. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d.

PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.

Vol. II. Historical Books.

By OTTO PFLEIDERER, Professor of Practical Theology at the University, Berlin.

Recent Volumes.

Demy 8vo, Cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

INTRODUCTION TO THECANONICAL BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.

By CARL CORNILL, Professor of Old Testament Theology at the University of Breslau.

Now Ready. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

OUTLINES OF CHURCH HISTORY.

By H. von SCHUBERT, D.D.

With an Additional Chapter on Religious Thought and Life in England, during the 19th Century, by Miss Alice Gardner, Cambridge.

New Volume by DR. JOHN HUNTER.DE PROFUNDIS CLAMAVI.

By JOHN HUNTER, D.D., of Trinity Church, Glasgow.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS—The Atonement, The Universal Cross Inspiration, Revelation, The God of Jesus, Devotional Culture, No Separation from the Love of God, Faith in God.

The Best Results of Dr. Hunter's Studies in recent years will be put forth in this volume.

Large Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.FORTHCOMING VOLUMES.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s.

ANGLICAN LIBERALISM.

Twelve Essays by Professor Percy Gardner, Dr. Hastings Rashdall, Professor F. C. Burkitt, Rev. Dr. W. D. Morrison, Sir Thomas Dyke Acland, The Rev. The Master of the Temple, Rev. A. J. Carlyle, Professor A. Caldecott, Rev. A. L. Lilley, Rev. Hubert Handley, Rev. J. R. Wilkinson, Rev. C. R. Shaw Stewart.

HARNACK'S NEW TEST STUDIES.

Vol. II. Crown 8vo, Cloth, 6s.

THE SAYINGS OF JESUS.

By Dr. ADOLF HARNACK.

Vol. I. Recently Published, 6s.

LUKE THE PHYSICIAN.

About the great importance of the work there cannot be two opinions. It probably makes an epoch in the History of New Testament Literary criticism.—Christian World.

Recent Volumes.

Ready, Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s.

THE APOLOGETIC OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Rev. E. F. SCOTT, M.A., of Prestwick, Author of "The Fourth Gospel: its Purpose and Theology."

Ready, Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5s.

THE HISTORICAL EVIDENCE FOR THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST.

By KIRSOPP LAKE, M.A. (Oxon), Professor of N.T. Exegesis in the University of Leiden.

JESUS. By W. BOUSSET.

Ready, Cloth, 4s.

Professor of Theology, at the University of Gottengen.

Ready, Crown 8vo, Cloth, 6s.

NATURALISM AND RELIGION.

By RUDOLF OTTO, D.D. (of Gottingen). Translated by Professor J. Arthur Thomson.

CATALOGUES AND NEW LISTS POST FREE UPON APPLICATION.

WILLIAMS AND NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

- The Priest's Studies. By T. B. Scannell, D.D. (Longmans. 3s. 6d. net.)
- The National Church. By H. Hensley Henson, B.D. (Macmillan.)
- Buddhist Essays. By Paul Dahlke. Translated from the German by J. F. M'Kechnie. (Macmillan.)
- The Sanctuary of God, and Other Sermons. By the late Prebendary W. A. Whitworth. (Macmillan.)
- Introduction and Notes on the Apocalypse. Ch. I.—III. By the late Rev. F. J. A. Hort, D.D. (Macmillan.)
- St. Paul's Epistles to the Thessalonians. Greek Text, with Commentary by the Rev. G. Milligan, D.D. (Macmillan.)
- A Commentary on Exodus. By A. H. M'Neile, B.D. (Methuen. 10s. 6d.)
- Further Studies in the Prayer Book. By J. Dowden, D.D. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Spiritual Counsels to District Visitors. By the late Bishop of St. Andrews. (Mowbray. 1s.)
- The Mysteries of Grace. By the Rev. T. A. Lacey, M.A. (Mowbray. 1s.)
- The Trial and Crucifixion of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. By M. Brodrick. (Murray.)
- The Conduct of Life; or, The Universal Order of Confucius. By Ku Hung Ming, M.A. (Murray.)
- Modernism: A Record and Review. By A. L. Lilley. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
- The Book of Isaiah. Critically Translated with Exegetical Notes. By G. H. Box, M.A. (Pitman. 6s. net.)
- The Evolution of the Messianic Idea. By the Rev. W. O. E. Oesterley, B.A. (Pitman. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Supposition and Certainty. By the Rev. J. S. Holden, M.A. (Scott. 2s. net.)
- Mission Preaching for a Year. Edited by the Rev. W. H. Hunt. In 4 quarterly parts. (Skeffington. 2s. 6d. net each part.)
- The Christian Life Here and Hereafter. By the late F. Watson, D.D. (Skeffington. 5s. net.)
- The Sermon on the Mount. By the Rev. J. R. Cohn, M.A. (Skeffington. 3s. 6d. net.)
- Christ and the Nation. By H. Hensley Henson. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- The Programme of Modernism. Translated from the Italian. With Introduction by A. L. Lilley, M.A. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- Religion and Historic Faiths. By Otto Pfeiderer, D.D. (Unwin. 5s. net.)
- The First Easter Dawn. By Charles T. Goshan. (Watts.)
- Christian Life. By Theodore Haering, Prof. of New Testament Exegesis, Dogmatics, and Ethics at Tubingen. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Primitive Christianity. Vol. II. Historical Books. By Otto Pfeiderer, Prof. of Practical Theology, Berlin. (Williams & Norgate. 10s. 6d.)
- Liberal Anglicanism. Twelve Essays by Prof. P. Gardner, Dr. Hastings Rashdall, Sir T. D. Acland, Prof. E. C. Burkitt, Rev. A. L. Lilley, Dr. W. D. Morrison, &c. (Williams & Norgate. 5s.)
- The Sayings of Jesus. By Dr. Adolf Harnack. (Williams & Norgate. 6s.)
- De Profundis Clamavi, and Other Sermons. By Dr. J. Hunter of Glasgow. (Williams & Norgate. 5s. net.)
- Memorials of Old Derbyshire. Edited by Rev. J. C. Cox, LL.D. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)
- Memorials of Old Warwickshire. Edited by Alice Dryden. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)
- Memorials of Old London. Edited by Rev. P. H. Ditchfield, M.A., F.S.A. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)
- American Sketches. By Charles Whibley. (Blackwood. 6s.)
- The "Passer-By" in London. A tribute to Wren, Gibbons, and John Stow, with some chapters on the Romance of the Old City of London. By W. S. Campbell. (Chapman & Hall. 6s.)
- The North Devon Coast. By Charles G. Harper. (Chapman & Hall. 15s. net.)
- The Rhine. By H. J. Mackinder. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
- Assisi of Saint Francis. By Mrs. Robert Goff. (Chatto & Windus. 20s. net.)
- The Path to Paris. The Record of a Riverside Journey from Le Havre to Paris. By Frank Rutter. (Lane. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Sunny Days in Italy. By Elsie Lathrop. (Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.)
- African Nature Notes and Reminiscences. By F. C. Selous. (Macmillan.)
- Herculaneum: Past, Present, and Future. By Charles Waldstein, Ph.D. (Macmillan.)
- The Story of the Guides. By Colonel G. J. Younghusband, C.B. (Macmillan.)
- Highways and Byways in Hampshire. By D. H. Montray Read. With Illustrations by A. B. Connor. (Macmillan. 6s.)
- American Shrines in England. By A. T. Story. (Methuen. 6s.)
- Home Life in Germany. By Mrs. Alfred Sidgwick. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Real India. By J. D. Rees, C.I.E., M.P. (Methuen. 10s. 6d. net.)
- The Romance of Northumberland. By A. G. Bradley. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- A Book of Yorkshire. By J. S. Fletcher. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Alps. By W. A. B. Coolidge, M.A. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- The Empire of the East. By George Lynch. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)
- Some American Impressions. By Monsignor Count Vay de Vaya and Luskod. (Murray.)
- From Peking to Mandalay. By R. F. Johnstone, M.A., F.R.G.S. (Murray.)
- The Pleasant Land of France. By Rowland E. Prothero, M.V.O. (Murray.)
- From Peking to Sikhim. By Count de Lesdain. (Murray.)
- Old England. By W. Shaw Sparrow. (Nash. 24s. net.)
- Hyde Park: Its History and Romance. By Mrs. Alec Tweedie. (Nash. 15s. net.)
- New Zealand Revisited: Recollections of the Days of My Youth. By the Rt. Hon. Sir J. Eldon Gorst. (Pitman. 12s. 6d. net.)
- Servia and the Servians. By M. Chedo Mijatovitch. (Pitman. 16s. net.)
- Through Italy with Car and Camera. By Dan Fellowes Platt. (Putnam. 21s. net.)
- Old Paths and Legends of the New England Border: Connecticut, Deerfield, Berkshire. By Katharine M. Abbott. (Putnam. 15s. net.)
- Ancient Italy. By Ettore Pais. Translated by C. D. Curtis. (Unwin. 17s. net.)
- The Confessions of a Beachcomber. By E. J. Banfield. (Unwin. 15s. net.)
- Peru. By C. R. Enock, F.R.G.S. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- By Desert Ways to Baghdad. By Louisa Jebb. (Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)
- Tramps Round the Mountains of the Moon and Through the Back Gate of the Congo State. By T. B. Johnson, M.A. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- The Itinerary of John Leland. Vol. II., containing Parts IV. and V. of the Itinerary. Edited by Lucy Toulmin Smith. (Bell. 12s. net.)
- The Priory Church of St. Bartholomew the Great, Smithfield. By George Worley. (Bell. 1s. 6d. net.)
- Memorials of Old Norfolk. Edited by H. J. Dukinfield Astley, M.A., Litt.D. (Bemrose. 15s. net.)

NATURE BOOKS.

ADVENTURES IN BIRD-LAND.

A Book for Boys. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Home Life in Birdland," "Woodland, Field, and Shore," &c. With 90 Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author and 100 Pen-Sketches by E. Richmond Paton. Cloth gilt, demy 8vo, 6s. net.

BY MEADOW, GROVE, AND STREAM.

An introduction to Nature Study. By HENRY HILTON BROWN, F.E.S. With two Folded Coloured Plates, Photogravure Frontispiece and 171 figures in Black and White, from Original Drawings by the Author. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

BY-PATHS IN NATURE.

By FRANK STEVENS, Author of "Adventures in Pondland," &c. With 72 Illustrations. Crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

CREATURES OF THE SEA.

Being the Life Stories of some Sea Birds, Beasts, and Fishes. By FRANK T. BULLEN, F.R.G.S. Demy 8vo. With 40 Full-page Illustrations by THEO. CARRERAS. Cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

EVERY BOY'S BOOK OF BRITISH NATURAL HISTORY.

A Reliable Guide to British Wild-Life and Nature Photography. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Lord Avebury. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

FIFTY-TWO NATURE RAMBLES.

A Series of Open-Air Talks for Young People. By W. PERCIVAL WESTELL, F.L.S., M.B.O.U., Author of "Every Boy's Book of Natural History," etc. With five Coloured Plates from Drawings, and 100 other Illustrations from Photographs. Large crown 8vo., cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

HIDDEN BEAUTIES OF NATURE.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S. With 59 Illustrations from Sketches and Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOME-LIFE IN BIRD-LAND.

By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "Woodland, Field, and Shore." With four Coloured Plates, and over 80 other Illustrations from Photographs taken direct from Nature by the Author. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

HONEY-BEE, THE

Its Nature, Homes, and Products. By W. H. HARRIS, B.A., B.Sc. With 82 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

HOW TO STUDY WILD FLOWERS.

By REV. GEORGE HENSLOW, M.A., F.L.S., &c., Author of "Plants of the Bible." New Edition, with 12 double-page Coloured Plates and 57 other Illustrations. Cloth gilt, with coloured picture on cover, 2s. 6d.

NATURE, CURIOUS AND BEAUTIFUL.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S., Author of "Hidden Beauties of Nature," &c. With 69 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

NATURE: THROUGH MICROSCOPE AND CAMERA.

By RICHARD KERR, F.G.S., F.R.A.S., Author of "Nature, Curious and Beautiful." Illustrated with 65 Photomicrographs. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. net.

PONDS AND ROCK POOLS.

With Hints on Collecting for, and the Management of, the Micro-Aquarium. By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

POPULAR NATURAL HISTORY OF THE LOWER ANIMALS (INVERTEBRATES).

By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

RAMBLES WITH NATURE STUDENTS.

By MRS. BRIGHTWEN, Author of "Wild Nature Won by Kindness," &c. With 130 Illustrations. Large crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

THROUGH A POCKET LENS.

By HENRY SCHERREN, F.Z.S., Author of "Ponds and Rock Pools," &c. Profusely Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.

WOODLAND, FIELD, AND SHORE.

Wild Nature depicted with Pen and Camera. By OLIVER G. PIKE, Author of "In Bird-Land with Field Glass and Camera." With two Coloured Plates, and 101 Engravings of Birds, Animals, and Insects from Photographs taken direct from nature by the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

LONDON:

The Religious Tract Society, 4, Bouverie Street, E.C.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS' NEW BOOKS.

THROUGH ITALY WITH CAR AND CAMERA.

By DAN FELLOWES PLATT. With 200 Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth extra, gilt top. 21s. net.

A HISTORY OF NURSING.

The Evolution of the Methods of Care for the Sick from the Earliest Times to the Foundation of the First English and American Training Schools for Nurses.

By LAVINIA L. DICK, R.N., Secretary of the American Federation of Nurses and of the International Council of Nurses, &c., and M. ADELAIDE NUTTING, R.N., Superintendent of Nurses, The Johns Hopkins Hospital; Principal of Johns Hopkins Training School for Nurses, &c. Fully Illustrated. Two volumes. 8vo. Cloth. 21s. net.

HEROES OF THE NATIONS.

Fully Illustrated. Crown 8vo. Cloth, extra. 5s. Each.

42. CHARLES THE BOLD, LAST DUKE OF BURGUNDY, 1433-1477. By RUTH PUTNAM, author of "A Medieval Princess," translator of Blok's "History of the Netherlands," &c.

PRINCESS NADINE.

By CHRISTIAN REID. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6s.

This novel brings together a charming group of women and an interesting company of men, most of them belonging to the great world of rank or the brilliant world of fashion. The scene is laid largely in Italy.

THINKING, FEELING, DOING.

An Introduction to Mental Science.

By E. W. SCRIPTURE, PH.D., M.D., Assistant Neurologist, Columbia University, formerly Director of the Psychological Laboratory at Yale University. With Diagrams. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 9s. net.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

Its Relation to Philosophy, Science, and Religion.

By LYMAN P. POWELL. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 5s. net.

CATHEDRALS AND CLOISTERS OF MIDLAND FRANCE. Burgundy, Savoy, Dauphine, Auvergne, Aquitaine.

By ELISE WHITLOCK ROSE and VIDA HUNT FRANCIS, author of "Cathedrals and Cloisters of the South of France." With four Photogravure and 200 other Illustrations from original Photographs, and a Map. Two volumes. Cloth extra, gilt tops, stamped on side with full gilt and colour, boxed. 21s. net.

These two volumes, uniform with "Cathedrals of the South of France," are the fruit of many successive summers spent in wanderings in "rare unspoiled France" where the tourist and his suitcase are practically unknown.

With pen and camera the authors picture the Cathedrals of the Midi, presenting the views of the consecrated structures as they appear to-day, and telling their life story, with its drama and its glory in the days of old, before secularism sought to lay its paralysing hand upon them.

THE SALON.

A Study of French Society and Personalities of the 18th Century.

By HELEN CLERGUE. Fully Illustrated. 8vo. Cloth extra, gilt top. 12s. 6d. net.

THE NORTHERN ITALIAN PAINTERS OF THE RENAISSANCE.

By BERNHARD BERENSON, author of "Florentine Painters of the Renaissance," "Central Italian Painters of the Renaissance," "Venetian Painters of the Renaissance," &c. Crown 8vo. Cloth extra. Illustrated. 6s.

MONEY HUNGER.

A Brief Study of Commercial Immorality in the United States

By HENRY A. WISE WOOD. 8vo. Cloth. 4s. net.

This book is published at an opportune moment, and will be found interesting in connection with the recent financial troubles in the United States. The author presents a thoughtful study of the monetary conditions existing at the present day in the United States, and the volume will be read with interest by all classes of readers.

New List Now Ready.

24, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C., AND
NEW YORK.

MESSRS. BELL'S ANNOUNCEMENTS

JUST PUBLISHED—Fcap. 4to, 12s. net.

LELAND'S ITINERARY. Newly

Edited from the MSS. by LUCY TOULMIN SMITH.

Vol. II., containing Parts IV. and V., with an Appendix of Extracts from Leland's Collectanea.

It is proposed to complete this edition in five volumes, of which Vol. I. (containing Parts I.-III.) price 18s. net, and Vol. III. (containing the "Itinerary in Wales"), price 10s. 6d. net, are already published.

New Works by ABBOT GASQUET, D.D., O.S.B.

JUST PUBLISHED—Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE BLACK DEATH

In 1348 and 1349. New and Revised Edition.

READY IMMEDIATELY—Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE LAST ABBOT OF GLASTONBURY. And other Essays. Illustrated.

IN THE PRESS—Crown 8vo.

THE OLD ENGLISH BIBLE.

And other Essays.

Prospectus on application.

BOHN'S LIBRARIES.

"The new series of Bohn's Libraries, on which judicious book-buyers have long learned to keep a careful eye."—Athenæum.

NEW VOLUMES.

3 vols. small post 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

RANKE'S HISTORY OF THE POPES DURING THE LAST FOUR CENTURIES. Translated by E. FOSTER. New and Revised Edition, with considerable Additions.

* * This edition has been revised throughout by the latest German edition, the chapters on Pius IX. and the Vatican Council have been translated for the first time, and a new and very full Index has been added.

Small post 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MIGNET'S HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION, from 1789 to 1814. New and Revised Edition, entirely reset.

"Mignet's striking if not wholly impartial history of the Revolution—perhaps the best short history."—Athenæum.

Small post 8vo, 5s.

LUCRETIVS. A Prose Translation.

By H. A. J. MUNRO. Reprinted from the Final (Fourth) Edition. With an introduction by J. D. DUFF, M.A.

* * The Latest Catalogue of the Libraries, now numbering upwards of 800 Volumes in all departments of Literature, will be sent on application.

THE YORK LIBRARY.

Fcap 8vo. Cloth 2s. net. Limp Leather 3s. net.

GOETHE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

('Dichtung und Wahrheit'). Revised translation by M. STEELE-SMITH, Head Lecturer in Modern Languages at Newnham College, Cambridge. With an Introduction and Bibliography by KARL BREUL, Litt.D., Ph.D. 2 Vols. [Shortly.]

LES CLASSIQUES FRANÇAIS ILLUSTRÉS.

Publiés sous la direction de DANIEL O'CONNOR.

Small crown 8vo, with 8 Full-page illustrations in Colour and about 30 in Black and White, 5s. net.

NOW READY.

GEORGE SAND: LES MAÎTRES SONNEURS.

Préface d'ÉMILE FAGUET, de l'Académie Française. Illustrations de M. V. WHEELHOUSE.

GEORGE SAND: LA MARE AU DIABLE.

Notice Analytique de C. A. SAINTE-BEUVE. Illustrations de GERTRUDE LEESE.

READY SHORTLY.

BALZAC: LES CHOUANS.

Illustrations de J. BLAKE GREENE.

Illustrated Prospectus on application.

HANDBOOKS OF THE GREAT MASTERS IN PAINTING AND SCULPTURE.

CHEAPER REISSUE.

Post 8vo, with 40 Full-page Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece, 3s. 6d. net each.

20 Volumes already published.

JUST PUBLISHED.

BRUNELLESCHI. By LEADER SCOTT.

WILKIE. By LORD RONALD SUTHERLAND-GOWER, M.A.

GAUDENZIO FERRARI. By ETHEL HALSEY.

GERARD DOU. By W. MARTIN, Ph.D. Translated by CLARA BELL.

READY MARCH 4th.

CARLO CRIVELLI. By G. McNEIL RUSHFORTH, M.A.

MANTEGNA. By MAUD CRUTTWELL.

MICHAEL ANGELO. By LORD RONALD SUTHERLAND-GOWER, M.A.

SODOMA. By the COUNTESSA LORENZO PRIULI-BON. Write for Illustrated Prospectus.

BELL'S MINIATURE BIOGRAPHIES.

Pott 8vo, each with Eight Illustrations, Cloth, 1s. net; Limp Leather, with Photogravure Frontispiece, 2s. net.

Painters—

NEW VOLUMES.

BOTTICELLI. By R. H. HOBART CUST.

DA VINCI. By R. H. HOBART CUST.

Musicians—

GRIEG. By E. MARKHAM LEE. [Ready Feb. 19th. Illustrated List on application.

Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

DECORATIVE HERALDRY.

A Practical Handbook of its Artistic Treatment. By G. W. EVE. With about 200 Illustrations. New and Revised Edition.

THE BEST PRACTICAL WORKING DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

WEBSTER'S INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

TWENTIETH CENTURY EDITION.

2348 Pages.] Revised and enlarged, with an Appendix of 25,000 Words, Phrases and Definitions. [5000 Illustrations.

Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY, Editor of the Oxford English Dictionary, says:—"In this its latest form, and with its large Supplement and numerous appendixes, it is a wonderful volume, which well maintains its ground against all rivals on its own lines. The 'definitions,' or more properly 'explanations of meaning,' in 'Webster' have always struck me as particularly terse and well put; and it is hard to see how anything better could be done within the limits."

Write for Descriptive Pamphlet, with specimen pages, prices, and opinions of other eminent men, sent post free on application.

LONDON: GEORGE BELL & SONS, York House, Portugal Street, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 21.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., $\frac{1}{2}$ d. Abroad, 1d.]

CONTENTS.

	PAGE		PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK	745	What the Housing Bill Should Do. By E. L. C. Watson	762
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—		The Russian Priest. By F. W. Groves Campbell	762
The Spirit of our Foreign Policy	748	The Blasphemy Laws. By the Rev. Stewart D. Headlam	762
The Present Duty of Free Traders	749	British Journalism and the Anti-Christian Movement. By Richard Davey and Robert Dell	763
The New Situation in Europe	750	"A Woman's Charter." By Ottilie Hancock and Evelyn Sharp	764
Disorder and Disestablishment	752	The Suffragists and the Law. By W. M. C.	754
LIFE AND LETTERS:—		"England and Mr. Meredith." By A. Dutchman	765
The Arya Samaj. By Henry W. Nevinson	753	POETRY:—
The Scare-Mind	754	The Pantheist. By G. M. Hort	765
The Light of Conflagrations	755	REVIEWS:—
The Triumph of the Sweet Pea	756	The Resurgent Dragon	765
LETTERS FROM ABROAD:—		Critics of Socialism.—I. Mr. Arnold Forster	766
The Naval Race and German Finance. By Ed. Bernstein	757	A Professor of Belles Lettres	767
THE DRAMA:—		Annals of an Eton House. By B.	768
Hamlet and Rosmer. By M.	759	The Soul of the English People	769
THE WORLD OF BOOKS	760	A Budget of French Criticism	770
Books to be Read	760	THE WEEK IN THE CITY	772
LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
The Nation and the Railways. By R.	761
Housing in German Towns. By Professor Rud. Eberstadt	761

The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Prime Minister, we are glad to report, is recovering from his attack of influenza. During its course, the Liberal Party in Parliament has allowed itself to be fluttered unduly by an article in the "Times," suggesting that the Prime Minister may be disposed to transfer his leadership from the House of Commons to the House of Lords. It may be prudent to remember the source of these reflections, and the fact that they simply reproduce an old and discredited rumour. As a matter of fact, there is not one tittle of authority for them. They proceed from the office of the "Times," and from no Liberal quarter. The Prime Minister is probably the last person in the world to furnish the enemy with such an argument in the controversy with the House of Lords as his transference to that House, and his direction of the Ministry from such a position, would supply. It is safe to say that the idea of a Liberal peer-Premier expired thirteen years ago.

* * *

THE dispute over the Austrian railway projects in the Balkans continues, and each day has seen its scare or its official polemic. There have been rumours of Russian military preparations in the Caucasus, and though these were construed as a means of threatening the Sultan to withdraw his favours from Austria, it is more probable that they had reference to the continued encroachments of Turkey upon Persia. Viennese opinion seems to realise that Baron von Aerenthal has made a mistake in advertising his intentions so recklessly, and Russia is even assured that Austria would welcome a Danube-Adriatic line under Russian auspices. As this latter line would cross the Austrian line, and so neutralise its strategical value, it is hard to believe that this assurance is sincere. But the fact is, of course, that the short and easy Austrian line could be ready many years before the long and difficult Russian project. In the interval the Macedonian question must be settled somehow. A semi-official article in the "Rossiya" administers a dignified and well-merited rebuke to Austria, which is accused with justice of compromising the future of reform, and destroying the unity of the Concert. The same point was made in an unusually frank communiqué issued by Reuter's Agency on behalf of the Foreign Office. An ill-informed rumour has suggested that Great Britain, France, Italy, and Russia are forming a quadruple entente to control the Balkan question. Nothing, on the contrary, is more striking than the solidarity between official Italy and official Austria. France, of course, echoes the Russian view.

* * *

THE debate on Army and Navy expenditure, which will probably occur on Monday week, offers a distracting variety of resolutions and amendments. The body of Liberal members, representing, we are sure, the majority of the Parliamentary party, who desire reductions in the Estimates, have drawn up the following very moderate resolution:—

"That, in view of the continued friendly relations with foreign Powers announced in the Gracious Speech from the Throne, this House trusts that further reductions may be made in the expenditure on armaments, and effect be given to the policy of retrenchment and reform to which the Government is pledged."

This motion is obviously friendly to the Government, and we hope that at least some modification of it will be accepted by them. On the other hand, eighty-two members of the centre section of the party have memorialised the Premier, calling for "complete efficiency" in Imperial defence, and deprecating any pressure on the Government to modify the Naval Estimates. The Opposition, which earlier in the controversy coquetted with the Liberal economists, have now tabled an amendment emphasising the "paramount importance" of Imperial defence, and declaring that the House will grant all requisite supplies. The main, though not the complete, objective of all these movements will be next year's Naval Estimates. This year's Estimates, we believe, have been reduced, thanks to a special effort on the part of the Cabinet. But they will probably exhibit a net increase of £800,000 or £900,000, due largely to the higher expenditure on coal and food. This suggests Lord Brassey's point that economies ought to be effected in the personnel of the Navy, and in the maintenance and repairs of ships in commission.

* * *

BEHIND this considerable though not overwhelming growth, which is not balanced by a small and unreal reduction in the Army Estimates, lies the prospect of a great increase in the shipbuilding vote for 1909 to 1910. It is said that the Government will forecast such an increase should the revised shipbuilding programme of the German Government be carried out. The expansion would go on developing from year to year, and would involve a larger outlay in 1910 even than next year. It is possible, however, that communications may again be opened up with the German Government—a delicate and difficult but not impossible procedure—and that a mutual and corresponding curtailment of programmes may take place. This is the capital point of policy, at which we hope that the friends of peace and reasonable economy will aim. If on Monday week the Liberal Party is committed to a great new naval programme, the party unity is gravely qualified, while the period both of economy and of social reform is practically closed. We look confidently to the Prime Minister and Mr. Asquith to avert such a disaster.

* * *

THE Anglo-Russian Agreement was again debated in Parliament on Monday on a motion of Lord Percy suggesting that the Convention involved a material sacrifice of British interests, and left the international situation vague. Lord Percy was milder in tone than Lord Curzon, and Mr. Balfour milder than Lord Percy. Both the Opposition leaders in the Commons definitely pledged themselves to accept the letter and the spirit of the Convention and to work it. The arguments on both sides were largely strategic, the effect of the Convention on Persian liberties being barely noticed. The main Opposition contention was that the Agreement gave Russia an equality of interest with us in Thibet and a common interest with us in Afghanistan—both novelties—and that in Persia special British interests were either undefined, such as in the Persian Gulf, or ill-guarded. Sir Edward Grey's answer was that Russia had gained so strong a foothold that we could only hope to save the remains of British interests. Generally, strategic considerations had been paramount with the Government. Our great defensive gain was that we had closed Seistan to a Russian advance on India, Russia agreeing to lay down no strategic railways in time of peace. This seemed important to Mr. Balfour, who has been much concerned about the Seistan route; while Mr. Morley described the Convention as the "most momentous" of our Asian agreements, and thought that it strengthened both Western Powers in Eastern eyes by ending a "squalid and mischievous rivalry." The Opposition declined to divide on the Percy amendment.

* * *

SWEDEN has been greatly, and we think justly, alarmed at a Russian proposal to cancel the Convention concerning the Aland Islands between France, Great Britain, and Russia, which formed part of the Treaty of Paris. This Convention bound Russia not to fortify these Baltic islands or to maintain any military establishment on them. They command Stockholm, and if fortified might bottle up the Gulf of Bothnia, and go far to make the Baltic a closed sea. Russia cannot disturb the status quo without the leave of France and Great Britain, and we strongly hope that we shall firmly refuse permission, for we have a national, an historic, and a naval interest in the question. It was, for instance, keenly debated in the 'thirties. Russia declares that she does not want to fortify Aland; if so, she need not disturb a treaty to which she has submitted for more than half a century. Even if she does not at once fortify, and the Convention is torn up, Sweden will be compelled to fortify Stockholm, to cut a canal from the capital to the northern coast, and to maintain a naval station and force there. England cannot lay so heavy a burden on a small and thoroughly peaceful and progressive community.

* * *

THE position in Morocco has drifted very rapidly this week in the direction which M. Jaurès foresaw. France has chosen, in obedience to a Machiavellian maxim as old as Empire itself, to support the weaker of the two candidates to the Moroccan throne. The stronger might have restored order, but the weaker must lean on foreign aid. The Bank of Morocco has accordingly decided to advance two and a-half million francs to Mulai Aziz, nominally for the police of the ports, really, one suspects, to aid him to recapture his capital and his throne. Meanwhile, three columns under General d'Amade are raiding and invading in the interior with Casa Blanca as their now distant base. Everyone has now forgotten that the French troops are still nominally avenging the murder of eight working men in Casa Blanca. Casa Blanca itself has been ruined, and it is now the remote interior which suffers. Their object is, presumably, to hold the line by which Mulai Hafid, "the Sultan of the South," would naturally advance to Fez, the capital which proclaimed him seven weeks ago. Two of these columns were heavily engaged between the 16th and 18th, and rumour talked of a disaster. The fact, apparently, is that a column under Colonel Taupin was attacked in a defile, exhausted its ammunition, made seven bayonet charges, and was ultimately obliged to retire by a rapid march to the coast. The incident is not serious, save in so far as it commits General d'Amade to fresh exploits.

* * *

THE expedition against the Zakka Khels has advanced successfully to a point commanding the Bazar Valley and its communications are said to be secure. Its work has been to disperse small bands of "sniping" sharpshooters, and to destroy their mountain fastnesses. This it is doing with little loss, though one officer has been killed, while the ranks of the tribesmen are, say the correspondents, being thinned. We are glad to see that the troops, while they destroy forts, respect the shrines and the fruit trees of their enemy.

* * *

THE second reading of the Scottish Land Bill was carried on Tuesday by a majority of 244—the minority of 103 containing two or three Scottish Liberals, represented in the debate by Mr. Munro Ferguson (who supports the Valuation Bill) and Mr. H. J. Tennant. The social need for such a Bill was pithily stated by the Lord Advocate, who stated that two years ago more people emigrated from Scotland than from Ireland, the deserted country of the Empire, and that there were nearly three million acres of deer forest. Mr. Sinclair's main point in defence was that under it the landlord only lost arbitrary power. The machinery of the Bill could not be handed over to the County Councils, for they were not representative enough, and what has been called the "motor-car qualification," which applies to many of the larger English counties, is still more absolute in Scotland. This is a hint that the Government will not accept from the Lords amendments anglicising the measure. The English public hardly realises the remarkable depth and strong feeling of the agitation in Scotland in its favour.

* * *

THE great rating question has twice invaded the House of Commons during the week. On Tuesday Mr. Asquith—who is showing great powers of mind in the conduct of Parliamentary affairs—pronounced on a private motion for a new valuation distinguishing between site value and improved values, and for the taxation of land values. He also laid down three valuable principles for regulating Imperial aid to local administration—first, that localities must always bear some share of the burden which the Exchequer relieved; secondly, that Imperial grants should be made for national services locally administered, not for local services locally administered; thirdly, that such bribing subventions as the Agricultural Rates Act must cease.—On the following day the second reading of the Scottish Valuation Bill produced a brief debate. The Bill was properly treated as the basis of the system of taxing land values. Mr. Harold Cox practically led the Opposition with an ingenious thesis that the Bill would shift the burden from well-to-do folk, living on the outskirts of towns, to struggling people living in the centre. In what towns, we should like to know, do the work-people live in the centre? The tendency is to live on the outskirts—a tendency checked by the heavy burden of the rates thrown on houses (i.e., on the building trade) and by the practical exemption of land not built upon. Mr. Bonar Law capped Mr. Cox by declaring that the economics of the Bill were the economics of the mad-house. Mr. Cox's motion, seconded by a county Liberal, Mr. Soares, was lost by a majority of 264 votes, the Scottish Liberal and Labour members being solid in support. The argument for the rating of land values is admirably put by Mr. Crompton Llewelyn Davies in an article in Thursday's "Westminster Gazette."

* * *

THE Government did not interfere in Friday week's fruitless debate on Mr. Charles McArthur's Ecclesiastical Disorders Bill. Mr. McArthur's proposal was to set up a paid Administrative Commission, with the Bishop of the diocese attached as an unpaid Commissioner, armed with powers to inquire into illegal practices and ornaments, specified in schedules, and to act, on the Bishop's standing aside, by way of suspending or depriving recalcitrant clergy. Mr. Masterman proposed as an amendment to free the Church from State control and give it powers of self-government. Well-paid barristers, he said, of the Commission, were always left to defend indefensible things. He suggested that a policy of mutual proscription would break up the Church, which would be ruined when it was stripped of Low Churchmen, who did not believe in baptismal regeneration, Broad Churchmen who rejected the Athanasian Creed, and High Churchmen, who were lax on ritual. Generally, Labour and Liberal members rejected the coercion of Ritualists and took the line that the House of Commons could only be appealed to, not to settle Church difficulties, but to cut the connection between Church and State. Mr. Austin Taylor, however, declared that under the High Church predominance the Church was "reeling back into medievalism"; and Mr. Walsh, a Labour member, thought that disestablishment was not within half a century of practical politics. No Liberal supported the Low Church position of secular penalties for spiritual offences.

* * *

THE London County Council, under its present managers, is surely the meanest public body in the United Kingdom. On Tuesday it decided to sell the Thames steamboats, though the actual annual saving to the ratepayers of London by the abandonment of the service is only £7,700, or one-twentieth of a penny in the pound. The sums devoted to capital charges remain, and are now a purely unprofitable burden. The Moderates' argument in favour of relinquishing a public service which they had supported was that it did not pay and offered no prospect of paying. But the Woolwich Ferry does not pay, nor do the Thames bridges, which are now all free. The steamboats involved no interference with private enterprise, which had failed, and represented partly a ferry service, partly a service of health and pleasure widely spread among all classes of the London people. It also served as an advertisement of the chief beauties of the great London site.

* * *

THE Paris correspondent of the "Times" announces that the new Archbishop has condemned the two new books of the Abbé Loisy—"Simple Reflexions" and "Les Evangiles Synoptiques," which a Roman Catholic correspondent reviewed in last week's NATION, forbidding the clergy and faithful to read, print, keep, or defend them. The decree is, of course, only of local application. Meanwhile, we think it right to say that the Abbé Loisy himself repudiates the interpretation which "W. S. T." places on his exposition of doctrine and his attitude to the Roman Catholic Church. M. Loisy does not contemplate leaving the Roman Communion. His "adieu" was to the readers of an expiring review. He has arranged to continue the work thus abandoned in another Catholic review.

* * *

THE Italian Chamber, our Rome correspondent writes, is now facing a question which has agitated not only the young kingdom since its constitution about forty years ago, but this country also. It is the struggle between those who favour religious teaching in the schools, and the partisans of an entirely secular education. Signor Giolitti and his Minister of Public Instruction, Signor Rava, had found one of those middle ways which are so dear to Italians, because in their Machiavellian ability they end by not solving anything. Religious teaching was to be imparted to those children whose parents asked for it, and according to the regulations decided by the municipal authorities, under whose direction the primary schools are. Both Catholics and anti-Catholics, however, are not very satisfied with this remedy: the Catholics because they observe that in the cases in which the municipality is in the hands of anti-Clericals, their regulations and the teacher who will impart the Catechism will be so anti-religious as to constitute a sacrilege; the anti-Catholics because it is in one way or another the consecration of the principle of giving religious education in the primary schools. All Catholics point to the fact that the first article of the Italian Constitution says that "the Catholic religion is the religion of the State," and that all the other cults are merely "tolerated." They therefore say that it would be a violation of the Constitution to abolish the teaching of Catholicism in the primary schools. On the other hand, the anti-Clericals maintain that the whole spirit of the Italian State is secular and unsectarian, so that it would be an offence to these principles to introduce the teaching of any religion into the schools.

* * *

THE court martial at St. Petersburg has nominally condemned General Stössel to death for his premature surrender of Port Arthur, after a siege of 240 days. The sentence will be commuted to a short term of imprisonment. The heart and brain of the defence of the fortress are now known to have resided in General Kondrachenko, and Stössel, who still wears the great Prussian order, "pour le Mérite," conferred on him by the Kaiser within a few hours of the surrender, had ample means in men and supplies for sustaining the siege at the moment when he abandoned it. The Russian soldiers fought well, but the press probably exaggerated the terrors of the siege.

* * *

SUCH an experience as a night with Moritz Moszkowski was never realised by a London audience until last Wednesday, when at Queen's Hall he personally conducted a programme entirely devoted to his works. The newer developments of musical art are for the strong. But let us give a place for those who, like Moszkowski, enjoy a realm of unrestrained fancy, full of delicious dreams. It is ten years since he appeared at a Philharmonic concert and introduced his pianoforte concerto in E major, played on Wednesday by Miss Dora Bright with infinite sympathy, ability, and charm. It is a beautiful work, abounding in grace and polish, and it is as fresh as ever. As a pianist of the highest powers, Moszkowski would know how to develop the resources of the instrument without subordinating the general design. Another special feature was the violin concerto in C major, which was composed for Sauret and made familiar to us by him. Its strong emotional character could have had no better exponent than M. Georges Enesco. The support of the Queen's Hall orchestra was not all that might have been anticipated. It is fair to assume that they missed the vigorous lead to which they have been accustomed. For Moszkowski's beat is distinctly quiet, and, perhaps, not marked enough to obtain complete unanimity, or the nice observance of light and shade for which their performances have become famous. The contribution which excited the greatest interest was the Suite for Orchestra (Op. 79), which was composed only last year.

Politics and Affairs.

THE SPIRIT OF OUR FOREIGN POLICY.

BRITISH foreign policy since the close of the Napoleonic wars has passed through many phases, and has been actuated by several distinct ideals. In the earlier part of the period, under the influence, first of Canning, and then of Palmerston, it sought to play a dominant part in the affairs of Europe. The ambition was by no means wholly selfish or ignoble. Inspired at first by the genius of a Conservative statesman, and taken up later by a Whig, impregnated with some national self-righteousness and tainted at times with material ambitions, veiled in specious words, it nevertheless maintained a clear conception of national purpose. It conceived England as the special guardian of freedom, and gave her a name to be greeted with acclamation among peoples "struggling to be free." At the same time it imposed on ourselves great burdens of military and naval expenditure. It threatened the peace of Europe, and kept us entangled in the vast network of Continental statesmanship. There arose against it another view of foreign policy—the view that the greatest of British interests was peace, that peace involved a policy of non-intervention, and that foreign countries must be left to work out their own salvation. Here was a second ideal perfectly consistent and intelligible in itself, somewhat materialist and selfish in outward seeming, but not so in the spirit in which it was set forth by Cobden and Bright. Those great apostles of modern Liberalism held, too narrowly no doubt, but with perfect sincerity, that freedom was the key to all the doors of progress. Force was no remedy. We could not liberate oppressed Italians or Hungarians by armed intervention. We should do better to set our own house in order, to give the world a perfect example of what free institutions might mean, and to show how they led to self-restraint in the conduct of external affairs. Was our own Constitution so perfect that we could impose it on other peoples? Was it not in any case better that they should, after our example, win freedom for themselves? And was not the source of all despotism, the bulwark of military rule and governmental absolutism, the ever-present dread of foreign complications and of war? If we wanted to spread freedom, peace was the harbinger of freedom, and if we wanted peace, non-intervention was the method of convincing foreigners of our good intentions.

The Manchester doctrine made a deep impression upon Liberal ideas, but it never wholly dominated the statesman who directed Liberal foreign policy in the palmy days of the party. Mr. Gladstone's ideal was morally simpler than that of Cobden, but in its political application more complex. From the day when he intervened in the debate on the Opium War to the day when he emerged from his retirement in extreme old age to preach the cause of the Armenians, he spent fifty years in ceaseless protest on behalf of the principle of national right and international justice. His contention was the exact antithesis of the Machiavellian view that reasons of State justified departure from private laws of honour, justice, and humanity. This was to combine into a single synthesis the best elements of the Palmerstonian tradition and of the Cobdenite criticism. Resolute in opposition to aggression and in respect for the rights of nations, he was equally clear that his country owed a duty to humanity, and could no more sit idle when outrages like those of the Armenian massacres were being daily repeated than a man of average feeling could pass by while murder was being done on the other side of the road. In his conduct of affairs Gladstone may have made, did make, concessions to imperious colleagues, and committed himself to a share in some acts of territorial aggrandisement upon which he would not have entered of his own will. But, when all limitations are allowed for, he left his country a name in international dealings such as no nation has enjoyed before. It was in vain that party opposition attributed his most magnanimous acts of policy to cowardice. It was in vain that it sought to spread through the world the belief that what England had granted to justice had been yielded to fear. It was recognised that in Gladstone a great country had for once at the head of affairs a man who had a place for other considerations than those of national pride or material interests.

The Gladstonian tradition was never wholly lost by Lord Salisbury, who in the critical case of the Turkish Empire came late to the secret that the policy of humanity was also the policy of wisdom, and who, alike in the partition of Africa, in the Fashoda incident, and in the critical year which threatened to throw the Chinese Empire to the Powers for a general scramble, showed himself in intention a man of peace. But Lord Salisbury, though a very astute, was hardly a powerful, Foreign Minister. During his tenure of power the tide of Imperialism ran high and strong. More and more the belief grew up that German "Real-politics" contained the last word of wisdom in international affairs. It was held that the objects of foreign policy were commercial; that success was to be measured in terms of railway concessions, and that the principal business of a Foreign Secretary was to advance the interests of great financial firms and to extend the area of British trade. As to Congolese natives, or Armenian Christians, they might be left to the law of the survival of the fittest. Non-intervention was the word so far as mere justice, mere liberty, mere humanity, were concerned. But if it came to a coaling station, or a swamp in Siam, or a stretch of African desert, above all, if it was a question of a gold mine, then at once the State had positive duties, and non-intervention was buried with the ashes of Cobden. We sought no territory, of course; we only happened to have reasons for taking it if it contained anything of value. As to other nations they were wholly unscrupulous. Their agreements, as German statesmen avowed, were mere expressions of the facts of the time when the agreement was made. They were not binding, and there was no guarantee of good faith in international matters. The one thing was to arm—and to strike first.

This was the characteristic view of the Imperialistic reaction, which swept with it the bulk of the Unionists and some few Liberals. Cautiously resisted by Lord Salisbury, who retained to the last the "European" view, it was roughly handled by the facts themselves, and when Lord Lansdowne came into office a brighter day seemed to dawn. The Anglo-French Agreement closed an epoch of dangerous recriminations and mutual suspicions, and seemed to open a way to a real solution of the problems that vex humanity in Europe. The question of Macedonia was taken in hand in earnest, and it seemed as though a better public opinion, stimulated by an enlightened Minister, might revive the Gladstonian tradition. Lord Lansdowne's tenure of office, however, was not long, and it is at present difficult to classify the work of his successor. The Liberal Party as a whole and the Prime Minister as its head are undoubtedly anxious to maintain the Liberal tradition in foreign policy, and we still hope that Sir Edward Grey may do something to preserve it. For example, they are all for reduction of armaments by mutual agreement. But so far as this country goes, one thing stands in the way of this reduction—the right of capture maintained by the British Foreign Office and Admiralty against a great portion of the civilised world. Challenged on this point, Sir Edward Grey makes a defence which, apparently, captivates the mind of the House of Commons. The gist of this defence is that the right of capture is an invaluable weapon of attack. Our Navy exists purely for defence. Therefore, it needs this weapon. This is one of those syllogisms which, when set out in cold print, seem to annihilate their own conclusions. Sir Edward Grey, conscious of rectitude, but unconscious of the guise in which he appears to foreigners, is apparently unaware that every word that he says in proof of the importance of the right of capture to us is meat and drink to the German jingo who is persuading his fellow-countrymen of the necessity of a strong navy for the defence of his commerce. He does not realise that every proof that he gives of the value of this weapon as against foreign commerce demonstrates doubly and trebly its value to foreigners as a weapon against our commerce. He leaves out of account the fact that we are an island Power dependent for our food supply on sea-borne commerce which must come straight to our ports, while any enemy that we may have would be a Continental Power, which could draw nearly every quarter of corn and bale of powder that it needs from or through neutral countries, and in ships flying neutral flags.

Let us hope that in the future Sir Edward Grey may offer us some development of the pacific side of Liberal policy. For its more active humanitarian side we have waited thus far in vain. On the Congo question we have received the valuable advice to exercise patience. In Macedonia we have seen a sensible relaxation of the vigour infused into our action by Lord Lansdowne. In the case of Persia we find small consideration of the effect of our action on Persian freedom. Do Liberals quite realise the full loss to the party of the submergence of their ideals? Do they not forget sometimes that faith and enthusiasm are, even in a faithless generation, the sole trustworthy sources of vitality in a party which has permanently against it the great forces of inertia, as well as the ill-will of a society whose timidity grows with its ever-growing wealth?

THE PRESENT DUTY OF FREE TRADERS.

THE jubilation of Tariff Reformers just now is natural enough. Mr. Balfour, "swearing he would ne'er consent" to lead a Protectionist Party, has consented, provided it is called by some other name and is only Protectionist in fact, not in intention, a dialectical distinction which troubles very little Mr. H. Chaplin and Mr. Bonar Law, who have "bagged" their bird. Better still, Tariff Reform is now firmly fastened on the organisation as the prime test of party loyalty, displacing Unionism and other moribund issues, and must be swallowed by all Parliamentary candidates on pain of official repudiation. Best of all, whole-hoggers are beginning to win victories in the country. What wonder that the prophets of the Protectionist revival should now begin to see a rapid ripening of the seed they have been sowing for the last five years, and to count upon an early harvest? Two years or so, reckon the more sanguine politicians, will see this discredited Free Trade Government swept to perdition, and a Tariff Reform Party returned to power with a clear mandate to secure British trade against "unfair" foreign competition, to revive British agriculture, and to secure the unity and economic self-sufficiency of the Empire by firm fiscal arrangements. It seems almost churlish to subject this creation of a heated political imagination to the stern tests of prose. There will always be sanguine persons to whom the process of counting eggs will seem a sort of incantation helpful for hatching them. But if there are Free Traders whose minds are beginning to be shaken with doubts as to whether, after all, the cause of "the wicked" may not triumph, we may remind them of one or two highly relevant considerations which Mr. Bonar Law and his friends are apt to neglect.

In the first place, it is tolerably evident that, so far as Tariff Reform can claim chief credit for these recent Conservative victories, the success is due, not to any principles or stable policy of Protectionism, but to the mendacious use of certain fortuitous events unconnected with the fiscal issue. It is right to acknowledge that a few Tariff Reformers of principle have refused to make Free Trade responsible for the high price of bread or for the trade depression, with its accompanying unemployment, which is at present sweeping over the industrial world, affecting earliest and most severely those countries, like the United States and Germany, that support home industries by high protection. But the main body of Protectionists have had no scruples in working these lies for all the votes that they were worth. Here and there even a leading politician has stooped to sanction the view that an imperial preference on wheat would have stopped the rise of prices by the encouragement it would have afforded to the wheat-growers in Canada and Australasia, entirely disregarding the facts, first, that no encouragement could be given to these Colonies unless a rise of prices here had taken place; secondly, that the actual rise is due largely to the failure in harvests on the part of the very Colonies upon whose supplies we are invited to rely.

Now one of the disadvantages of staking a policy upon a falsehood is that it is likely to fail you when you need it most. A single good harvest may ruin the speciousness of the Tariff Reformers' explanation of the high price of food. They must then fall back upon their other trump card, trade depression, with its accompanying unemployment, praying that it may last long enough to enable a general election to be fought on it. Now a political party surely stands in a precarious case when its success lies in the misfortunes of its country, when its backers are dependent for their return to power upon "high prices" and "no work." For past history shows great and rapid recuperative powers in our nation. Moreover, the use of such arguments and hopes produces a most demoralising effect on the intelligence of politicians. It even affects their arithmetic. Just now it is splitting the Tariff Reformers into two sections, the old Conservative Protectionists, who are merely concerned to reduce income-tax and keep out foreign agricultural and manufactured goods, and the new Protectionists, whose ablest organ is "The Morning Post," and whose coming leader is perhaps Lord Milner, alive to the necessity of buying the support of the working classes by pensions, a living wage, unemployed relief, and other measures of social reform. So long as Tariff Reform is in the missionary stage the essential antagonism of these two tendencies need cause no inconvenience. The old Protection does well for middle-class appeals, the new for the working-classes. Indeed, so strangely composed is the public mind that a blend of the two incongruous policies can often be quite effectively applied in the same speech to the same audience. But if the combination of bad trade and extensive advertising of quack remedies should put a Protectionist Government in office, the inherent antagonism of the two policies must out. The impossibility of creating any fiscal instrument which will at once keep out foreign goods, prevent a rise of prices of necessities, enable direct taxation to be reduced, and furnish a large new income for social reform, will be speedily made manifest. The simple rules of arithmetic are apt in the long run to assert their validity. The multiplication table will ultimately put to rout the stage army of mendacities and specious promises which at present serves to impose upon the ignorant.

But while this practical refutation and disillusionment would be certain to follow any attempt of a fiscal reform Government to materialise its airy policy, it would be as foolish as it would be unpatriotic for Liberals to leave this rake's progress to run its course unchecked. It is right for Liberals frankly to recognise that they have over-rated the security which their great victory of two years ago seemed to attest. Tariff Reform has not merely deceived the intelligence, it has even fired the imagination and touched the enthusiasm, of large numbers of politicians who have become genuine and active missionaries of the cause. It has also loosened the purse-strings of wealthy industrial interests which have followed the creed of the Pious Editor:—

"I do believe in speshul ways
Of prayin' and convertin'.
The bread comes back in many days,
And butter'd tu fur certin."

Dear food and bad trade give a chance to pernicious doctrines which could not be anticipated. Paid agents are at work throughout the length and breadth of the country, particularly in the Southern counties, addressing meetings, showering leaflets, and arguing in village taprooms. Incessant reiteration produces a slow but cumulative effect upon empty, credulous, or discontented minds. The whole art of advertisement testifies the efficacy of such specious reiterated suggestions. Unless, therefore, the Free Trade Party in this country meets argument with argument, enthusiasm with enthusiasm, leaflet with leaflet, nay, megaphone with megaphone, it cannot hope successfully to counterwork the tactics of the enemy. This truth, somewhat tardily, is making its way into the minds of responsible Liberal politicians. It is, we think, incumbent upon them to rouse the rank and file of their supporters in the country to the dangers and responsibilities which the new situation entails. Work and money are lavishly expended by the special interests which calculate that they will gain by subverting the fiscal policy upon which this country has so long and so abundantly thriven. Work and money must be expendent with the same liberality in organising the defence by those concerned to maintain the commercial welfare of the nation and the integrity of its politics, both of which they hold to be indissolubly connected with the maintenance of our policy of free imports.

THE NEW SITUATION IN EUROPE.

THE victories of Russia in Turkey a generation ago left her isolated in Europe. Her defeat in Manchuria seems only to stimulate the eagerness of European statesmen to bring her once more within the scope of their combinations. She has concluded with us in Asia a decidedly favourable bargain, and Germany seeks her co-operation in the Baltic. Russia stands ready, singularly free from prepossessions, to take advantage of these unexpected gifts of fortune. The reaction is impartially anti-European, distrusting every Power, but ready to transact with each. It tolerates the French alliance, for that alliance stands for the possibility of future loans. It leans on the German intimacy, for Kaiser and Tsar are the embodiments of the medieval spirit, and a common interest in repressing the Poles must always be a link between them.

The Anglo-Russian arrangement was for both countries an incident in the development of the ties which our French entente created. That is its real genesis, and Monday's debate in the Commons only served to show how difficult it is to defend it from any other standpoint. Lord Percy and Mr. Lynch had an easy task in repeating Lord Curzon's criticism—that it makes a needless sacrifice of our commercial interests in Persia. We are not impressed by its value as a guarantee of Persian independence. Nor has it altered the old antagonism at Teheran; for Russia stands behind the Shah in his struggle with the Parliament, while we, less resolutely, support the popular cause. Sir Edward Grey invites us to consider it mainly, if not exclusively, as a strategic arrangement, which has guaranteed the security of India by excluding Russian enterprise from Seistan. We hope so; all we say is that the new sense of security is in no way reflected in the establishment of the Indian army. Two new facts govern our military position in India. Of the two great military Powers in Asia, the victor is now our ally, pledged to lend us her armies in India; the defeated combatant has become our friend, pledged to respect our frontiers and to observe the inviolability of our buffer States. We have gained an ally and placated a possible enemy, and yet, despite famine, poverty, the urgency of costly reforms, and our professed zeal for the reduction of armaments, we have not ventured to disband a single battalion in India, or curtail our estimates by a lac of rupees.

At some sacrifice of trading interests, at some cost to our principles, and with no apparent gain to ourselves, we have carried out M. Delcassé's idea of isolating conservative Germany by embracing reactionary Russia. But events have taught us during the present week how contingent and local this arrangement is. For it is certainly not a regard for British interests which has induced Russia to join with Germany in planning the new Baltic arrangement. The Kaiser's strategy is fairly obvious. Russia is to be induced and Sweden coerced into signing a guarantee of the integrity of all territory that touches the Baltic. Free from anxiety there, Germany could employ the whole of her navy in the North Sea. It is, no doubt, to this end that the two Imperial Courts have resolved to rebuild in haste, despite the state of Russia's finances, the fleet which Admiral Togo destroyed. The Kaiser in a public speech advised this policy; Russians believe that the new fleet is to be the price of his benevolent support of Tsardom in Poland. An integral part of the scheme—acknowledged in an official communiqué—is that Russia should resume the right, forbidden to her by the Convention between France, Russia, and Great Britain, attached to the Treaty of Paris, of fortifying the Aland Isles. This string of islands controls the Gulf of Bothnia, and commands the approach to Stockholm. Russia, once planted there, has the power to darken the existence of Sweden with a constant menace, and either to reduce the Swedes to subservience, or to force them into a race of armaments. If our diplomacy were to consent to the cancelling of the prohibition to fortify which we imposed after the Crimean War, it would have sacrificed a vital naval interest, and weakened, by a wanton surrender, our historic claim to be the friend of the smaller nationalities of Europe.

There is one direction, however, in which the real weakness of Russia is concealed by no diplomatic successes. The Power which is strong in Turkey is always the Power which holds in its hands the means of pressure. Austria, by her railway scheme for uniting Vienna by an all-Austrian route with Salonica, has torn up the bargain by which she maintained with Russia a dual hegemony in the Balkans. It is an undisguisedly political move. The new route has but slight commercial recommendations. It is much longer than the existing line which links Vienna with Salonica by way of Belgrade. It will serve a region where the one existing line (Uskub-Mitrovitza) can afford at present to run only three trains in a week. It is a route for military and political penetration, and nothing more. The alarm of Russia is quite justifiable, and her claim to construct a rival line from the Danube to the Adriatic, however absurd on economic grounds, is the only natural reply from a political standpoint. She will not challenge Austria directly. Instead, she is rattling her sabre in the Sultan's ears, and spreading rumours of a mobilisation in the Caucasus. Only a bureaucracy incapable of learning from experience could dream of reviving the revolution by proclaiming war, and of precipitating bankruptcy by attacking an enemy who could pay no indemnity to a victor. But this bluff, absurd as it is, may give the Sultan a welcome pretext for trading on the rivalries of the Concert. He is quite capable of pointing out to Austria that permission to survey a line, which is all he has granted yet, does not involve permission to build it. It might suit him equally well to grant both concessions. If he could double every Austro-German line in his dominions with a Russian line, he would be secure for all time against the invasion of either.

The conflict, however, is acute, and while it lasts the Concert has ceased to exist. It cannot be revived while the Powers which ought to be pressing for reforms are quarrelling for favours. We alone stand aloof, disinterested and genuinely concerned for the fate of the helpless peoples of Turkey. But the habit of making agreements at the expense of defenceless nations becomes with exercise a mania. Already the "Westminster Gazette" has hinted that Sir Edward Grey should invite Austria and Russia to take over the government of Macedonia on Bosnian lines. We are not sure whether it means to suggest a condominium or a partition. But in either case the inference is that two Powers which have just given proof of reckless egoism are the proper custodians of the liberties of a subject race, and that we, who have nothing to gain in the shape of railways, can have no possible duty to perform. There are two main objections to this scheme. The first is that while no two races in Macedonia are agreed in their ultimate policy, all would unite to resent Austrian or Russian rule. The second is that Russia's imperial record is written in Poland, in Finland, and the Caucasus. Austria, indeed, has developed Bosnia, as any tourist can see, but she has not developed the Bosnians, or reconciled to her stay the race which fought so gallantly against her coming. Macedonia, moreover, is the key to the freedom of the Balkans. If Austria and Russia held it, Serbia and Bulgaria would become dependent enclaves of two vast Empires.

This country still holds a unique position in the Near East. We alone are universally trusted, for we alone are disinterested. So far as we have an interest, it is that of the trader who must desire the prosperity of his customers. We alone, by our sea power, have the possibility of exerting immediate pressure at Salonica or Smyrna, with no appreciable risk to ourselves. We, above all other peoples, have a direct responsibility, for we are the sons of the generation which prevented the inclusion of Macedonia in a Great Bulgaria, and handed it back to Turkish rule. We alone could with success invite the other Powers to a Conference. The "Times," in a leading article which contrasts favourably with the tone of the "Westminster Gazette," asks, without answering the question, whether we are prepared to use our prestige, our sea power, and our friendships in order to secure, if need be, by isolated action, a real reform in Macedonia. To our thinking the manner of putting the question is misleading. A real reform in Macedonia must be an international reform. Our task is to bring the other Powers into line with Lord Lansdowne's proposals for an executive European control. Of late we have made no serious effort. Every Ministerial speech has been an apology for inaction, a recitation of difficulties, an appeal to those who care about this question to remember the susceptibilities of interested Powers. That is not the language of a Minister in earnest. Gladstone would not have said, "We are not the whole conscience of Europe"; he would have roused the conscience of Europe. From the moment that the other Powers realised that the present Government regarded the fate of Macedonia as a capital question, the whole problem would assume another aspect. We have elements of public opinion on our side—the democracies of France, Italy, and Russia, the Slavs of Austria, the Socialists everywhere. Above all, we have in our hands the elements for a bargain. Our diplomacy and our capital can immensely assist the building of the railways on which Austria, Russia, and especially Germany, are intent. Let us offer to assist these schemes, if only these three Powers will withdraw their opposition to reform. Bargaining is the essence of the situation, but the one bargain which would cover us with infamy would be a transaction that sacrificed our clients in Macedonia to the appetites of two illiberal Empires.

DISORDER AND DISESTABLISHMENT.

It is possible for many Liberals to agree in the main with Mr. McArthur's description of the excesses of Ritualism in the Church of England, and yet to disagree strongly with his remedy. Even if we concede the point that force, unscrupulously and fiercely applied, is a cure for spiritual disorders in the State—and clearly, if we slay and scatter a population, as Louis XIV. slew and scattered the French Protestants, it is a cure—we doubt whether a scheme of repression borrowed from the early working of the Act of Uniformity has any validity to-day. Mr. McArthur proposes a roving Commission of barristers, fortified with schedules of illegal practices and ornaments, and armed with powers of suspension and deprivation. Such a body would find itself at once deprived of all moral authority. The suspended or deprived clergy would refuse to budge. If they were popular and single-minded men, their congregations would support them. We are not Elizabethans, and physical penalties, such as imprisonment, timidly and partially set in force, would only turn a slowly declining and rather suspected movement, now under the stigma of trying to get behind the spirit, if not the letter, of the Anglican formularies, into a living body, nourished by martyrdom. Moreover, as Mr. Masterman truly said, the Catholic movement in the English Church is not an affair of ritual only. Mass can be said in a Church as bare as a Primitive Methodist Chapel, and some of the rich accessories of High Anglican worship are mere surplage, affected and even incorrect. So far as Ritualism represents a definite belief and attitude of mind, it resides in men's hearts and intelligences, not in their symbolic garments. It must either be uprooted there, or left to live its own life.

At the same time, the interior situation in the Anglican Church, as the abortive debate on Mr. McArthur's Bill leaves it, is very far from satisfactory. It is all very well for the High Churchmen to call for liberty, and to breathe an abstract and contingent petition for Disestablishment. We doubt whether the mass of Anglican Catholics desire, with Mr. Masterman, to form a free religious communion separate from the State. Why should they? They are doing very well as it is. They have the Bishops on their side, prudent and tacit and possibly half-conscious allies in the business of de-Protestantising the Church of England. Since the close of the Palmerstonian period they have had the pick of Church patronage. Gladstone and Salisbury, closely agreed on questions and methods of Church government, took care to put the Church of England in charge, in the main, of the party with which their own religious life was most closely associated. The High Church organisations have duly improved this position of advantage. Their Low Church opponents are timid and unenlightened. Their movement radiates a certain warmth and energy, which keeps it superficially alive, and conceals its serious intellectual deficiencies. They may well hold that the kingdom has been made over to them, and that while the English dislike of coercion subsists, and also the English failure to realise that the main difference between High Anglicanism and Romanism is a quarrel about jurisdiction and a place, they have a secure as well as a goodly heritage. We shall therefore believe in the High Church desire for Disestablishment when it exists in some more substantial form than as a tactical resource against Ecclesiastical Disorders Bills. At present there is no adequate motive for it, and no sign that the leaders of the party sympathise with it.

In our opinion, the Church of England, like the Church of Rome, is in peril from a cause far more imminent and more fatal in its consequences than Disestablishment. That is the failure to speak the true heart and mind of its Founder, in their simplicity and their strength, to renew itself with the life of its age, to absorb and to transform for the purposes of its own special influence on the soul of mankind the light that streams in upon it from the world of science and thought. Both Churches must, we are afraid, be regarded as in the hands of the reaction. The Roman Church, with its more imperious political methods, is more openly and savagely at war with the spirit of the times, and when she has rid herself of Loisy, as of Dollinger and Lamennais, may be held to have broken definitely with progress, and to have reaped the full fruit of the momentous declaration of 1864. "The Church," says M. Seignobos, in his survey of the course of contemporary European history, "remains true to the absolutist tradition of sovereign power, descending from on high, and wielded by a sacred caste." But the spirit of anti-liberalism has been hardly less dominant in the Anglican Church. Barely has the Broad Church party survived the frown of two great Ministers of State, and the steady aggrandisement by them of the promoters and humbler servants of the Catholic movement. But it exists, and is beginning to grow, and on the other hand we cannot believe that the High Church movement preserves its vitality. It has had the clear incidental effect of creating a wide gulf between the Anglican clergy and a considerable mass of the laity, and between purely clerical conceptions of morals and those held by the main body of the English people, and embodied in their laws. Its attitude to the new criticism is necessarily embarrassed, for it does not know where to concede and where to stand fast. Its practical evasion of the Protestant side of Church formularies has turned the Bishops into a set of uneasy politicians, proclaiming peace where there is not even a truce. It is inconceivable that with its weak intellectual side, its appeal to the past, the High Church section can retain the younger men, especially as the Government are at last alive to the necessity of giving the Broad Church party some place in the higher direction of the Church. But it will not quit its place of power without a struggle. Itself at war with the Protestant idea, it may well lean on those formularies of the Church which seem to forbid expansion, and, with the assent of the extreme Evangelicals, it may use the Athanasian Creed against the Broad Churchmen. If the internal troubles of Anglicanism take this turn, the narrowing tendency might for a brief space succeed. But hardly for long. The vase, beautiful as it is, will some day be seen by all men to be too frail to contain the plant, and an Establishment based on compromise, but no longer contenting any one of the parties that divide its inheritance, may sink under the general impatience of compromise. That, it seems to us, will be a happy day for all parties in the Church, for it will enable them to live their own life in freedom, retaining the incomparable aesthetic value of Anglicanism, the grave and noble piety of its beautiful forms of speech and petition, but free to interpret the signs of the times and to deliver their message.

Life and Letters.

THE ARYA SAMAJ.

THE GURUKULA, NEAR HARDWAR, INDIA,

January 30th.

It was evening service, and at the hour when sunset and starlight are mingled, a few score of boys and young men were gathered round a small square pit in which a fire of sticks was burning with a yellow flame. They were dressed in long yellow and white cloths, and, sitting in rows, they chanted the ancient Vedic hymns in praise of God, with the peculiar cadences and nasal quaverings of the East. In their midst, at the edge of the pit, sat their teacher, and from time to time he ladled clarified butter into the fire, while youths from each of the other sides of the square threw in handfuls of rice and fragrant woods or herbs. Meantime the chanting never ceased, but with a concentrated vehemence all raised to the air the aged Sanscrit words, revealed to mankind at Creation, so that he might never be devoid of the holiest wisdom, but bear it with him across the mountains of ice and over the sunburnt plains to the furthest world. At the end all stood up for the final evening hymn, and then dispersed, leaving the fire burning as the symbol of man's soul and divine power and the transfiguration by purity.

It was a worship celebrated every morning and evening by all Vedic believers, whether assembled or alone. I saw it first at one of the students' homes at Lahore, where a branch of the Arya Samaj, or Aryan Society, has a school and college numbering nearly 2,000 members together. Lala Lajpat Rai sat next me, for it was to this branch that he had devoted all his labours for social and religious reform, till cases of oppression and injustice in the Punjab drove him to turn aside into politics from the real objects of the Samaj. I speak of a branch because, like most vital movements, the Samaj is divided into parties, one holding its services inside the crowded city, the other just outside the walls. Both claim to follow the doctrines of their founder, Dayanand Saraswati, who died only twenty-five years ago after a wandering life of holy poverty given up entirely to the denunciation of idols, castes, animal sacrifices, licentious rites, the multiplicity of deities, and other accretions with which frail humanity has surrounded the stern purity of the Vedic revelation. Both parties unite in rejecting idols, the seclusion or "purdah" of women, and all restrictions of caste, except such rights and obligations as are the due of character or intellect. Both unite in maintaining the unity of God, the eternal trinity of God, Soul, and Matter, and the universal wisdom revealed for all races in the Vedas. The differences are rather of temperament than of doctrine. The city party claims to be more democratic in its appeal, to be stricter in life and discipline, but at the same time freer from "purdah"; and, indeed, its women are allowed to attend Divine service in a gallery unveiled, while the women of the other party have a service to themselves, with a woman preacher. The city party has been called the Culture Section, in which name, I think, there lies a covert sneer. But it has retaliated by calling the suburban party the Vulture Section, in which the sneer is not covert, but palpably due to a backsliding from vegetarianism.

Not that the extramural party dreams of backsliding. It only aims at progress and increasing freedom, holding with other movements of religious reform that the kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink. The differences have never been serious, though a few years ago there was the same kind of tender hostility as used to prevail between Newton Hall and Lamb's Conduit Street when Positivists turned their criticism from Christians to each other. But of late persecution, that great reconciler, has brought them together again, and now hardly any of the outside world are aware of a division at all. It was the deportation of Lajpat Rai that gave the final touch to reconciliation. That a man of austere and generous life, a man without ambition or private aims, one who had given up great worldly success for the service of the poor and unlearned, should be spirited away without warning and without trial for venturing to criticise official injustice—this was the touch to kindle that fire of indignation which welds men together. The Indian Government, always timid and suspicious, has lately regarded the Samaj with special enmity, and I know a soldier of the highest character who was turned out of a Sikh regiment simply for belonging to it. Some members of the Society have taken to politics, because for the moment political questions are irresistibly attractive to generous minds. But the Society as such has no concern with politics. It is a religious body—a Universal Church—bent only on religious purification and the training of youth in accordance with Vedic rules. One can understand the opposition of orthodox Hindus, Mohammedans, and Christians, for in its religious propaganda the Samaj is distinctly militant. But even the Indian Government has hardly made a greater mistake than in regarding it as a centre of sedition. The true leaders of both sections—such men as Mr. Hans Raj, Principal of the Vedic College in Lahore, and Mr. Munshi Rama, Governor of the Gurukula here—have steadily set their faces against political work of any sort, and they discourage political discussion among their students. It is useless, they say, to look for the political regeneration of India while the character and intellect of the people are unregenerate. I do not agree with them, believing, as I do, that political freedom is essential for any regeneration of the national spirit. But to accuse the Samaj of political aims, to grasp, as our officials have done, at any forgery or lie which seeks to implicate the Society in sedition, are only further signs of Anglo-Indian ignorance, fixed in its isolation among a subject race. As Mr. Munshi Rama wrote in a detailed defence of the Samaj—a defence so just and reasonable that it was approved even by the "Civil and Military Gazette," the leading paper of Lahore, and perhaps the most extreme anti-Indian of all the Anglo-Indian papers:—

"It is an awful responsibility which those people undertake who try to set the Government against the Arya Samaj. A society which is trying its best to uproot some of the evils of intemperance, of impurity, of child-marriage, of polygamy, of gambling, and a host of other vices—why, it is the Arya Samajists whom you find in the foremost rank of workers in the field."

It is now six years since the writer of that protest cleared a space here in the pleasant jungle where to-day I have seen many deer and monkeys, many wild boar, the bone-strewn home of a tiger with cubs, the spoor of the huge elephant, two peacocks, and other of the delights of Eden. A few miles away the holy Ganges issues from the foot of the Himalaya into the great Indian plain. Here a quadrangle of tin-roofed buildings has been raised to be a Vedic school and future college upon lines laid down by ancient revelation. The lines are Spartan, or, at least, Platonic. The boys are admitted at eight, and parents undertake not to remove them or allow their marriage till they are twenty-five. During these sixteen years they do not go home, nor are they allowed to write letters or receive them; but their parents may visit them once a month, and do, in fact, visit them about twice a year—once at the great anniversary, which happens to be St. Patrick's day, when over 60,000 Samajists come, including many thousand women, and camp on the edge of the jungle in grass and wicker huts, now being prepared for them. The pilgrim visitors bring their own supplies, and generally stay three days, that being all of family life the boys ever know. And that is all they know of woman's society, too.

Such isolation amid this common, intermingled world is, perhaps, dangerous. It comes too near the inhuman monotony of our workhouse schools. It is likely to exaggerate the curiosity of growing men, or to produce the hesitation of bashful and secluded lives when confronted with the need for action. The entire removal of home influence might appear harsh if we did not remember the scores of men whom we have known ruined by their parents' vulgarity or their mothers' indulgence. But even if we grant that most parents are quite unfit to bring up children, sixteen years seems too long for any boy to remain in the same place, with the same teachers and the same companions. Even the holiday excursions to historic cities of India, which are arranged by the Governor, do not sufficiently break up the one-sidedness of such a life, and think of the boy who is genuinely unfitted for school and must remain unhappy for a quarter of man's existence.

The heads of the school urge that in India home influence is almost invariably dangerous or softening. They say their only hope of preserving the boys from child-marriage, maternal ignorance, and the evil of cities lies in this monastic seclusion. In place of parents they have a few Superintendents—about one to every twenty-five of the 220 boys—who live with each class day and night, except in school hours. The greatest difficulty of the school is to find Superintendents worthy and willing, and I should have thought it impossible. The three oldest boys in the top form have rooms to themselves and no Superintendent. All sleep on plank beds, but are allowed a warm covering. All dress in yellow "dhotis" (long cotton cloths) for school-time, and white "dhotis" for play. They are allowed wooden sandals, held on by a peg between the toes, but nearly all go bare-foot, and in bare feet and legs they ride and play cricket, football, and a swadeshi prisoners' base. This branch of the Arya Somaj is so violently vegetarian that I am not allowed to approach the school buildings in boots of murdered leather.

The boys get up at four in the morning, and attend Divine service round the symbolic fire. They are taught to speak the truth, to practise concentrated contemplation, and to subdue passion by the "yoga" of deep breathing and holding the breath. They bathe in cold water before sunrise, they climb the jungle mountains near, and all learn swimming in the Ganges. Almost the only form of punishment is exclusion from games. The school hours run to about seven, divided into two parts, and the chief subject taught is Sanscrit. There are other ordinary subjects—arithmetic and mathematics, history, science, and English—and, unlike the Government schools, all teaching is given in the vernacular Hindi, so that the boys understand the subjects better and can cover more ground, whereas in ordinary schools the learning is continually hampered by a foreign tongue. But the chief means of education is Sanscrit, just as in my old school it was Greek. At least seven years are spent in getting that amazing grammar by heart and in learning to read the Vedas. But in all the upper forms the boys can already write and read Sanscrit as fluently as a mother tongue, and that is more than any of us ever did with Greek.

The Gurukula (the word means The Master's Home) takes no Government grant, and submits to no Government inspection; nor is it affiliated to a Government University, like the Vedic College in Lahore. The parents pay 10 rupees a month (£8 a year) for the complete education, including clothes, food, and everything. But the cost for each boy is about £15 a year, and the deficit is made up by the subscriptions of Somajists. Fifteen pounds a year is a great deal for a poverty-stricken country like India, but I wish our great public schools did not cost ten times as much.

HENRY W. NEVINSON.

THE SCARE-MIND.

How strangely distracted is the public upon this issue of national defence! Is it possible that we have in truth two minds, one which listens to and accepts the wisdom of the great moralists and philosophers who have always taught that the true strength of a nation lies not in "the visible might of armies," but in qualities of soul, while the other sees no other helper than organised force and cunning applied to the work of physical destruction? We can no more serve two masters here than in any other province of life. The issue is just now set in terms particularly intelligible to a business people—terms of cash. Let us approach it on this lower level, by asserting that every teacher and every preacher in the land ought, if he understood the real economic question that is involved, to cast all his influence into the scale of retrenchment upon armaments. In very fact every fresh million which goes into the services of physical force means a double loss to the cause of intellectual and moral culture for our nation. For in the same sense in which money is the sinew of war is it the sinew of education; and while we are demonstrably stronger than any of our contemplated enemies in naval force, we are as demonstrably weaker than any other great civilised power in the services of national culture. But the fact that every new "Dreadnought" involves so much starvation of the educational needs of a people just slowly struggling towards a belief in education, is not the greatest injury. It is far graver that a people which, like ours, is slowly recovering from a glut of war should be thrust back upon this false doctrine of the defence of nations.

It is no merely "sentimental" aspect of the issue that we would present. We simply ask men and women acquainted with the teaching of history to consider whether it may not be better policy for ordinary purposes of national defence to spend more money upon the cultivation of ideas than upon arms. It may be said (there will always be Englishmen to say it) that we can do both. In very truth we cannot, or what is perhaps the same thing, we shall not. For every fresh million of new faith in warships and in army corps involves so much decay of faith in ideas. Such is the inherent nature of the antagonism. For it is the belief in force even more than the use of force that winds a nation in the coils of this vicious circle. A conviction that the real success and safety of a State depends on force is a reversion to the intellectual attitude of the age of militarism from which modern industrialism was supposed to have released us. Now the intellectual attitude of militarism was bad enough in its time; it is worse now. For the most striking mental characteristic of the military mind of barbarism is its credulity. But the conditions of modern civilisation immensely aggravate this proclivity. A modern Government which puts its trust in armaments is perpetually at the mercy of the scare-mind of the multitude, exposed continually to sensational rumours and suggestions of impending woes. The fact of these scares, as distinguished from any substance which they may contain, becomes more and more a guiding factor in the actual policy of nations. So, not long ago, some of our most pacific statesmen seriously argued that we must abandon the prospect of a Channel Tunnel, not because it involved real military peril, but because it would be a recurrent source of groundless panics which would force Governments into further expenditure upon defence, and would even exasperate the feelings of the English and French peoples.

How far a yellow press is primarily responsible for the scare-mind which in this country has lately been led more and more to read all international relations in terms not of amity and co-operation but of antagonism and hate, or how far that press must rule as an expression of the mind which it feeds, is too difficult a question to attempt to settle here. There is, doubtless, an interaction of the two. But it is abundantly clear that this credulous, jumpy condition of the people, this scare-mind, is the greatest new menace to the peace of the world; it is a huge force of unreason suddenly endowed by modern conditions of swift sensational publicity with incalculable power of harm. It is by no means confined to this nation; other European nations manifest it, and the United States exhibits a more malignant form of the disease than any other country. Now it is this scare-mind, partly as an original impelling power, partly utilised by other cooler interests, that forces the pace in armaments. But its nature is such that no satiety, no sense of security, is won by any increment of force. On the contrary, the vicious circle consists precisely in the fact that, the larger the rival armaments, the worse and the more numerous the scares.

If this is so, every further concession to the doctrines of force, every refusal to attack the true source of scares, especially upon the part of Liberals, is treason to the cause of Liberalism. For Liberals, at any rate, do not believe that the interests of nations, in commerce or ultimately in politics, are essentially opposed: the largest and clearest duty Liberalism sets before itself in history is the building, upon firm, economic, legal, and spiritual foundations, of the true Society of Nations. This being so, the way to deal with the scare-mind is not to feed it with more armaments, which serve further to inflame it, but to doctor it intelligently. The reason why the "Daily Mail" and such organs of the Press can work their havoc consists mainly in the sheer ignorance and emotional instability of their readers. When the Governments and peoples of the Continent are constantly painted as malignant foes, planning unprovoked attacks upon our territory or our trade, how should the shop-keeper, the artisan, the clerk, to whom French and German are sealed languages, who know nothing of the history of those countries, and of their mighty contributions to the thought and literature of humanity, be able to resist the appeal to his suspicion and timidity? This enemy amongst us we can only fight by building up, what we have not, a system of national education that shall set itself to extirpate that ignorance which thus breeds and feeds suspicion and hate, a widespread culture which shall bear its timely fruits in knowledge, sanity, and steadiness of judgment. A million pounds expended in teaching German, arousing our emulation by showing what Germany is doing in the sciences and in the art of government, in stirring a vital sympathy for our kinsfolk and a desire to travel and to learn by close immediate intercourse what Germany and Germans mean, would, as a mere business expenditure upon "defence" be far more profitable than laying down a "Dreadnought" and so inviting Germany to lay down another.

These considerations are so obvious as to amount to platitudes. How is it that we refuse to recognise the truth so as to act upon them? Surely the time has come for a rally of those who see that an educated nation, understanding and sympathising with her neighbours, no longer the dupe of every foolish or malicious misinterpreter, able to recognise the real underlying harmony in the interests of nations, material as well as spiritual, can afford to diminish her physical instruments of defence because she has more valid substitutes in that better knowledge and that fuller self-control which displace our perilous sensationalism by the cultivation of sensations that are "just, measured, and continuous."

THE LIGHT OF CONFLAGRATIONS.

"MAN has walked by the light of conflagrations," wrote Carlyle, "and amid the sound of falling cities: and now there is darkness, and long watching till the morning." The records of those elemental fires, the noise of that cosmic catastrophe, lie embedded in a thousand patient histories of the Napoleonic era. And yet the full story and interpretation still remain unwritten. It is so much the biggest thing that has happened to Europe, since Europe first was, it has so effectually created, after the "twilight of the gods," new heavens and a new earth, that even a hundred years afterwards we await some writer of genius who can reveal it in its ardours and purposes and ultimate meaning. The spirit of that age of marvels can, perhaps, best be understood in two books of memories, utterly different in attitude, in spirit, in response; Chateaubriand's "Outre-Tombe" and Dumas' "Memoirs." Between them—in their poles of disunity—they embrace the spirit of that madness which fell upon the French people, "whipt them into waste fields far away," drove them out singing down the great roads of Europe, and finally left them

"fatigued" after an explosion of miracle; prostrate, helpless, with but the memories to cherish, for all time, of a day when once they were furiously alive. Dumas, in the story of his father's fortunes, opens the very heart of that new French Army which, after the tragic upheaval of the Terror, had eliminated the word "impossible" from its vocabulary. One incident may be taken as typical of all. The Army of Italy lay baffled before the mountain barrier of the Maritime Alps, with the fort of Mount Cenis, defiant in its snows, guarding the passes. General Dumas determined to capture this impregnable position. He set out at night with three hundred men, whose blue uniforms and helmets he covered with their white shirts and cotton caps. They had to climb hazardous crevices, where the slightest slip meant certain death. "My children," said the giant cheerily to his soldiers, "any man who slips is a dead man. It will be useless to call for help. But any such cry may imperil the enterprise by giving the alarm. Therefore, if you find yourself falling, fall in silence." Those who slipped accepted this Homeric advice, and their bodies were heard bounding on the rocks below without a cry. When they reached the summit their egress was barred by a high stockade. "My father," says Alexandre Dumas, "thought of a better way" than climbing it; "namely, to take each man by the seat of his trousers and the collar of his coat and throw him over the palisades." It was easily accomplished. The snow "broke the fall, and also deadened the noise." "Surprised out of their sleep," is the jolly testimony, "and seeing the French soldiers in their midst without knowing how they had come there, the Piedmontese hardly offered any resistance." Mount Cenis was taken. Such was the spirit of those ragged veterans—peasants, with a new fire in their hearts, of whom Napoleon could proudly declare after the Italian campaign: "Deprived of everything, you have managed without everything; you have won battles without cannons, crossed rivers without bridges, made forced marches without shoes on your feet, bivouacked without spirits, often without bread." These were the soldiers whose children were born, in De Musset's words, "to the sound of cannon"; who only perished, like Porthos on Belle Isle, because the weight they attempted to shoulder was "too heavy" for human arms; who could retort on Marmont's justification for his treachery in complaint of being too fatigued with the reproof—"And we, we too, were we not fatigued?"; who, over the dolorous cries of torture and pain on the field of Wagram could shout to the "Eaglet" that triumphant valediction, "Vive l'Empereur!"

And if Dumas can give the adventure, Chateaubriand can give the romance of it all so that in his memoirs one can hear the sound of the passing of all the old things, in the heroic, stormful birth pangs of a new world. His brother had been executed in the Terror: he himself had fought with the emigrants on the Eastern frontier; he had wandered, penniless and deserted, through the streets of London, sleeping at night in Westminster Abbey: he had seen France flood out to conquer the world, and France (for the first time) shattered by the world in arms against her. "By day," he writes in his country retreat, with the sound of the last struggle raging around him, "by day I compose pages as agitated as the events of the day: at night, while the rolling of the distant cannon dies away in my woods, I return to the silence of years that sleep in the grave, to the peace of my youngest memories. How short and narrow is a man's past beside the vast present of the nations and their immeasurable future." "I have found myself caught between two ages," he cried, "as in the conflict of two rivers." "Eye-witness that I am," he called himself "of two or three lapsed worlds." And there are few more pathetic figures in history than that of Chateaubriand by the Brussels gate at Gand on June 18th, 1815, listening to the distant sounds of Waterloo, knowing that a victory for Napoleon spelled the death of the legitimate cause which was his own, yet praying for a triumph whose alternative meant the death of France. "Though Napoleon's success meant lifelong exile to me, the thought of my country filled my heart. My prayers were for the oppressor of France, that he might save our honour and rescue us from the dominion of the foreigner."

It is this magnificent and spacious drama—crowded with the material of laughter and tears—which Mr. Thomas Hardy has set himself to tell in "The Dynasts," now, with the publication of the third volume ("The Dynasts," Vol. III., Macmillan), offering itself for judgment as a completed work. The design, on the grand scale, is not unworthy of the subject. This "Drama of the Napoleonic Wars, in three parts, nineteen acts, and one hundred and thirty scenes," certainly does not suffer from any inadequate apprehension of the crowded, tumultuous, and ever-changing arena of human destiny. Much of the blank verse unfortunately is of the baldest prose: and although the songs of the common people and the lyrical laments of the Spirits of Irony and Pity which brood over the human conflict often rise into a noble eloquence, it cannot be said with authority that Mr. Hardy has succeeded where so many predecessors have failed. He is true to the fact, he exhibits humour as well as sorrow and inquiry, he can pass from the field of battle and all its horrors to the rustics in a Dorsetshire inn, beating their mugs on the wooden table and singing of the exploits of Trafalgar. The present volume commences with the French armies streaming over the Niemen into Russia; never, for the most part, to return. It is the consummation of the world drama of a generation, the breaking of a power whose superhuman efforts had seemed able to defy alike the plans of men and the envy of the gods. But the whole description here of heroism and horror is less adequate than the "1812 Overture": for, indeed, music alone appears the suitable medium for the gathering up of such mingled emotions, of triumph and agony and regret.

And the successive scenes of this book are full of tempest and fury and flame; passing from one stricken field to another, as the star which has guided one man to the overlordship of the world pales and sinks and sickens, till finally he passes stormily forth, in the tempest of Longwood, an exile prisoner in the waste spaces of the ocean. Salamanca, Borodino, Moscow burning, the retreat and the Beresina, with a mad soldier singing wild songs in the snow—these make up the first act. The second is of the long collapse and fall; Vittoria, with the English soldiers singing of the joys of parading with the girls on Weymouth esplanade; Leipzig (the really decisive battle of the world, for after Leipzig Waterloo was an episode), where "a chaotic gloom ensues, accompanied by the rushing of a mighty wind." And then follows what is perhaps the most astonishing incidents in the most astonishing story which the sun has ever gazed upon; the lion-like struggle—successful for so long with a handful of boy conscripts and the terror of a name—for the defence of France in those winter months of invasion; the abdication; Elba; the return; the hundred days; Waterloo. Napoleon vanishes in the darkness of the night after that stupendous struggle, mocked by the Spirit of the Years, the Spirit of the Pities, bowed out with scarce the semblance of ironic courtesy by the "Immanent Will" which has used him for its purposes and now discards him, his work being done.

In a last scene in the Over-world—the far-off dwelling-place of the gods "above the thunder," with Europe dwindled to a picture beneath the clouds below—c Conference of those Powers which play with men's lives sums up the meaning of this mighty drama. The semi-choruses of the Pities refuse to be baffled by the seeming confusion and aimlessness of it all, demanding a faith that love and intelligence and compassion will "conquer at the last." The Ironic Spirit still mocks at such hopes from "the dreaming, dark, dumb Thing, that turns the handle of this idle show." But hope dominates at the end; and the curtain of the great drama rings down on a fine song of exultation (which has already appeared in the pages of THE NATION):—

"But a stirring thrills the air
Like the sound of joyance there,
That the rages
Of the ages

Shall be cancelled, and deliverance offered from the darts that were,
Consciousness the will informing, till it fashions all things fair."

The plan is adequate, although the execution is deficient. No one could do justice to this tremendous time without the introduction of some such supernatural machinery, the elevation of these upheavals and slaughters as something more than a "struggle of ants in the gleam of a million million of suns." Carlyle, in a letter, revealed his plan of the history of the Revolution—"to splash down what I know in large masses of colour: that it may look like a smoke and flame conflagration in the distance—which it is." In the Napoleonic tumult there were long periods of peace: four years between Marengo and Austerlitz, three (except for the "Spanish Ulcer") between Wagram and Borodino. Yet just as eating and drinking appear impossible during the Terror, so these periods of tranquillity are forgotten in the vision of the succeeding time; and day and night, seed time and harvest, are haunted always by an insistent melody, the melody of the end and the beginning of a world.

THE TRIUMPH OF THE SWEET PEA.

PROFESSIONAL florists are well accustomed to the rise and fall of flowers. They have seen the zonal geranium reigning as a queen while the daffodil grew unnoticed in cottage gardens. They have seen the geranium decline and the daffodil rise to dizzy heights of favour—and the substantial price of £50 per bulb! They have seen cactus dahlias ascend and verbenas descend. But even they, with all their experience of the fluctuations in favour which alternately raise and depress flowers, have been astonished at the rapid rise of the sweet pea. A few years ago this was a little flower of three or four colours, which people grew for its fragrance, as they grew mignonette, and sweet Sultan, and stocks. It now has two or three hundred varieties, a special society all to itself, and great exhibitions in different parts of the country. Twenty years ago one might as reasonably have expected to see a flower show made up of snapdragons as one composed of sweet peas; but a July day last year saw the Royal Horticultural Hall at Vincent Square crowded with people, who had gathered from all parts of the United Kingdom, as well as from America, to see an exhibition of this now popular flower.

The remarkable point is that the most learned florist in the whole world of horticulture cannot tell you exactly how it has come about. For nearly 150 years the sweet pea stood practically still. During the next half-century fresh varieties now and then appeared, but then they suddenly began to pour out in dozens, in scores, in hundreds; and now never a year passes but thirty or forty fresh sorts appear. They are not all distinct, but it is an interesting fact that the most beautiful variations among sweet peas occurred after the great flow had been running some time, and not at the beginning of it. So wonderful are some of the new forms that the astonished florists are asking themselves whether finality has been reached even now, or whether this amazing flower has not further surprises in store.

What is the cause of the strange fecundity? It has to be remembered that the sweet pea is a comparatively old flower in this country. The first authentic record of its introduction to England relates to 1699, in which a monk named Cupani sent seeds from Sicily to a Dr. Uvedale, at Enfield. The plant raised from them had a purple, perfumed flower, and a Dutch botanical publication staggeringly described it as Lathyrus distoplatyphyllus, hirsutus, mollis et odoratus. Thus burdened, it is not surprising that some thirty years elapsed before a seedsman had the temerity to include it in his list. At the end of fifty years there were three forms—a white, a variegated, and the original purple; after another fifty years a black and a scarlet had been added. Thus 100 years had only produced four varieties.

In the first seventy years of the second century things moved a little quicker, but not very much. A striped sweet pea appeared, and then a so-called yellow. (In passing, it may be noted that florists have been raising "yellow" sweet peas ever since, the main drawback to the enjoyment of which is that they are not yellow.) Presently came a variety with blue in it, but it was not wholly, or even mainly, blue; it was a white variety with a blue margin. Then came a pink, then a violet, then a carmine. But it was not until 1870, nearly 200 years after the introduction of the Lathyrus distoplatyphyllus, &c., that the real move began. In that year an obscure gardener named Eckford took five varieties of sweet peas and set to work at improving them. It was a momentous step for flower-lovers. Eckford "struck a vein" almost at once, and season after season for over thirty years he sent out a stream of beautiful varieties. The new floral magician did not merely create fresh colours; he doubled the size of the flowers. He gave us lovely blue, rose, pink, lavender, mauve, purple, bronze, cerise, carmine, flaked, violet, scarlet, lemon, crimson, and salmon varieties, and he gave us blossoms of finer form and greater substance than we had ever seen before.

This was good, but there was more to come. Nature might have been watching the patient labours of Eckford, and slowly maturing a resolve to outdo them, for she suddenly played a dramatic floral coup in the production of a sweet pea of entirely novel shape, which she produced in two gardens about the same time—the first that of Earl Spencer at Althorp Park, Northampton; the second a market garden near Cambridge. It was a happy dispensation on her part to offer one of her gifts to a member of the nobility and the other to a struggling professional. Absorbed at the chessboard of politics, it is doubtful if Lord Spencer knew anything about the happening in his garden; if he had interested himself in it he would certainly have found himself involved in a maze every whit as difficult as that of Parliamentary procedure. The "Countess Spencer" sweet pea had a waved or frilled flower; that was its peculiarity. But its colour—a brilliant pink—was very beautiful.

The floral world rose en masse, and demanded seed of the frilled sweet pea with pink flowers at any cost. But it did not get it. Instead, it got frilled sweet peas of all sorts of colours, and a good many that were not frilled at all. Buffetings of unhappy seedsmen! Meetings of committees! Fierce controversies in horticultural papers! The "Countess Spencer" had "flattered only to deceive." It was what cross-fertilisers term "unfixed"—that is, was freakish and sportive, refusing to settle down and produce flowers of the proper character. Even now, although florists have been struggling with it desperately for six years, it is a variety of many moods, full of charming, but most exasperating, uncertainty; adorable to the uttermost degree when soberly producing its lovely flower of the true frilled shape and of the true pink colour, but unreliable. Never was floral fair so fickle as "Countess Spencer."

Again we ask: How has it come about? What is the cause? Botanists have said that the sweet pea cannot be cross-fertilised by bees as other flowers are, because the organs are shut up in the close segments until the time for pollination is passed. The fact that it stood still for 150 years lends colour to this. Has the ingenious bee been thinking over the problem during many generations and learned how to get in at last, for instance, by splitting the calyx? Or has the change been effected by a small insect, crawling from flower? We lean to the latter view.

So cheap is the plant, so easy to grow from seed sown at this season, that flower lovers of every degree can grow it. And for many months, if cultivated in rich, moist soil, and persistently gathered from in order to prevent seeding, it keeps its beautiful butterfly battalions of bloom a-wing. The lovely and fragrant blossoms flutter like great tropical flies among their green leaves and slender tendrils, and they give us basketfuls, armfuls, of flowers for our rooms and hospital wards.

Letters from Abroad.

THE NAVAL RACE AND GERMAN FINANCE.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Is there a real cause for a counteracting naval programme on the part of England as against the new German shipbuilding programme? This is no more a purely English question than the new German programme is a purely German question. In our days of, happily, increasing international relationship, no step taken by one country leaves the others unaffected. A more rapid increase of the German men-of-war will undoubtedly alter the proportion of German to English ships; but it is not quite in the same degree a matter of course whether the old proportion must be restored at the quickest possible rate and in the old fashion. If it belongs to the English to decide this question, a German who always has worked for the best possible relations between the two nations may be permitted to add a few observations to its discussion.

Taken by itself, the new Naval Bill of the German Government would appear to be almost, if not quite, unobjectionable. It proposes to fix the life of the great battleships at twenty years instead of twenty-five years on the naval programme settled in June, 1900, and to alter the programme accordingly, so that the number of big battleships to build for replacement in the decade from 1908 to 1917 will be seventeen instead of thirteen. Of the first-class cruisers one less will be built during this time than was foreseen by the programme of 1900. As almost everybody admits that to-day big battleships become obsolete after twenty years' life, the proposal is the less calculated to alarm Englishmen, since England, with her "Dreadnoughts," is much more ahead of Germany or any other country than she has been for many years. Altogether I am inclined to believe that this new Bill has no particular anti-English aim. The anti-English feeling has greatly subsided in Germany. It has ceased to be the sentiment of the nation, as it was at the time of the South African war. To-day it is but the affair of particular political groups. And if these groups are strong enough to make from time to time some noise in the public arena, they have ceased to make a deep impression on the mind of the general public, and their influence is bound to decline perceptibly. The faster the bill grows the more the people have to pay for the policy they uphold.

In stating this I am not driven by a desire to palliate or suppress unpleasant realities. But quite apart from the fact that for many years to come England's superiority on the sea over two, if not more, Powers is pretty surely established, and that the co-operation of France or any other of the great maritime Powers with Germany in a war against England is about the most improbable thing on earth, there is little left of the irritated feeling one encountered almost everywhere in Germany a few years ago whenever the conversation turned on England. Whatever Englishmen may think of the South African policy of the present Government, its Irish policy and its resistance to Protection, these and similar measures have at least regained for England many sympathisers amongst the democratic forces of the Continent which she had lost, and have softened much adverse criticism. An anti-democratic English Government will not make the German jingoes England's friends, whilst it is sure to alienate the sympathies of the rising democratic forces. If England wants to make moral conquests on the Continent she can only succeed by trying to justify her renown as one of the leading nations in political and social progress.

It is hardly necessary to enlarge here on the close relations of progress and finance. Directly or indirectly all measures of real progress turn to-day on finance, and bad finance means bad reform. That is what people now are taught in Germany. If the new Naval Bill can in itself be defended on technological grounds—and this is one of the reasons why men of strong Free Trade leanings and decided good feelings in regard to England, like Herr Hotheim, of the Freisinnige Vereinigung, have voted for it—it is sure to put a severe strain on the finance of the Empire and increase the discontent of large sections of the nation.

In spite of the increased revenue from duties and new indirect taxes, the Imperial Budget for 1908 offers, in the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Herr von Stengel, in his Budget speech of November 28th, 1908, a "most unfavourable picture." This for a good many years has been nothing exceptional. Two years ago the same Herr von Stengel described the state of the Imperial finance as "utterly deplorable." Since 1902 the Empire has laboured under increasing deficits. The Imperial Debt does not cease growing, and nobody knows when this state of things will alter. But everybody knows why the Imperial Exchequer is in such a dilemma, that Prince Bülow has the greatest difficulty in finding a successor for Herr von Stengel, who, after little more than four years, leaves his office in a worse plight than that in which he found it. Prince Bülow himself stated the facts quite candidly one day in the Reichstag. "In 1873," he said, "Imperial Army and Navy required 267 millions of marks current and 66 millions temporary expenditure. In the Budgetary year 1891-1892 the current expenditure was 756 millions, the temporary 105½ millions of marks. In eighteen years the sum wanted has doubled; but the year 1902 requires already for army and navy a round milliard of marks." (Speech of December, 1905.) In the same speech Prince Bülow made the following statement in regard to the liabilities of the Empire:—"Until 1877 free of debt, in 1905 more than 3½ milliards of Imperial debt." To-day the Imperial Debt—as apart from the debts of the single States—exceeds four milliards, and in the Budget for 1908-1909 the expenditure for army and navy sums up to no less than 1,350 millions of marks.

The interdependency of the two amounts is quite obvious. Considering that England's National Debt amounts in marks to 18 milliards, and the State Debt of France to 24 milliards, four milliards may not appear very much for a country like Germany. But it must not be forgotten that besides the Imperial Debt the different German States have their own debts, which together amount to more than 11 milliards. It is true that against these debts the States have very considerable profit-bearing assets (railways, mines, lands, &c.), which in some, as, e.g., Saxony, exceed in capital value the amount of the debt. Moreover, although the income per head of population is in Germany still below that of the population of the United Kingdom, France and some other countries, she would pretty well bear comparison with her neighbours were it not that her debt is rapidly increasing whilst other countries succeed in reducing theirs. Again, the whole financial and fiscal policy of the German Empire tends to and even aims at raising the prices of all the necessities and small luxuries of life. In pursuing this insane policy, the political and financial rulers of Germany have also succeeded in keeping the price of money—viz., the rate of interest—very high. It is now 6 per cent., against a bank-rate of 4 per cent. in England and 3 per cent. in France.

Here you have the crux of the financial straits of the Empire. There is no need to exaggerate things. It is not for want of wealth in the country that the Imperial Exchequer is nearly in the position of a bankrupt. Germany has ceased to be a poor country; her wealth is steadily increasing. Herr Dernburg, the Colonial Secretary, stated last year in one of his electoral speeches that during the last two decades the wealth of the German nation has increased by at least 30 milliards of marks, and an investigation of the movement of the income-tax in the different States will show that this was hardly far from the truth.

On November 25th, 1907, Herr von Stengel put to the Reichstag the question how it was possible that with all this increase of wealth, with trade and commerce in such a flourishing state, the Government could not settle the financial troubles of the Empire. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer himself gave the needed explanation when a little later on he said in the same speech: "There is one thing about which I want to destroy all doubts: the Federated Governments are not going to propose you an Imperial direct tax."

It is clear, therefore, that the finance of the Empire will in future be sustained by indirect taxation and, if possible, Imperial monopolies. It is a dogma with the present rulers and ruling classes in Germany that the direct taxes (income, property, &c., tax) will be left to the States, the taxes on land and houses to the municipalities, whilst the Empire must put up with indirect taxes. And, quite apart from the inherent injustice of the indirect taxes, this amount is enhanced in Germany by the Protectionist importation duties.

Calculated per head of population, the yield of the indirect taxes and importation duties of Germany amounts to less than the yield of excise and duties raised in England. But the yield to the Exchequer does not in Germany show the whole amount of the tax paid by the people. Thus, if in 1906 the yield of the duties on corn and leguminosæ was 3.55 marks per head of population, the tax paid by the mass of the consumers did not end there, for they had it also to pay into the pockets of the agriculturist. Germany imports at present of the nine millions of tons of rye it consumes in the year less than half a million of tons from abroad. Consequently not more than 25 millions of marks are paid into the Exchequer as duty on rye. But the price of rye is in Germany 50 marks—the amount of the duty—over the price of the world's market, whether it is rye produced at home or abroad, so that the tax is, in fact, 450 millions of marks. Not quite in the same proportion, it is the same thing with wheat, where out of a consumption of six millions of tons about two millions come from abroad. The real tax paid per head is three times the amount paid into the Imperial Exchequer. And so with all the other necessities and luxuries, the raw materials and auxiliary materials, which enjoy protective duties. The comparative figures of the taxes on food and luxuries in the different countries are absolutely misleading. The industrial and commercial classes, the wage-earners, and the salaried people, pay much more in Germany than is visible in the accounts of the tax-collector and the Customs officer.

At almost the same rate that Germany is becoming a wealthy country she becomes also a dear country. The index figures of the article of the consumption of the masses show from 1895 to 1906 alone an increase of 22.29 per cent. Some sections of the wage-earners have, by their unions, succeeded in raising their wages as much or perhaps more, but others have not, and all see their money increases threatened, whilst the era of cheapness belongs to the past. It is an act of daring to enhance at such a moment the price of some of the small luxuries of the masses, and this the more as a number of hitherto independent or semi-independent traders would be ruined by a new increase of the tax. No wonder that Prince Bülow has great difficulty in finding a successor for Herr von Stengel.

There is something ironical in the fact that German Protection stands in the way of the German fleet, but a fact it is. If the ruling classes of the Empire do want a navy double as strong as the present, why do they shirk paying for it in direct taxation? Well, the hothouse creation of high incomes has made life not only dearer but also much more exacting than before. Germany has also become a country of expensive enjoyments. The claims of the life of a middle-class family have enormously increased, the mushroom gentility leading the way in creating new wants, and the spendthrift is generally and naturally a miser as soon as public duties are in question.

Thus the lust for more and still bigger ships is in a high degree bridled by financial considerations. We have a deficit of several hundred millions of marks to face. The estimate of the Budget shows an expenditure of 2,750 millions and an income of only 2,162 millions of marks, which leaves a deficit of 588 millions of marks to cover. Of this 250½ millions are already assigned in the shape of a new loan to the increase of the Imperial Debt; of the remaining 327 millions some 24 millions will be put to the account of the States as so-called matricular contributions (i.e., contributions according to population), and for about 300 millions of marks new taxes or some lucrative monopoly must be found—a task all the more difficult as the all-powerful agriculturists strongly oppose any tax or monopoly that might endanger the sale of spirits.

In the face of all this there is no great probability of a considerable augmentation of the naval expenditure in the near future. Too many people are now hit by the financial difficulties of the Empire, and the number of persons who dream of a great naval adventure is too small to counterweigh the general desire for peace in this direction as well as for peace in general. The masses of the working-class democracy are united in their resistance to the insane race in armaments. Their representatives in Parliament have been outvoted, but the masses are there, and as much impregnated as ever with a sense of their mission as the guardians of peace between the nations.—Yours, &c.,

Berlin, February 16th, 1908.

ED BERNSTEIN.

The Drama.

HAMLET AND ROSMER.

MR. FORBES ROBERTSON, having added to our gallery of stage portraits—with the complete indifference of the critics—a highly attractive picture of Julius Cæsar, has now retired to the Kennington Theatre, where he is presenting Hamlet. At Terry's, another London theatre—by virtue of a special appeal to people with intellectual interests—a company is playing "Rosmersholm," a finished example of Ibsen's poetry and stagecraft. Let us suppose that we possessed a National Theatre under such competent direction as, for example, Mr. Granville Barker could supply. What would have happened to the three plays I have in mind? Mr. Robertson being a Shakespearian hero by natural endowment of presence, and voice, and a certain faculty for poetic suggestion, would be furnished with associates able to speak the Shakespearian line, and to suggest Shakespeare's idea of Ophelia, the King, Laertes, Polonius, and the jesting grave-diggers. The Ibsen play would be naturally presented under the same conditions, and the agent of the State, with an eye for educated and suitable talent, would have selected the best available Rebecca and Rosmer, and Kroll, and have dignified those actors by his choice. Mr. Shaw's play, "Cæsar and Cleopatra," would have been added to the repertoire of such an institution, because it possessed the qualities of grace, humour, and historical fancy which it was desirable to exhibit to playgoers, and to honour among artists. Let me take an instance from the other side of the water. M. Lemaître is now delivering a series of lectures in Paris on "Racine," I have no doubt to crowded audiences. The national taste for this imposing artist is not, however, confined to lectures about him. It is continually stimulated, not merely by stage representations at the Théâtre Français, but by performances, before thousands of Frenchmen and Frenchwomen, in huge public halls like the Trocadéro. How many British frequenters of the theatre, in intervals of repose from a dazzling succession of merry widows and dear old Charlies, have seen a tolerable rendering of "The School for Scandal," or "She Stoops to Conquer"?

However, here we have Shakespeare and Ibsen, thrust suitably into their corners, to make room for masters of the mimetic art like Mr. Tree and Mr. Alexander, and the creations that clothe the genius of these godlike men. As it happens, the old dramatist and the new are illustrated by two Scandinavian dramas, not dissimilar in subject. It is easy to think of Hamlet and Rosmer as kindred beings. Both suggest a character and a situation closely appealing to the modern mind—a personality fully endowed with feeling, just, honest, and pious (in the classical rather than the Christian sense), forced by fate and temperament to essay a task too hard for it, and doomed not only to fail, but to sow unhappiness and suffering in each step of its path. Both start badly—for they are in "the power of a distorted view of life." Both are slaves of a temperament, bound to an inheritance. Hamlet's sensitiveness opens to him the invisible world, and lures him on to a life lived for revenge, though he obviously desires in his heart to live it for affection, for friendship, for study, for refined enjoyment. Rosmer, with all the weight of the Rosmer legacy on his head, wishes to reform the great world, being all the while quite incompetent to rule the small world of his home, and to prevent two extremely loveable women from wasting their lives on him, and dying uselessly to give him peace. Both Hamlet and Rosmer are indeed such destructive beings that there is nothing finally left for their creators to do but to hurry them off the stage after they have strewn it with corpses. And both are barely conscious of their tremendous faculty for disposing of the souls and bodies of others. Everybody loves them, and yet their affection is as fatal as that of the lady for the dear gazelle.

The theme is irresistible to the artist, for it is very close to existence, and may be reasoned about and poetised about to infinity. Ibsen, it is needless to say, reasons about it, and brings to its execution all the resources of his wonderful stagecraft. Every speech, every word, every turn of the wheel of circumstance, wind the grave-clothes more closely round Rosmer's breast. We soon see that he cannot escape; this much-deceived and much-deceiving Endymion must die, like Brand, if the world is to live. Shakespeare has no such method, no such mind. He is hardly a "subtle-soul'd psychologist." But he has a power of rendering emotion poignant, of making the voice of human misery echo to the stars, such as the cold and self-contained Ibsen never possessed. Moreover, his voice is the very voice of music; at his best he must speak magically, and his heroes and workaday beings must wring the heart-strings with every utterance. Achieving this supreme effect of poetic drama, he seems careless of the moral and intellectual problems he suggests, and is not so interested in them, or perhaps so conscious of them, as to work them out after a manner satisfying to a modern audience. What, for instance, is one to make of Hamlet? Every now and then, he is quite out of the picture, a dilettante of the stage, an amateur of letters, who is within an ace of being bored with his father's ghost as the gentleman in the Convention was bored by Robespierre's iteration concerning the Supreme Being. Therefore, the actor who italicises one side of his temperament—such as the impression which the supernatural vision makes upon him—finds it difficult to carry off these interludes of indifference or forgetfulness. Did Shakespeare mean all they imply? Or was his whole conception of the character and the situation somewhat loose, and is this ever-beautiful, wandering, fascinating, work puzzling, not because its author is too subtle for us, but because the intellectual side of his genius was less fully developed than its æsthetic quality?

Mr. Robertson's Hamlet, like Irving's greater conception of the part, attempts to impart plausibility to these difficult passages. The effect of such ingenuities is rarely satisfying. For example, the actor desires to give some immediate physical explanation of the extraordinary harshness of Hamlet's tone to Ophelia in the famous colloquy in which he denies his love and rebuffs her tender advances. Therefore he breaks the scene into two by making Hamlet suddenly discover Polonius listening behind the curtain. This, in Mr. Robertson's version, makes him suspect Ophelia as a decoy, and explains the brutality of the closing speech. There may be stage tradition behind the notion, but it strikes one as unnecessary. Hamlet is habitually brutal to Ophelia, and at time singularly coarse in address to her, and the tone and style of the colloquy are all of a piece. But there is no hint that he cherishes a slighting feeling for her, or regards her as other than the innocent "rose of May," whose beauty his hand has marred. The real difficulty is Hamlet's moral instability and inconsistent levity of tone and action. Thus Polonius's death barely affects him; there is no hint that he guessed the deadly wound his slaying of the father would inflict on the daughter he loves. In such characteristics you have the clue to the theory of Hamlet's madness, as well as in his impulsive and fitful schemes, his inattention to the purpose he has assigned himself, his easily aroused interest in the side-shows of life, which must always (one thinks) have charmed him. In this sense his mind is truly "out of tune"; and it is possible to argue that Shakespeare meant something more than to describe a sceptical and morbidly indecisive man, and wished to exhibit some such tremulous balance between reason and madness as he depicts in Lear.

Mr. Robertson is an acceptable Hamlet, not only because nature has given him a face—sensitive, studious, nobly refined—such as one likes to think Hamlet possessed, but because he has the gift of suggesting the poetic character. But Shakespeare, like Ibsen, must be played all through; no man who cares for art can be satisfied with the modern device of the single "star" shining among obscurities. If the need of our time is first the abolition of the Censorship, with its shield for nearly ever form of license that is merely vulgar, the second is a corrective of such license, in the setting up of a national standard of dramatic excellence.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

It was the wish of the late Professor Jowett that the proceeds from the sale of his works should be employed in promoting the study of Greek literature, and in a codicil to his will he expressed the hope that the translation of Aristotle's works, begun by his own rendering of the "Politics," should be proceeded with as speedily as possible. Acting in co-operation with the delegates of the Oxford University Press, the authorities of Balliol have now determined to establish a Jowett memorial in the shape of a series of translations of all the extant works of Aristotle. An English version of "The Parva Naturalia," by Professor J. I. Beare and Dr. G. R. T. Ross, has just been published, and arrangements have been made to issue several other translations. The editors of the series, Mr. J. A. Smith, of Balliol, and Mr. W. D. Ross, of Oriel, invite communications from scholars willing to undertake such of the treatises as are still unprovided with translators.

* * *

OWING to the success of Mr. O'Connor's delightful "Peter Pan Picture Book," Messrs. Bell have decided to issue a companion volume, "The H.M.S. Pinafore Picture Book," next autumn. The story is to be written by Sir W. S. Gilbert, who will besides contribute a number of black and-white illustrations supplementary to the coloured pictures, which are to be done by Miss Alice Woodward. Mr. Barrie transformed "Peter Pan" from a story into a play. It will be interesting to see how Sir William Gilbert will carry out the reverse process. We can at least be certain that it will result in a witty and attractive book.

* * *

IN Byron's opinion, Beau Brummell was one of the three great men of the nineteenth century, the other two being Napoleon and Byron himself. Brummell certainly deserves the foremost place in the annals of dandyism, and is a far more striking personality than men such as Wilson, Hewitt, Fielding, or Nash, who gained a similar notoriety. Captain Gronow, who writes fully about him in his entertaining "Reminiscences," says that, while at Eton, Brummell was "the best scholar, the best boatman, and the best cricketer," while the famous mot "Who's your fat friend?" directed against George IV. when Prince of Wales, shows that he had wit as well as audacity. "Beau Brummell and His Times," by M. Roger Boutet de Monvel—who is a relative of the famous artist—contains an excellent account of Brummell's career. An English translation, with an introductory chapter on "Dress in the Eighteenth Century," by Miss Mary Craven, is to be issued shortly by Mr. Eveleigh Nash.

* * *

NEXT week Mr. John Lane will publish "The Rebirth of Religion," by Dr. A. S. Crapsey, an American clergyman, whose trial and expulsion for heresy by the Protestant Episcopal Church caused a great sensation in the United States last year. Dr. Crapsey contends in his coming book that the conceptions underlying current dogma in all the churches have passed away, and that they are being replaced by a spiritual religion of greater power and attractiveness. There are short discussions of such questions as the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection, but the greater part of the book deals with the way in which theological dogmas have obscured the essential truth of the Christian religion.

* * *

MR. BENJAMIN KIDD has been chosen to give the "Herbert Spencer Lecture" before the University of Oxford next year. He has not yet decided on his precise subject, but it will be connected with sociology. A new and cheaper edition of his "Principles of Western Civilisation" is to be published next week.

* * *

By an oversight four novels—"Second Selves," by Algernon Gissing; "An Empty Heritage," by Violet Tweedale; "Demos Awakes," by David Christie Murray; and "A Woman's Aye and Nay," by Lucas Cleeve—were said to be published by Messrs. Digby, Long & Co. in "The Pick of the Publishing Season" last week. The books are published by Mr. John Long, who asks us to rectify the mistake.

MR. JOSEPH CLAYTON, one of the most energetic of Socialist writers and organisers, has just completed a study of "Wat Tyler and the Peasant Revolt," which Mr. Francis Griffiths will issue this season. In some sense the book is a criticism of Professor Oman's "The Great Revolt," for although after an independent perusal of the early chronicles Mr. Clayton does not challenge any of the facts given by Professor Oman, he places them in a different perspective. A document of capital value for the history of this period is the chronicle written in medieval French, which was published by Mr. G. M. Trevelyan in "The English Historical Review."

* * *

THE current number of "The Atlantic Monthly" contains an article full of vivacious gossip about the literary lady of the eighteenth century, by Miss Agnes Repplier, a writer whose essays do not seem to have in this country the reputation which they deserve. In view of the present outcry against the moral tone of many of our lady novelists, the following passage shows how far the pendulum has swung: "In matters of morality, however, the female pen was held to be a bulwark of Great Britain. The ambition to prove that—albeit a woman—one may be on terms of literary intimacy with the seven deadly sins ('Je ne suis qu'un pauvre diable de perruquier, mais je ne crois pas en Dieu que les autres') had not yet dawned upon the feminine horizon. The literary lady accepted with enthusiasm the limitations of her sex, and turned them to practical account; she laid with them the foundation of her fame. Mrs. Montagu, an astute woman of the world, recognised in what we would now call an enfeebling propriety her most valuable asset. It sanctified her attack upon Voltaire, it enabled her to snub Dr. Johnson, and it made her, in the opinion of her friends, the natural and worthy opponent of Lord Chesterfield. . . . Mrs. Hannah More's dazzling renown rested on the same solid support." If a writer in a recent number of "The Bookman" is to be credited, the lady novelists of our own day believe that impropriety has replaced prudishness as a means of promoting a literary reputation.

* * *

THE French Academy will witness, early next month, the unusual event of a triple election to its membership. The chairs vacant are those of André Theuriet, Sully Prudhomme, and Berthelot. Among the candidates who, following the usual custom, have paid a round of visits to the Academicians are MM. Henri de Régnier, Emile Bergerat, Richepin, Poincaré, Jean Lahor, Haraucourt, Aicard, Dorchain, and Francis Charnes. It is reported that several candidates who have more reputation in politics than in letters will also present themselves, and one or two of the French journals have protested against the political bias shown in recent elections to the Academy.

* * *

MR. W. G. RAWLINSON, the author of "Turner's Liber Studiorum: A Description and a Catalogue," is about to issue, through Messrs. Macmillan, a comprehensive work dealing with Turner's engravings. It is to be in three volumes, and will contain line engravings on steel and copper, mezzotints, aquatints, and lithographs, as well as specimens of Turner's work in other mediums.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

"Memoirs of Monsieur Claude, Chief of Police under the Second Empire." Translated by Katharine P. Wormeley. (Constable. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Beginnings of the Temporal Sovereignty of the Popes." By Mgr. L. Duchesne, D.D. (Kegan Paul. 7s. 6d.)

"Richard Kenworthy and His Friends." By Katherine Steuart. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

"A Great Labour Leader: The Life of Thomas Burt, M.P." By Aaron Watson. (Brown, Langham. 15s. net.)

"Ballads and Poems." By Members of the Glasgow Ballad Club. Third Series. (Blackwood. 7s. 6d.)

"Child Life and Labour." By Margaret Alden, M.D. (Headley. 1s. net.)

"Come and Find Me." By Elizabeth Robins. (Heinemann. 6s.)

"La Rivalité Anglo-Russe au XIXe Siècle en Asie." Par Dr. Rouire. (Paris: Colin. 3fr. 50.)

"Les Visages de la Vie." Poèmes. Par Emile Verhaeren. (Paris: Société du Mercure de France. 3fr. 50.)

"Lamennais: Sa Vie et ses Doctrines." II. Le Catholicisme Libéral. Par Charles Boutard. (Paris: Perin. 5fr.)

"Les Yeux qui s'ouvrent." Roman. Par Henry Bordeaux. (Paris: Plon-Nourrit. 3fr. 50.)

Letters to the Editor.

THE NATION AND THE RAILWAYS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your article on Railway Nationalisation in last week's issue is written with much more knowledge and breadth of view than one is accustomed to find in opponents of the existing system, but several of the points there raised would hardly seem to have so direct a bearing on the question of the expediency of nationalisation as is suggested.

In the first place, while the fact that railways are not competitive organisations in the ordinary sense needs no stressing, it supplies in itself no argument for universal State ownership necessarily involving an entire elimination of competition. The question is whether State purchase would remedy existing evils, and for practical purposes we need not worry our heads by considering whether these evils are connected with any failure to compete on the part of the companies.

We come then to the question of rates which are alleged to favour imported traffic. The writer of the article expresses surprise that a Tariff Reformer should seem to defend such an example of dumping, but he does not explain why he—presumably a Free Trader—should be so certain that they injure the country as a whole. If the State owned the railways, the economic effect of putting a protective tax on imported commodities would be precisely the same as if the railway rates were raised to an equivalent extent. And if your State Railway Administration were to begin to help agriculture by putting up the rates charged on large consignments of foreign traffic to the level of the rates on small lots of the home-grown article, on what ground could it resist the certain demand to help agriculture more effectively by raising the import rates still further? A Tariff Reform Government might encourage the home timber trade and please a few canal companies by doubling the low rates on imported timber, but they would probably find all the Birmingham constituencies represented by Free Traders at the next General Election. I would suggest that the difficulty is not a corollary of private ownership. Railway companies obey, so far as it is understood, the existing law against discrimination of home and foreign produce. It is much to be wished that the law were clearer. The difficulty is that while we are very ready to pass laws requiring railway companies to behave reasonably in regard to this and that, when asked to explain our ideas of reasonable behaviour we are as puzzled as the unfortunate Courts compelled to administer our foggy legislation, and are too impatient to think what it is that we really want. What would the writer of the article do if he had his way?

Finally, the article surely attaches undue importance to the theoretical possibility that the State would be able to do unremunerative things with its railways for the good of the country. Such an endeavour would almost certainly do more harm than good. We Free Traders oppose the "scientific tariff" not because it is theoretically impossible to help the country as a whole by manipulating the tariff, but because the problem is so complicated that "taxation for revenue purposes only" is, in practice, a sounder principle. The problem of scientific import tariffs is simplicity itself compared with that of scientific railway tariffs. Parliament allows about double as much to be charged on ale in casks as on extract of meat. A State Railway Administration which attempted to encourage the consumption of the more nutritious and sober liquid by reversing their positions would mean well by the country, but would soon encounter financial disaster. In a country where new lines which cannot possibly pay are continually being promoted it is rather alarming to hear that a State system would play this game more vigorously. Private enterprise has built a railway up Snowden. Do the advocates of nationalisation promise us a railway up every really noble hill?—Yours, &c., R.

February 18th, 1908.

[We made no suggestion that railroad rates hostile to foreign goods should be raised, and that home produce should thus be State-assisted. The tenor of our argument was that a policy which might be unremunerative for a company concerned with early business profits might be highly remunerative for a Government concerned with the utilisation of all national resources and with the general affairs of the people.

—ED., THE NATION.]

HOUSING IN GERMAN TOWNS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a letter which cannot easily be surpassed for clearness and perspicuity, Mr. Horsfall advocates, in THE NATION of January 18th, the introduction into England of the German system of town-planning. As Mr. Horsfall was kind enough to refer to my investigations on modern town-building, I may, perhaps, be allowed to say a few words on the problem of development of land values in connection with the system of official town-planning.

Town extension causes land in the outskirts of a town to pass gradually through three stages of value, to which I will apply the terms—(1) agricultural land, (2) building plot, (3) housing area. Now, town-planning by official authority has the effect, I will not say of actually changing agricultural land into building plots, but of creating a claim to have this change recognised. The far-reaching consequences of the change will in practice first be noticed in connection with town-extension procedure. As for private property, the land, from the very moment of the establishment of a general building plan, ceases to be a mere instrument of agriculture; it is gifted with the expectation of the increased value of building ground; it passes into the sphere of land speculation.

Now, I lay stress upon the statement that speculation as such is by no means to be handicapped. Speculation in any goods which are movable and cannot be monopolised, industrial speculation in a word, is altogether indispensable in modern life. On the other hand, speculation in unbuilt-on land (such as has developed in Germany especially) is the heaviest burden which can be laid on any people. Our land speculation, as I would define it, is merely an attempt to make gain by other people's work and other people's money. Land speculation, as grown up in Germany, has two mighty levers to work with: the one is official town-planning; the other is the official system of registering and mortgaging land by public ledgers kept by the State, making it easy to overcharge the land and hand it over at a nominal price to a penniless house-owner.

Mr. Horsfall, in a few phrases which I almost envy for succinctness, has given to the English reader a description of the predominant German system of town-building and administration: wide and costly streets lined by deep blocks and covered by objectionable barrack-dwellings; nominal owners who have paid four per cent. or nothing on the fictitious value of their houses of barrack type; a system of mortgaging, making it safe to transfer the houses at an inflated price to speculating men of business; and last of all, governing bodies elected under the "three-class system," and chiefly composed of members of the class of speculating house-owners before described. Mr. Horsfall says that in a democratic country like England, such a state of things could never occur. No doubt Mr. Horsfall's statement is correct. However, in justice to German institutions, we must add that the "three-class system," at the first outset, was meant to be an eminently liberal measure; and that the predominance of house-owners in our municipal parliaments was established by no other than the great Liberal reformer, Freiherr von Stein. Using a well-known English phrase, I might say that measures have, in this case, proved stronger than men. The "measures," perhaps, were rightly meant; but they have met with the wrong men, and therefore, in most cases, have turned out all wrong. All possible means, I believe, should be used to guard English towns against a similar experience.

Town-planning, it must be said, is a mere conception, which includes many diametrically opposite systems. It depends wholly upon the executive which system is adopted. I should be trespassing too much on the forbearance of your readers if I were to enumerate in detail the different ways of planning and enforcing town-extension. Official town-planning, in a word, regulates the form and production of houses. It may enforce the five-storeyed barrack dwelling, or may exclude it. It may adhere to a "routine" system—the great favourite with red-tapeism and land speculation—or to its antithesis, the "individualising" system, which has regard to the requirements of locality, classes of population, &c. And there are other distinctions of not less consequence. Competence in town-planning is of such weight that endless mischief might be done by the adoption of a wrong system, neglecting public interest and favouring private profit.

The aims of Mr. Horsfall are deserving of the greatest sympathy. Mr. Horsfall, no doubt, has put before the public one of the most important problems of modern town-development. But unless this movement, which any friend of municipal reform might support, is to run the risk of miscarrying, principles ought to be laid down showing to what end and extent powers of town-planning are to be created. This, of course, would be a matter of further discussion. In a few words I might say that, as fundamental, a distinction should be made between main roads and residential streets. To public authority should be given the right of planning the main roads and directing traffic. Furthermore, public authority ought to have an effective right of supervision in relation to all measures dealing with cutting up the land—private enterprise, however, retaining its initiative and independence unimpaired.

The advantages of English town-building as compared with German are cheap land and a building trade not injured and controlled by land speculators. The advantage of the German system is a large power of directing town-extension, which, however, may turn out to be either beneficial or destructive. Beyond doubt a satisfactory combination of both systems is possible, as well for Germany as for England. If the right principles be adhered to, town-planning, very far from being a dangerous experiment, will prove a great stimulus to town-extension in England and a valuable aid in the solution of certain parts of the housing question.—Yours, &c.,

RUD. EBERSTADT,
Professor.

Berlin University,
February 13th, 1908.

WHAT THE HOUSING BILL SHOULD DO.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A letter in your last issue calls attention to some disabilities under which a tenant labours while nominally he is being treated fairly by the law and the landlord.

But there are still many cases in which the law distinctly bears hardly on the tenant. The United Arts Club affair is a case in point.

There is one legal disability of the tenant of which I have as yet seen no public notice. Very few tenants obtain leases, one of the clauses of which declares that in the event of the premises leased being rendered uninhabitable by fire the tenant shall not be liable for rent. Even the London County Council does not insert such a clause in its leases except at the express desire of a tenant, and the fact that the clause is not included in the ordinary printed lease drawn up for the use of L.C.C. tenants emphasises its unusualness.

It would be interesting to know whether this indicates (a) the absence of cases in which such a clause is necessary to safeguard the tenant's interests, or (b) the abrogation by landlords of their legal right to force a tenant to pay for the shelter of a roof which no longer shelters. If, indeed, the latter alternative be true, Heaven can no longer be enforcing its Alien Exclusion Act against landlords.—Yours, &c.,

E. L. C. WATSON.

Avenue House, Clifton, York.,
February 5th, 1908.

THE RUSSIAN PRIEST.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In a not unkindly article on the above, appearing in THE NATION on the 8th inst., it is stated that clerical marriage is a "profanation" in the Roman Church and is obligatory in the Greek Catholic Church: and the "glaring antithesis" is commented upon.

These statements seem strange; for there are numbers of married priests in communion with Rome (e.g., Uniati priests), and recently in Russia priests, though not married, have been ordained for villages.

There is also a little sting in the tail of the article, where the Orthodox Catholic Church is characterised as "the representative of ancient Greek Paganism in Christian dress." One would fancy that Eastern Catholicity was some most degraded form of Christianity instead of being, as it is, the purest. But, be that as it may, in Russia, with its "Christian Greek Paganism," there is absent the repulsive aspect of Christianity shattered into countless fractions, sharply divided, mutually recriminating each other, and following out the Gospel in every particular except obeying it. There, at least, the sight has never been witnessed of fellow Christians murdering each other for the Love of God; or a Latimer preaching a sermon while near at hand a Prior Forest is being slowly roasted to death.

There one sees no priests prosecuted and imprisoned for wearing a decent apparel in church. There, at least, baptism is not degraded, confirmation neglected, and sacraments celebrated, as M. Khomiakoff affirms of Protestants, with rites unworthy of Christians. No sham priesthood or sham sacraments are in "Paganised Christian Russia."

There, though it may be "stagnant and inert," Christianity is a reality and religion is vital; there the wounds of Christ are still fresh; and there in the immobile air still float the divine words—uttered centuries ago—of her Founder and Master.

There may be ignorance and inertness in Russia, but the insular pride of English Christianity is absent, the self-righteousness of English Protestants is not there; and the missionaries of the Russian Church can show within the last twenty-five years more converts from heathenism to her "Greek Paganism in Christian dress" than all the religious bodies in England put together can show to be converted to their particular forms of Christianity.—Yours, &c.,

F. W. GROVES CAMPBELL.

Monte Rosa, Motcombe Road,
Bournemouth, W.
February 14th, 1908.

THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been waiting for some indignant protest by Liberals of influence, whether in Church or State, against the judge's decision in the recent trial for blasphemy. Failing such protest, allow me to urge:—

1. That the blasphemy laws are utterly out of date, and that if they were honestly enforced they would bring about the punishment of a larger number of well-known writers and speakers, whose reticence with reference to the recent trial is more prudent than courageous.

2. That as one who from the old Hall of Science days has endeavoured to maintain the Catholic faith against Atheists, I have found that these laws damage the Christian argument by enabling our opponents to state that we shelter ourselves behind the policeman, whereas free discussion is really essential to our position.

3. That the judge's "lenient" sentence, which compelled the accused to sign a declaration that he would not use "any language calculated to shock the feelings or outrage the belief of the public," is a most dangerous interference with free speech and argument. Every reformer, from our Lord Jesus Christ downwards, has shocked feelings and outraged beliefs. Ridicule is our best weapon for destroying error. The truth need never be afraid of it. This was once a Liberal commonplace. Has Liberalism become so corrupted by its establishment of religion in the State schools that it is going to prevent by law anyone from exposing the folly of the religion it has established?—Yours, &c.,

STEWART D. HEADLAM.

Wavertree, St. Margaret's,
February 15th, 1908.

[We quite agree with Mr. Headlam's warning as to the serious precedent set up by the decision which he criticises. ED., THE NATION.]

BRITISH JOURNALISM AND THE ANTI-CHRISTIAN MOVEMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As I thought—Mr. Dell! With this gentleman—who, having left the Anglican Communion to join that of Rome, only to belittle its supreme head and to write malevolent articles in the secular Press to damage the reputation of the clergy of the religion he has selected as his own—I will have nothing whatever to do. Of Mr. Dell's charges of anti-Semitism and fanaticism I will merely say that they are wholly unfounded. I have not the smallest prejudice against the Jews as a people, and in a book which has received considerable favour from the Press, and is widely read, "The Pageant of London," I have written this sentence: "It were better for England to lose her richest colony than for a single Jesuit or Jew to be persecuted within her dominions for his religious or political opinions." But when I consider that the Jews in this country stand at 1 per cent. of the entire population, and then compare their growing preponderance in our Press and other important concerns, I feel that it is, to say the least, singular. I possess plenty of documentary evidence of the truth of my assertions concerning the overwhelming proportion of Israelitish influence on the London Press, which I may or may not publish at some future time. There are some newspaper proprietors who are mere figureheads, and, on the other hand, there are others whose names are unknown to the public, but who influence largely the political and religious policy of the papers they virtually own and control. My letter to the Catholic Union was not intended for general circulation, and therefore I am not bound to enter into further details, especially at the bidding of an avowed enemy of Catholicism, one who is held as such by the Catholic community of his country, who consider that he deserves the severest censures of their Church.

With regard to the Bill suppressing what remains of the Loi Falloux, I am quite as well aware as Mr. Dell that it has not as yet been endorsed by the Parliament or the Senate; but I am equally certain that, with his well-disciplined and overwhelming majority, M. Briand will take good care that the Bloc passes it, precisely as M. Combes ensured the passing of the Bill against the religious congregations. Indeed, in that case, when the various Orders, putting faith in the articles published in the original draft drawn up for that measure by M. Waldeck-Rousseau, applied for the authorisation therein offered them, they were refused that authorisation, against all principles of fairness and equity. I am quite aware, too, that M. Reinach is not a Minister, and, what is more, will never be one, and the only mistake made in a necessarily brief summary of a complicated matter is a printer's error, whereby M. Buisson's name appeared as Brisson, who is, as Mr. Dell says, quite another person.

I maintain, Mr. Dell to the contrary, that the actual French Government—of which he is so energetic and brilliant a champion—is antagonistic to the Christian and even to the Theistic idea, and that it is the enemy of every sort of religious development; hence its systematic persecution of the Catholic Church, the religion of the majority of Frenchmen, and its clergy—much, apparently, to the delight of Mr. Dell.

And now, having broken thus much into your valuable space, permit me to point out before I conclude a curious coincidence. The "brutal remark" to which your attention was called by Mr. B. L. Quillin, attributed to Pius X., was originally published broadcast by Mr. Dell himself in a letter he recently addressed to the "Times"! With this I take a long farewell of Mr. R. Dell, leaving him in the choice company, which so well becomes a pious "convert," of his friend M. Aristide Briand, who, in addition to his ardent desire to destroy l'idée Chrétienne, is now reported to have declared himself to be an apostle of "Free Love," and of M. Viviani, l'Eteignoir, who employs his leisure hours in the pleasing occupation of "putting out the lights of Heaven."

Meanwhile, I beg of you to rest assured that I absolutely refuse to take the least notice of Mr. Dell or of anybody else's future communications on this subject, and any body to remain,—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD DAVEY.

February 4th, 1908.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I thought that Mr. Davey had already "declined further discussion" in his letter published on February 1st; but no doubt the opportunity of indulging in abuse of the French Government and myself was too tempting to be resisted. I will not follow Mr. Davey into the various irrelevant matters with which his present letter largely deals.

The issue is a simple one. Is it or is it not the fact that the English Press "is controlled, in most cases, by proprietors and even editors who are not of our race, history, or religion," and that "English journalism is now almost exclusively represented on the Continent by men of Oriental origin?"

I have given Mr. Davey a list of some of the principal proprietors of London daily papers—Mr. Walter, Lord Glenesk, Mr. Arthur Pearson, Lord Northcliffe, Sir George Newnes, Mr. Cadbury, Sir Alexander Henderson, the Messrs. Lloyd—and asked him for his evidence that they are not what they seem. He cannot produce it because, of course, it does not exist. But he now tells us that these gentlemen—or some of them—are mere figure-heads, and that their papers are "virtually" owned and controlled by mysterious beings of Jewish origin, who foregather no doubt in Masonic Lodges and are on friendly terms with Satan, like the mysterious beings who control the whole of France according to Mr. Davey's friends. Really Mr. Davey owes it to his country to unmask these crypto-proprietors, who must even now be trembling at the thought that their destiny is in his hands. Whence his hesitation to produce the "documentary evidence" that he possesses? He will not do it, he says, because he is asked by "an avowed enemy of Catholicism." The reason is scarcely convincing. On the contrary, Mr. Davey has the additional inducement of an easy triumph over an enemy of the Church. After such an exposure, the syndicate of Jews and Freemasons by which, according to a Catholic newspaper, I am employed, would probably cut off the supplies.

There must, by the way, be crypto-editors as well as crypto-proprietors, for the editors, whose names are given in "Who's Who," could hardly be described as "in most cases not of our race, history, or religion."

It would be absurd to take seriously this audacious bluff. The only serious matter is the fact that a man of Mr. W. S. Lilly's reputation should think it worth while to circulate such stuff among the members of a union composed of the élite of English Catholicism. That fact is symptomatic of the strange mentality which Roman Catholicism seems to produce so abundantly. One can only hope that Mr. Lilly under-rated the intelligence of the members of the Catholic Union, and wonder whether he would venture to defend Mr. Davey's theses before his fellow members of the Athenæum Club.

As to the question of the Government Education Bill now before the French Parliament, I, of course, accept Mr. Davey's explanation that "Brisson" was a misprint for "Buisson." But that explains only one of Mr. Davey's numerous mistakes in fact. He is aware now that the Bill has not become law, but he told the members of the Catholic Union that it had. He knows now that M. Théodore Reinach is not a Minister, but he said in his article that he was one. And what of his assertion that "the new law" had actually enacted a provision which has merely been proposed, and which the Government has declared that it will not accept? We are all liable to make mistakes, and Mr. Davey need not claim exemption from the common infirmity. But, when one sets up to instruct others, it is desirable first to make oneself acquainted with the facts.—Yours, &c.,

ROBERT DELL.

Paris, February 17th, 1908.

"A WOMAN'S CHARTER."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Though I do not speak in the name of Suffragettes or Suffragists, but only in my own, the answer to the question raised by Mrs. Harrison in your last issue, of whether the vote will protect women, seems to me to be obvious. "Votes," says Mrs. Harrison, "are not like the penny in the slot; the results do not come out in neatly folded packets." But if Mrs. Harrison will look back at history, she will see that it is precisely votes, and the consequent power of getting laws passed, which has brought about the evolution of the condition of the people. Let her contrast the present condition of the labourer with that when he was adscrip-tus glebi—not allowed to move from the spot where he was born, made to toil for his lord in enforced labour, and deprived of all rights; till slowly but surely he overthrew medieval slavery, and the climax of the French Revolution was reached and the equality of man proclaimed. Women are going through the same phase. They also want their equality in law proclaimed.

They, too, have been legislated for without their consent, or opinion asked; their liberties, their rights, their persons have been disposed of by men, as a matter of course.

Nothing has been conceded to woman voluntarily, and every right, from the possession of her money, her person, and her children, has had to be fought inch by inch, and is not won yet. Though women have passed the same examinations as men, the university degrees of Oxford and Cambridge are denied to them. Though they pass the same examinations as men, the professions are closed to them. Though a woman may have enthusiasm and ability for public work, the means of doing it are denied her.

Woman's contribution to the State is so important that it well may be considered to be balanced by what man does. For without her co-operation it would be useless, nay, impossible, for man to build his roads and his houses, and man's empires would fall and decay without women's help. But we hope and believe that the best men see that liberty and evolution, which is the law of life, should be the law which Liberals at least should recognise as paramount. Sex tyranny seems to be the last stronghold of wrong. With the ever increasing extension of the suffrage among men, women will be in a worse position than they have ever been in if the suffrage is not soon granted to them.

The intrusion of laws into the house, into the factory, into the minutest concerns of life, delivers the interests of women bound and gagged into the hands of men. To the women who toil, to the women who are face to face with tragedy, to the women who have suddenly to face the demands of life not only for themselves, but their children, and often their husbands, these laws which are made, and are in making, render them powerless, often homeless and destitute. There is ever the great abyss which yawns for the homeless and hungry woman, but we hear of no legislation to prevent her falling into that.

But I would appeal to men to see that the State does not exist only for the strongest; the truest civilisation and the finest State would be that which gave its best protection to the physically weak, and lifted them to an equality with the strong. That would be real law and order.

Nature meant the world (so far as Nature has intentions) to belong to both men and women; and it is because women, rightly looked at, are the best asset in the State that we want the vote, because women alone know where the shoe pinches, and what is the best legislation for them.

The State is a fluid thing, ever changing and altering and making new laws, which concern us as much as men; and because this is so, we require to formulate no Charter, for our needs will be like men's, every varying, but safely protected by the vote.—Yours, &c.,

OTTILIE HANCOCK.

125, Queen's Gate, S.W.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Your correspondent Miss Leitch writes in your last week's issue: "If we acknowledged that courtesy demands a quiet hearing for a speaker at a meeting, screams of 'Votes for women' at irrelevant moments are not only meaningless but vulgar." As a witness of what has happened at more than one Cabinet Minister's meeting during the autumn recess, may I be allowed to state that pertinent interjections made in the course of a speech cannot truly be called screams of "Votes for women," and that, when made by men listeners, they are almost invariably answered by the speaker. When made by a woman, however, the audience rises to its feet and breaks into tumult; abuse of the interrupter mingles with cheers in her favour; and after being handled with extreme roughness by the stewards, often many in number, she is thrown out of the meeting. There is, as your correspondent says, a "disorderly outburst"; I only wish to point out that it is not made by the lady who interrupts the speech. I have seen a woman, who was not a Suffragist, narrowly escape the same treatment for requesting the speaker to raise his voice; I have seen a man thrown after a woman for trying to protect her. It may be asked why we interrupt at all; why we do not wait until question time. The answer to that is that we began by doing so; but our questions were ignored, whether we wrote them down or asked them verbally. On protesting against such unstatesmanlike conduct, we were then treated in the way I have described. After that, we determined that if we were to be thrown out of the meeting in any case, we would make sure of asking our question first; so we asked it during the speech instead of waiting in vain until the end of it. In this we were but following the example of the voteless men, who, in the period preceding their enfranchisement in 1867, and again in 1884, made it impossible for any Cabinet Minister, known to be opposed to the reform, to obtain a hearing.

I do not claim for the tactics of the Women's Social and Political Union that they are in themselves dignified; but I do claim that they have been carried out entirely without violence on the part of the women. And when a class of naturally peaceable, law-abiding citizens find themselves denied, and repeatedly denied, constitutional means of demanding an urgent reform, perhaps the justice of their cause will lend to its advocates a dignity that neither the violence nor the ridicule of their opponents can take from them.—Yours, &c.,

EVELYN SHARP.

15, Mount Carmel Chambers,
Duke's Lane, Kensington, W.
February 16th, 1908.

[This correspondence must now cease.—ED., THE NATION.]

THE SUFFRAGISTS AND THE LAW.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In their sometimes ingenious campaign for the vote, the women Suffragists show a calamitous capacity for finishing badly. One morning last week I was amazed in the Westminster Police Court to see how fifty of them submitted their own interests to the hustling of the prosecution. Forty-nine were convicted and departed for Holloway in sixty-three minutes from the time the first case was called. Each woman had an average of 77 seconds of British justice. Unless the Suffragists can hit upon something less sheeplike than this meek collapse, all magistrates, prosecuting solicitors, and newspaper readers, in the absence of any dispute that the defendants are vulgar brawlers, will be unable to understand that they are anything else.

On this particular day, a few said irrelevant things like: "We protest against the Government," "We want the vote," "Votes for women," and so on. Contemptuously interrupted from the Bench, the feeble phrases from the dock seemed dismal in print. Why do the otherwise clever organisers at Clement's Inn lose all their self-possession and tenacity, whenever they collide with a magistrate? Until they engage an enthusiastic solicitor to fight every case on every conceivable ground, to cross-examine the police on the exact circumstances of every arrest, to argue against the slapdash application to their conduct of legal provisions not intended to suppress political agitation, until, in short, they deny with the utmost obstinacy that they are common street nuisances, the public will believe they consider 77 seconds long enough for their hearings. And you are not going to convince the British voter that women who allow themselves to be rushed off to prison at the rate of fifty an hour have a cause that anyone need get excited about.

See the effect of these surrenders at a crucial point in the game. Two days later Mrs. Pankhurst is forbidden a ride in a vehicle from Caxton Hall. She and twelve other women are going to the Premier with a resolution. And instantly they are surrounded by some hundreds of the largest constables in London. For all the women said and the police really knew, the suffragists might have been going to buy cakes and hats in Regent Street. Probably the law's servants were not concerned greatly about their position because they knew they would not be cross-examined about it in Court next day. When Mrs. Pankhurst, who was somewhat exhausted after her scamper from Leeds and her arduous work there, stepped from the trap, prevented from riding at her ease, she and her friends took a few steps southward. Whereupon an inspector shouted, "No procession!" And the usual hustling by the police began—but it was not as gentle as on most previous occasions. Thirteen small women, with a solid wall of constabulary chests encircling them—this was a procession then!

The fact is that there was no procession. Yet, though the police had treated the women as a political assembly prohibited from approaching Parliament, next morning in Court the prosecution was allowed by the Suffragists to proceed against them as mere rowdies whose one crime was that they dared to come outside Caxton Hall. If every woman in the "Parliament" had during the squabble, or at any time in the afternoon, left with the intention of drinking tea in Bond Street, she would have had to suffer six weeks' imprisonment in Holloway, with the authorities in such an arbitrary state of mind! This sounds like nonsense to anyone who is not intimately acquainted with truth that a hint of a Suffragist raid is enough to cause those authorities a nervous fright. The rough and ready method of dealing with Suffragists in the streets would not do if they had their solicitors to handle the police and their superiors. Why were these women arrested almost on Caxton Hall's doorstep? Was this a procession? What is the nature of a procession? Can you seriously call thirteen women with some yards separating their pairs and singles a procession? What were the instructions to each policeman? What had the women done before they were arrested? Did the police know beyond doubt that these women were going to the House of Commons? A few questions on these lines to each of the police concerned and the magisterial decisions might not have been so easy. On public and political grounds the Suffragists should battle for their liberty, and among lawyers and people who sympathise with the feminine movement there is much amazement that they should resign themselves to conviction without resistance.—Yours, &c.,

February 18th, 1908.

W. M. C.

"ENGLAND AND MR. MEREDITH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. G. M. Trevelyan in saying about Mr. Meredith (NATION, Feb. 8th), "But the world that so honours him is the English world alone," overlooks my country. Here, in Holland, Meredith is very well known and much admired, of course, not by the public in general—neither is he, I feel sure, in England—but there is a large circle here where his books are read and highly appreciated. And this is not only so in the last years; for at least twenty years Meredith has been a familiar figure for our cultured people.—Yours, &c.,

A DUTCHMAN.

Rotterdam, February 17th, 1908.

Poetry.

THE PANTHEIST.

BRUNO, the Scholar, in his latter years,
Turned to the Church, who bade him leave his lore,
Burn his dark books, and, on her lowest floor,
Kneel, in the dry-eyed sorrow, worse than tears.
There, as the faithful pass to pray, he hears Curses that bless. "Now, enter and adore!
God to His humblest room of grace restore,
And show thee where alone his light appears!"

But some who in the Scholar's cell had bent,
And tracked with him the Godhead everywhere,
Sighed for the fears that made him penitent,—
"Wilt thou greet God as though the altar-stair
Were His one home?" He answered: "Be content!
Strange if our eyes should miss Him only there!"

G. M. HORT.

Reviews.

THE RESURGENT DRAGON.*

THESE three books on China, written from different standpoints, touch kindred topics and suggest some of the changes which are now impending in North-eastern Asia. The first is written by a student of the trend in our national commerce; the second by a College President and Translator of Western text-books, who has been for many years in the service of the Chinese Government; whilst the material for the third has been gathered together by the Editorial Secretary of the China Inland Mission, who has had direct personal experience in several of the less-known provinces of the Empire. Although Mr. Sargent evidently lacks personal familiarity with the inner life of the Far East he writes a shrewd and impartial history of our commercial relations with China in the pre-Treaty days, sets forth in a series of careful statistics the ups and downs of our trade, and expounds with much clear sense our successive Treaties with the Chinese authorities and the various Conventions by which they have been defined and enlarged.

Dr. Martin's sumptuous volume gives a brief survey of the eighteen provinces, sketches the influence of the dynasties which for four thousand years have ruled China and shaped its development, and also sums up in a temper of sober hopefulness the changes which augur improvement and speedy reform. It is perhaps not Dr. Martin's fault that the paging of a series of delightful photographs often bears no relation to the letterpress. One of the poems, "Drinking by Moonlight," has already appeared in "A Cycle of Cathay." Some paragraphs are reprints not entirely rewritten, and Dr. Martin now and again plays his own Boswell by reporting smart sayings he uttered years ago in conversation with native officials, and also an after-dinner speech delivered at the Empress Dowager's birthday dinner at Hankow. He takes the Hongkong and Canton river steamer thirty or forty miles out of its course to give his readers a glimpse of Macao, and from the deck of the steamer as it is nearing the landing stage points out quail and cricket fighting on Fati! Perhaps the veteran looks upon this as a proper and playful use of the imagination. On his own ground as a scholar and a privileged friend of high officials at Peking, Dr. Martin has always much of interest and value to impart. Mr. Marshall Broomhall's book is a miniature encyclopædia or gazetteer, and brings into compact form a great mass of instructive and well-sifted facts. With the exception of three or four sections contributed by the editor himself, the chapters have been prepared by missionaries long resident in the provinces they describe. The plan of the book has its disadvantages. We are three times reminded by different contributors that the Yellow River has changed its course to the sea within living memory and also told with the same repetition that the great Yu, in his patriotic zeal as a marsh-drainer of some of the districts of Ancient China, did not once cross the threshold of his own house for three years, although he passed by the door. But such blemishes are trivial and the advantages of the arrangement far outweigh its drawbacks. The reader is brought face to face with first-hand witnesses, and touches of local colour often brighten the delineation of some of the less-known districts of the great Empire. He gets nearer to the people when he is told of the varying temperaments which mark the natives of different provinces. The Honam man is slothful and unenterprising and forms a contrast to his Hoopak neighbour south of the Yangtsze. The divergence has been crystallised in a common saying, "The Hoopak man never retires to rest till he has washed his feet, but the Honam man only washes his feet when he has to ford a river." We get a Chinese touch of worldly wisdom, with a faint suggestion of irreverent cynicism, in the Chinese comment on a group of villages which draw water through irrigation channels linked up with the

* "Anglo-Chinese Commerce." By A. J. Sargent, M.A. Oxford: Clarendon Press.

"The Awakening of China." By W. A. P. Martin, D.D., LL.D. Hodder & Stoughton.

"The Chinese Empire." By Marshall Broomhall. Morgan & Scott.

Yellow River. "The people of Ningsia don't depend upon heaven for food but upon the Yellow River."

The three books all focus attention upon those new movements, the report of which now fills China as with the thunderous tumult of an upbreking ice-river. Are these ideas of national reconstruction which are now in the air auguries of beneficent and immediate change, or are they the illusive streaks of a "False Dawn"? The reformation is bound to come, but it may come less swiftly than the more sanguine watchmen imagine. The unique history of Japan is not likely to repeat itself. The Dragon yawns and shakes himself as a prelude to the great ascent, but he may encounter a few checks and drawbacks before he gets the full use of his pinions. A just and equitable method of paying the huge multitudes of officials trained under the old régime is at the root of all stable progress, and this still seems afar off. A country cannot renew itself whose magistrates must either starve or pay themselves by exactions. Perhaps the nationalisation of the immense mineral resources of some of the provinces would be the easiest way out of the impasse, although such a proposal would find little sympathy with the foreign concession-hunters. The attitude of the Mantchoo dynasty is important although not the only factor in the problem. For the time being the Empress Dowager is a progressive, and Dr. Martin seems to believe in her sincerity, but it is perhaps the sincerity of an opportunist rather than a martyr. The Pekin palaces are still crowded with eunuchs, whose secret influence over the policy of the throne is often greater than we assume. The one outstanding statesman of the Empire, Yuan Shih Kai, represents a new type, and for the present his power is immense. The abolition of the old penal code, with trial by torture, has been declared, but the new code is not yet ready for publication, and within the last two or three years the viceroy Tseng publicly drank the blood of a rebel who had been cut to pieces in the square of one of the cities of Kwengsi. For good and for evil, Pekin edicts are sometimes forgotten. Mr. Sargent recognises that in commercial questions the Central Government cannot always at once enforce its will upon the local authorities. The Chinese throne is not an irresistible absolutism. And local governments themselves have to reckon with trade and labour guilds, and with clan systems, which not only dominate the villages, but subtend all the ramifications of city life. The people are stronger than their rulers, more conspicuously so perhaps than in some of the democratic countries of the world.

But, as an offset to these difficulties, forces which promise amelioration and improvement animate the new movements. The vitality of the race is amazing. The Chinese are flowing into their own thinly settled provinces, and by thrift and enterprise making themselves paramount over the old populations. The Mantchoo remnant will be absorbed into the Chinese mass. Perhaps the recent policy of removing the bar upon marriage between Mantchoos and Chinese is a face-saving surrender to the inevitable. The abolition of the endless octroi duties, which in some cases made inter-provincial trade difficult, and all but impossible, will create free trade between the different parts of a self-sufficing empire, and the Chinaman himself may gain more by the change than the foreign merchant. The reform movement is closely bound up with the success of the new crusade against opium. The yellow giant may astonish us when he is free from this degrading bondage.

But whatever may arise out of the present ferment, China will not in any sense allow herself to become captive to the bow and sword of foreign States. In the administration of railways, in the equipment of colleges, and in the government of native churches, the foreigner will be eliminated at the earliest possible moment, and complete native control will ensue. The movement is curiously coincident throughout these three spheres of activity. A strong national temper is expressing itself on every side. Chinese confederacies for the promotion of commerce, knowledge, or religion can never be permanently governed from the outside. The missionaries have perhaps less to fear for their work from this surging tide of racial independence than other sections of the foreign communities in the East. The Chinaman is not a dreamer like the Hindoo. He will stand by the traditional interpretation of the sacred documents of the Christian faith as he stood by the traditional interpretation of his own classics for long centuries. And he will doubtless show, as the administrator of a native church, the wisdom and sober sense he has shown in the management of his own family and municipal affairs.

CRITICS OF SOCIALISM.*

1.—MR. ARNOLD FORSTER.

Two works of hostile criticism of English Socialism published within the last few weeks deserve attention for the contrast which they present in temper and in intellectual equipment. Mr. Arnold Forster, as the occupant of a high office in the late Government, and the author of a number of educational text books upon English history and "civics," might well appear a suitable person to undertake a critical examination of the facts and tendencies comprised under the term Socialism in this country. It might have been expected that some brief account of the origin of the term as applied to the early co-operative spirit and schemes of Owen and his followers would have been given; that the survival of this earlier meaning in the Christian Socialist movement of the mid-Victorian age and even of to-day would have received due recognition; that the growing tendency for "Socialists" to rely upon public institutions and the use of politics would have been carefully traced; that the intellectual stiffening which the Marxian teaching gave to Socialistic doctrine would have been assessed; that the distinction between doctrinaire and practical Socialism, which has been of such prime importance in the English movement, would have been considered; that the three English Socialist organisations, so distinct from one another in spirit, aim, and method, would have been compared; and, finally, that the actual process of Socialisation, as expressed in the extension of public industries, public control, public support, and taxing policy, would have been concisely indicated. Such a statement of ordered fact, with judicious commentary from the pen of a practised educationalist, would have been of great service, and is essential to a study of "English Socialism of To-day."

Mr. Arnold Forster, in the set of newspaper articles he has flung into this book, makes no attempt to do any one of these things. If one may judge from certain statements in his preface, supported by strong internal evidence, he had no acquaintance with the wide literature of the subject when he determined to write these articles. His knowledge of Socialism appears to be confined to certain portions of some books and pamphlets selected for his perusal by the Secretary of the Social Democratic Federation. Although the list apparently contained publications of the Independent Labour Party and the Fabian Society, the picture here presented of English Socialism is based almost wholly upon the principles and programme of the Social Democrats and extreme statements selected from writers belonging to this section. Socialism is thus shown as a class war, in which political power or physical violence are to be employed in the seizure of the land and capital belonging to private citizens: the means of production thus seized are to be applied to public industry, in which all able-bodied citizens will be compelled to serve for a salary which will be the same for all alike, skilled or unskilled, industrious or idle, worthy or worthless. The chief immediate means to this end is the taxation "to extinction" of all rent, interest, profit, or high salaries; the repudiation of the public debt is to be accompanied by the abolition of the monarchy, the abandonment of a regular army and navy, and the dissolution of the Empire. By thus selecting his "evidence," Mr. Arnold Forster exhibits a campaign of hatred, plunder, and injustice directed to the establishment of corruption, tyranny, and inefficiency.

Why does so important a gentleman as Mr. Arnold Forster set himself to advertise and to demolish these crude revolutionary doctrines? There is nothing novel in them. For a quarter of a century this little body has been circulating this language. No serious student of politics sets any store by the Social Democratic Federation as a present or a coming force in English politics. It has sundered itself from the main stream of the English Socialist movement, as represented in Parliament and in the country.

* "English Socialism of To-day." By H. O. Arnold Forster. Smith, Elder. 2s. 6d. net.

Most of the proposals and opinions which are here held out to reprobation would be repudiated by the vast majority even of the little minority of avowed Socialists. On the Continent, where this form of revolutionary Socialism has far wider vogue, it has been necessary to subject them to serious criticism. A dozen able French and German economists, such as Leroy-Beaulieu, Molinari, Schäffle, Menger, have done with the skill of practised intellectual surgeons the dissecting work which is so clumsily attempted here.

There is no reason to suppose that a formal Socialist policy has any future in England; if it has, that Socialist policy is grossly misrepresented by the account rendered here. We do not deny that Mr. Arnold Forster "punishes" the crude Socialist doctrines. But such work is not worth doing, and, if it were, it has already been done much better. We cannot, however, lay down the book without some allusion to the curious endeavour made to fasten certain "historical antecedents" on to English Socialism. Misled by some passages hastily culled from books by Mr. Belfort Bax, the writer produces flaming sketches of "three typical periods of Socialist activity," the Anabaptist movement of the 16th century, the French Revolution of 1793, and the Paris Commune of 1871, with the object of fastening on English Socialism of to-day the red ruin, crime, and anarchy which these tragedies contained. Now while certain doctrines, rather of Communism than of State Socialism, animated some of the actors in two of the dramas here named, the presentation of the French Revolution as a "Socialistic" movement is a feat of quite extraordinary ignorance. So far as doctrines and philosophic principles were directing influences, the Revolution was, of course, the extreme and final assertion of individualism. The chief documents of the Revolution place this beyond all question. The famous "Declaration of the Rights of Man" not only speaks of "property being an inviolable and sacred right," but expressly lays down the individual basis of property as the right "which belongs to every citizen to enjoy, and freely to dispose of his income, the price of his labour and his industry," while "no man is to be deprived of his property without his consent, save for purposes of public necessity, legally established and accompanied by just indemnity." The decree of March, 1793, "declared the penalty of death against anyone who should introduce an agrarian law or any other law subversive of territorial, commercial, or industrial property." The practice of the Revolution was consistent with this theory. In its operation no attempt whatever was made to Socialise the instruments of production, even the land being straightway parcelled out to new proprietors. If Mr. Arnold Forster, who claims to have written a History of England, has ever read any sort of history of France, what does he mean by this ridiculous attempt to foist the revolution of 1793 on to Socialism? That certain local "cahiers" of the period contain bits of Socialistic phraseology is doubtless true, but to paint Socialism into this typical display of revolutionary individualism is an act of sheer intellectual effrontery.

The real reason why this book was written is, however, not obscure, and is not particularly creditable to its author. By a certain section of the Conservative Party it has been decided that it is "good business" to fasten the charge of Socialism on to the present Government and upon active Liberals in municipal politics. If, therefore, the most extreme proposals of the most violent but least influential section of avowed Socialists can be made to represent English Socialism, and then by implication or suggestion this Socialism can be made to appear the driving force in the social reform and the financial policy of the Liberal Party—well, it may be worth while for even so important a person as Mr. Arnold Forster to risk his scholastic reputation by lending a hand in this serviceable work.

[We shall deal next week with Mr. Mallock's far more impressive book.]

A PROFESSOR OF BELLES LETTRES.*

WHEN we say that this work, within the very moderate compass of some four hundred pages, sketches the characteristics and progress of the literature which has during the last half century been produced in England, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Poland, and Russia, and that in the course of it its accomplished author gives us his verdicts on upwards of five hundred authors, we may form some idea of the obligations under which he has laid a grateful public. It is not, indeed, quite easy to see what end can be served by such a feat beyond creating surprise at the possibility of its accomplishment. Tours de force are generally more satisfactory to their performers than to anyone else, and this achievement is no exception to the rule. The Professor himself observes, with much complacency, that it is a survey which out-Pisgahs Pisgah. We should have preferred ourselves to take an analogy from the Tower of Babel. To change the figure, it may be described as a sort of literary bovril or concentrated essence of critical hotch-potch. But the Professor is a deft hand, and knows his public. What the public want now are neither facts nor details, but impressions and opinions, and it is very greatly to Professor Saintsbury's credit that, having the sagacity to discover this, he has had the good sense to take seriously what Swift, in less enlightened days, suggested ironically. Whether Professor Saintsbury resorts to the same methods in acquiring his erudition as he pursues in imparting it we cannot, of course, say, nor are we concerned to conjecture. But this we can say—that the book before us has evidently been produced in accordance with the receipt given by Swift's philosopher:—

* "The Later Nineteenth Century." By George Saintsbury, M.A. William Blackwood & Sons. 6s.

"You take fair correct copies, well bound in calf-skin and lettered at the back, of all modern bodies of arts and sciences whatsoever, and in what language you please. You cleanse away carefully the sordes and caput mortuum, letting all that is volatile evaporate. You preserve only the first running, which is again to be distilled seventeen times till what remains will amount to about two drams. This you keep in a glass phial hermetically sealed for one and twenty days. Then you begin your Catholic treatise, taking every morning fasting, first shaking the vial, three drops of this elixir, snuffing it strongly up your nose. It will dilate itself about the brain (where there is any) in fourteen minutes, and you immediately perceive in your head an infinite number of abstracts, summaries, compendiums, extracts, collections, medullas, excerpta quedams, florilegias, and the like, all disposed into great order and reducible upon notice."

To the Professor's many admirers the work will have peculiar attractiveness, as presenting the crème de la crème of his singularly fine and delicate discrimination, particularly as a critic, say, of such poets as Heine and of such writers as Renan. And refreshing, indeed, it is to see him striding, polymathic and polyglottic, through every country in Europe, as much at home in the literatures of Germany, Russia, Poland, and Denmark as he is in that of Italy, France, Spain, Portugal, and England. We have referred to Babel. With what a contemptuous smile must such linguistic omniscience as is here revealed confront the curse which has impeded so many scholars! It is perhaps to be regretted that Professor Saintsbury has not tempered his omniscience with a little more regard for the graces of style, and that he so frequently favours us with such passages as the following:—

"Take 'Les Orientales' and any piece of the late M. Verlaine's latest, or of the youngest living French contributor to Vers et Prose who is not merely trying to embêter or épater his reader—take instances at any reasonable stage-distance between—and just as in the case of 'Claribel' and the latest English verse (with the same proviso), the common agreement will emerge at once, when you compare the one set with a piece of Delille's, or even of J. B. Rousseau's, the other with a piece of any eighteenth century English poet—even Thomson, even Gray—except Blake."

We like, too, the mingled urbanity, lucidity, and grace of the following:—

"You can be a classical believer, sentimentalist, optimist, fantast (this most difficultly but possibly) a romantic infidel, cynic, pessimist, and (this most difficultly but possibly) scientific person. It is the riding that does it."

How refined, too, is the accent here:—

"Ungallant critics have sometimes assimilated French writings to French women, and have said that with unsurpassed neatness, skill in presenting themselves, adroit savoir faire in company, genius for dress, practical shrewdness, and so forth, the more witching charms of feature and expression are not uncommonly common in the whole of Gaul."

This, it may be added, is said in the "criticism" of M. Renan, who fares as such a writer would be likely to fare with the master of a style which is not exactly that of the author of the "Vie de Jésus."

But what we like most in Professor Saintsbury are such felicities as the following. Of Flaubert it is observed that he "does not keep a milk-walk for babes," of Maupassant that his writings are too often smirched with "the Naturalist preference of fie-fie subjects," or, again, "the brilliant artificialities, nor quite, quite that neither, of George Alfred Laurence." But enough.

What useful end such a book as this can possibly serve we cannot so much as conjecture. To those who are not in the secret of the concoction of volumes like these it may have the effect which Goldsmith tells us his schoolmaster's argument with the parson had on the bystanders:—

"And still they gaz'd and still the wonder grew
That one small head could carry all he knew."

And some readers may conclude that the creation of such an impression is one of the ends at which the book aims. If this indeed be the case, we would exhort Professor Saintsbury, not only for his own credit, but in consideration of higher interests, to mend his ambition. Such paltry vanity is likely to be more expensive to the publishers than to the writers of such books. Professor Saintsbury's ambition might, we would suggest, profitably and legitimately take the form of a little more attention to expression and style. As it is, there will be some danger that a time may come when his writings will serve the same purpose in rhetoric as the Helots in ancient Sparta served in moral instruction.

ANNALS OF AN ETON HOUSE.*

No one who reads this work from the point of view of the educationist rather than the Etonian can help coming to the conclusion that it is probably the best book which has ever been written about Eton, and one of the best books ever written about Public School education. Our great public boarding schools are a mystery unto many. They are difficult to understand by anyone who has not been in the thick of them. No Blue Books, no statistics can give us a correct idea of them. The manner in which they work out in practice is very different from the presentation of the theories on which they are founded. They are full of anomalies. Like the English Constitution, their strength lies not in their laws but in their conventions.

A striking example is given in the work before us. The Evans family was temporarily incapacitated by illness from taking its usual share in the management of the house. It was suggested that one of the younger masters should be called in to keep order. This was rejected, and the government of the establishment was left to the boys themselves. The result was most successful. Everyone was on his honour to behave well, and due subordination was observed. The interregnum passed off without a hitch. This is characteristic of Eton. Some thirty years ago two boys went abroad with a tutor; one of them was certainly only in jackets. In a German town they discovered that the tutor was in the habit of getting drunk. They consulted together what should be done, and at last sent for the tutor, gave him a severe admonition, and told him that if it occurred again they would dismiss him. At Dresden it did occur again, whereupon they dismissed the tutor. One of them entered at a Gymnasium and donned the blue cap of a Saxon public schoolboy. The other engaged a fresh tutor and went on with him. It often occurred to the present writer, when he was a master at Eton, to consider what would happen if all the masters were suddenly to die from some unforeseen calamity. The school would certainly not break up, only a small proportion of the boys would go home. The captain would communicate with the Governing Body that, unfortunately, all their masters were dead, and that the sixth form was carrying on the school as usual, except that absences and Chapels were substituted for lessons. Order reigned at Eton, but it was desirable that a new Head Master be sent to them as soon as possible.

This self-governing side of Eton which is the real reason why it has produced so many men fitted to sustain the burden of Empire is well brought out in this book. This capacity springs, of course, partly from the English character and partly from the English home, but it found in

William Evans and his gifted daughters congenial spirits who thoroughly understood the situation, and who gave the spirit of self-government full scope to operate. But there are other lessons which the book has to teach to a wider circle. The House was emphatically a home, and no one who has not experienced the labour of keeping a boarding house can have any idea of the minute care, the devotion, the affection which is required before such a task can be fulfilled with success. Such qualities Jane Evans possessed in the highest degree, and the author of the book in his sympathetic and reverent portraiture of a character whom he loved and of a system which he admired was, perhaps, not aware of the lesson which he was teaching to all those who undertake the duty of education.

One of the most striking parts of the book is the space given to athletics. It seems as if the one object of the house was to win cups, and the one distinction of a member of the house was the position which he occupied in the house games. Much of this is due to the personality of the writer. He has undoubtedly a keen interest in games, and he gives to them the importance which he feels himself, but it may be questioned whether the athletic worship of our public schools has not proceeded beyond all reasonable limits, whether, indeed, it may not be regarded as a national calamity. The importance of a sound mind in a sound body cannot be overrated, and fifty years ago the physical side may have been too little considered at Eton and other public schools. Certainly in those days the feeding was very bad and the comforts scanty, but in our days the time of a boy is spent not in playing games but in seeing them played. Major Parry tells us that during the time he chronicles the name of the lower boy cups was changed to junior cups, and we are informed that this was done because promising young athletes used purposely to fail in trials in order that they might be eligible to take part in these competitions. Some panegyrists of Eton give their favourite school away. From the perusal of one book, evidently written by a sincere admirer, the average reader would conclude that the two main preoccupations of an Eton boy's life, besides his athletic distinctions, but depending on them, was the possession of a cane, or a number of canes, with which he might beat certain specified serfs who were subject to his jurisdiction, and the ownership of a large variety of parti-coloured garments which could only be worn in special ways, and on special occasions.

It was not in gratitude for influences of this kind that Marquis Wellesley elected to be buried in the College Chapel. It was, as he tells us in his epitaph, because Eton had been to him the stimulus to high endeavour, a nursing mother who taught him to scale the heights of Empire and to succeed in a noble ambition. Wellington never said that Waterloo was won on the playing fields of Eton. His brother did say that India had been governed by the lessons that he had learned in that seminary of heroes. The friendship of Gladstone and Arthur Hallam, their breakfasting together every day alternately in their respective houses, makes sacred the Long Walk through which they frugally conveyed their bread and butter to each other's rooms. They never wore a blazer, or carried a cane, but they are among the glories of the school.

Still Eton remains Eton, and will be itself whether Warre or Lyttelton control its destinies. Bismarck once said that the Germans could not imitate England in certain branches of self-government because England was full of "Royal existences" which were lacking in his own country. It is the function of Eton to foster these Royal existences; they make her what she is, and she suffers them to grow up as their destiny demands. What country but our own can produce a Viceroy of India, a man clothed for a short space with more power than any Sovereign in the world, and yet ready to lay it aside when the time has come and return to the ranks of ordinary life? In any other country he would either become overbearing in office or dangerous in retreat. The book before us shows how these men are formed at school, and also on what principles a boarding house can be successfully governed, and on behalf of all those who are interested in the scientific examination of educational problems we thank Major Gambier Parry for the work which he has so admirably accomplished.

B.

* "Annals of an Eton House." By Major Gambier Parry. Murray 12s. 6d. net.

THE SOUL OF THE ENGLISH PEOPLE.*

"THE Island Pharisees" is a study rather than a story. It reveals Mr. Galsworthy's genius in its strongest and weakest elements. The strength is there unchallengeably, in a magical power of phrasing, a cold and merciless analysis of contemporary life, the summary, in a paragraph or a sentence, of whole kingdoms of the human soul. The weakness is exhibited in a certain deficiency of detachment, which exhibits the author not only judging but condemning; rejoicing in his condemnations; standing aside and taking his readers by the arm and saying: "Thus—and thus." It is the quality of preaching which (it is said) no English novelist can ever quite elude; Mr. Galsworthy wishes to make the audience wince; he wishes to declare to them, "This is you—and you," and to see them protest and tremble and deny. The "revised edition" is dedicated "to Constance Garnett in gratitude for her translation of Turgenev's works"; and Turgenev is undoubtedly the master, here, as in most serious modern fiction. But the air of utterly impersonal and uncritical detachment of "Fathers and Sons," or "Virgin Soil," is lacking in this attack upon the English complacency, which is never free entirely from bitterness, and sometimes breaks out into caricature. Mr. Galsworthy, in some of his later work—notably in many of his sketches for THE NATION—has managed to achieve the more difficult form of an art which explains, without affirming or denying.

The story here is of the slightest. Shelton, a healthy Englishman of ample means and no necessary occupation, has fallen in love with, and become engaged to, Antonia Dennant, a pretty, healthy, sport-loving English girl. During the months of waiting between engagement and marriage he examines various phases of life in London and the provinces. He is excited to questioning and resentment by the ironical smiles and comments of a foreigner, a chance acquaintance in a third-class carriage; who, having rejected everything, swallowed "all the formulas," has gained the whole world. He wanders desolately from the stuffy oppression of the club to the stuffy oppression of an artistic and literary gathering; and thence to the dusty futility of the philanthropic attempt to elevate the lower classes by chess and coffee and bagatelle. He notes the well-fed, bullet-headed, jovial crowds in the streets, the wives and husbands who have settled down to a routine of affection, the wives and husbands who have settled down to a routine of dull hatred and acceptance. The complacency of it all, its satisfaction, its order, its absence of high purpose and adventure, haunts him like a nightmare. He essays the countryside with no better result. He stays a night with a lonely vicar; he beholds a warder guarding the huge convict prison—symbol of the collapse of Christianity in practical affairs. He walks the English roads with an energetic Indian civilian, who is very content to run the machine, without caring to inquire whether the machine is worth running at all. Finally, in the atmosphere of the English country house, serene and dominant and triumphantly content, he realises that he is not of this company. Some disturbing madness has come upon him, which compels him to inquire, where other men are content to enjoy. He troubles Antonia with his suggestions and his queries. She breaks off the marriage. At the end after some protest—for he is really in love with her—he is satisfied to acquiesce.

Upon such a thin thread of narrative as this Mr. Galsworthy is able to hang incidents grave and diverting, introducing the various characters which make up the life of modern England. "Pharisees" is a misnomer. They have got far beyond the stage of the Pharisees. They are the children's children of those rather crude exponents of complacency and pride. These people reveal no ostentatious complacency and pride. Their attitude is rather one of acceptance. It is not that they thank God that they are not as other men are: it is that they can imagine no conceivable readjustment of the universe which could make other men even as themselves; or themselves, different. They are enterprising, but they shun adventure: they are kind, with no real possibility of sympathy. Enormous shut doors separate them from the real world: and they bend the world to their desires. "Doubts don't help you," says Antonia to Shelton; "how can you get any good from doubts? The thing is to win victories." "Victories?" replies Shelton. "I'd rather understand than conquer." But the "Island Race" has preferred to conquer rather than to understand. And wisdom is justified of all her children.

Once or twice, indeed, Mr. Galsworthy is willing to suggest that perhaps the choice is not so mad a one after all. The ironical foreigner who prefers to resist, beg, cringe, and criticise, presents a figure not wholly heroic. He has fallen back on facts: he has sucked the salt and rind of life: he has deliberately contracted himself out of the universe of make-believe which he sees encompassing the people amongst whom his lot is cast. He enjoys his weakness and his laughter: the machine moves on; doing the work of the world. And these people, as he sees them—with their blindness to real issues, their carefully tended gardens, and the gates so severely padlocked which guard the pathways to waste spaces outside, may perhaps after all have but learnt the lesson of mental compromise in a world of frantic possibilities. The garden must be cultivated: cultivated, even if the sun which so pleasantly encourages its flowers to pass into kindly fruit is in reality a furious furnace of incredible fury; and the earth, of which this garden is a tiny segment, running along an illimitable inane towards no intelligible goal. "Spirit ruins you," declares the little foreign barber, condemned always to shave paupers in the cellars of a Rowton lodging-house. "In this world what you want is to have no spirit." The drôle Irish actor dies drunk in squalor, all because he has something in him "which will not accept things as they are, believing always that they should be better." "When he was no longer capable of active revolution, he made it by getting drunk. At the last this was his only way of protesting against society. And occasionally, from the heart of the mechanical routine, there comes evidence that understanding is there—that understanding is possible: that not grossness or obtuseness or selfishness, as in the first hasty verdict, but the deliberate determination not to face the realities, is the real motive power which keeps the system from falling into decay. For if the realities are faced, the bottom falls out of the world; and man, naked, shivering, and alone, is suddenly left confronting defenceless the fire and the darkness." So Shelton finds his uncle, a shrewd, insensitive man of business, criticising the modern uncensored drama. "'What's right for the French and Russians, Dick,' he said, 'is wrong for us. When we begin to be real we only really begin to be false.'" 'Isn't life bad enough already?' he asks. "It suddenly struck Shelton that, for all his smile, his uncle's face had a look of crucifixion. He stood there very straight, his eyes haunting his nephew's face; there seemed to Shelton a touching muddle in his optimism—a muddle of tenderness and of intolerance, of truth and second-handedness. Like the lion above him, he seemed to be defying Life to make him look at her."

It works: that is its justification; this gospel of the Second Best, which substitutes a placid friendliness for love's high ardour, and prettiness for beauty, and a compromise of cruelty and kindness for social justice, and a standard of convention for the compelling demands of a religion. It is assailed in scornfulness and bitterness and passion, by the advocates of these various flaming emotions; by the religious prophets who demand sincerity; by the social prophets who cry for equality and compassion; by the artists who wish to challenge the unveiled Truth; by the Great Lovers who are outraged by this ignoble treatment of the "Lord of Life of terrible aspect." But the thing swings forward, indifferent or but politely tolerant of the clamour; because its peoples know that the secure second-best is a wiser choice (for them), than the hazards of an effort towards a doubtful larger attainment. And Mr. Galsworthy (with a touch of genius) can reveal this acceptance not only in those who have attained but in those who have collapsed in the bleak regions of the Abyss. Resting on a seat in the park, with no other place of refuge, Shelton finds an aged gentleman of seventy-two, an ex-butler, exultant in the fact that although "sellin' papers is not what I been accustomed to," yet "the 'Westminster,' they tell me that's one of the more respectable of the evenin' papers." "'Barrin' my cough and my rupture and this 'ere affliction'—he passed his hand over his face—'I've nothing to complain of; everybody has somethink, it seems.'" His only regret is that with his somewhat exiguous income he has been compelled to associate with "low fellows." "So long as I can keep myself," he said again, "I shan't need no workhouse nor lose respectability."

* "The Island Pharisees." By John Galsworthy. Revised edition. William Heinemann. 6s.

The "Island Pharisees," in its mixture of strength, deliberation of purpose, perfection of detail, transparent sincerity, is a book which stands distinct and clear as a work of conspicuous power.

A BUDGET OF FRENCH CRITICISM.

ALTHOUGH Sénancour is far inferior to Chateaubriand as an artist, and has little of the magic of style that delights us in "René" or in the best pages of the "Génie du Christianisme," he is in some ways a better representative of the mal du siècle, the literary pessimism of the beginning of the nineteenth century. For one thing, he was more sincere. His melancholy and disillusion represent exactly what he felt, and as we read him we are never led to believe that his sadness is in any degree assumed or treated as material from which excellent literary effects are to be produced. In his search for a faith, too, he was far more in earnest. He never rested, as Chateaubriand was content to do, in the half acceptance of a belief which satisfied the emotions, but left the intellect untouched. M. Joachim Merlant's study, "Sénancour: Sa vie, son œuvre, son influence" (Fischbacher, 7 fr. 50) is chiefly concerned with Sénancour as a religious thinker, and too much stress is laid upon the "Libres Méditations" as supporting M. Merlant's contention that their author was "fundamentally in belief as in method, a liberal Protestant." Sénancour was decidedly anti-Catholic. He had, as M. Merlant says, "a concentrated antipathy for ultra-pious people, for Chateaubriand, who believed with a flood of tears, and for Werther, who believed because he saw some lighted tapers, and a horror of every compromise between the imagination and the intellect." But his own position was nearer to pantheism than to even the most liberal type of Protestantism. The book by which he lives is "Obermann," in its own way as remarkable a self-portrait as Rousseau's "Confessions." It has never been widely read, but, as M. Merlant shows, through the impression it made on Sainte-Beuve and George Sand, it has had a marked influence upon French literature. In this country its name at least is familiar as having inspired Matthew Arnold's fine stanzas

* * *

M. CH.-M. DES GRANGES has done an excellent piece of work in "Le Romantisme et La Critique: La Presse Littéraire sous la Restauration, 1815-1830" (Société du Mercure de France, 7 fr. 50). With the object of showing "how literary works are prepared, how they are born, how they die, and why some among them discover day by day a new faculty of adaptation to a new environment," he has gone through the journals contemporary with the beginning of the romantic movement, first giving a brief account of the policy of each paper, and then a selection of the most significant critical notices printed at the time. By this means he enables us to enter in some degree into the spirit of the period, for although the work of the greatest critics may be familiar, what they wrote is "less representative of public opinion, at a certain date, than what has been said by critics of the second rank, who think and speak like the mass of their contemporaries." A glance through these judgments of a past age, when classic and romantic belaboured each other so lustily, is full of interest; but it should also make the critics of our own day feel less confident of the permanence of their verdicts. Indeed, M. Des Granges holds that no critical judgment can be final. The true method, he says, is "resolutely to abandon the sophism which consists in setting ourselves up as judges of the judgments of others, and in believing that we of to-day are in possession of a sort of absolute truth concerning the works of the men of a past age. Our actual judgments are quite as subjective as those of the author's contemporaries. We, in our turn, represent only a moment in a series which will continue after us. We should for that reason refrain from seeking in previous verdicts the justification of our own ideas or the elements of a childish polemic. We must take these judgments as uttered at a certain period and set a value on them as uttered at that period. However strange they may appear to us, we must accustom ourselves to record them in their integrity instead of retaining only detached formulas taken from them which, precisely because they agree with our present view, are likely to have lost their true meaning." M. Des Granges has hit upon a good idea, and his book should prove of great use as a study in comparative criticism.

* * *

Taine, said Lord Acton in one of his letters to Mary Gladstone, fancied that to show the horrors of the Revolution was a good argument against democracy. The "Origines de la France Contemporaine" has certainly stirred up a great amount of controversy, but up to the present it was generally assumed that at least the facts upon which that work is based could be trusted. M. A. Aulard, who is perhaps the greatest living authority on the history of the Revolution, has just published a course of lectures delivered in the Sorbonne during the year 1905-1906, "Taine Historien de la Revolution française" (Colin, 3 fr. 50), in which he goes through the whole work chapter by chapter, verifying the references and testing the authorities on which Taine relied. The result is not unlike some of the famous attacks made on Froude by Freeman. "One can say," he says, "after a careful and unprejudiced verification, that in this book an exact reference, an exact transcription of a text, an exact statement, is the exception. Inaccuracies, grave, insignificant, innocent, or prejudiced, are everywhere, or almost everywhere." In his criticism of Taine's account of Robespierre and of the Committee of Public Safety, M. Aulard is particularly deadly, but all through the book he convicts his author of the grossest inaccuracies. "He has mutilated the facts with an even more systematic audacity than he has mutilated the documents." In addition to these positive faults, Taine is also charged with a great many negative ones. "His omissions are perhaps even more grave than his errors. Almost all the most authentic and the richest sources of the history of the public feeling, which is Taine's real subject, have escaped him. His documentary basis, in spite of a wealth of references, is incomplete and inadequate, although he imagined and said that he had read and seen all there was to read and see. If we pass from documentary evidence properly so called, and from the immediate use that Taine makes of his sources, if we pass on from these to general results, to historical judgments, to the conclusions of all sorts that he draws from them, we perceive that even had he avoided all possible mistakes in scholarship, he would none the less have given us a false, and I may say, an unhistorical idea of the French Revolution." Yet in spite of these criticisms, M. Aulard believes Taine to be thoroughly honest in his views. Taine could never believe that there were two sides to a question, and when an inconvenient fact presented itself he either ignored it, or minimised its importance. He was, besides, ambitious of literary fame. "He loved literary fame; he seems to have loved it more than anything else. His chief aim—although perhaps he himself did not realise it—was to astonish the reader, to compel the reader's admiration. Although he announces that he is going to write a history in a sort of scientific form, it is a literary form that he employs, using as his materials whatever comes in his way. His animation, sometimes ingenious and always ardent, inspires him with brilliant and admirable passages. There are antitheses, surprises, highly coloured descriptions. Indeed, there is quite a pyrotechnic display. Historical truth is, at every moment, sacrificed to the necessities of art."

* * *

THE articles collected in M. Maurice Souriau's volume, "Moralistes et Poètes" (Vuibert et Nony, 3 fr. 50), are, he tells us, "conceived in a purely scientific spirit," and in an interesting preface he urges that all literary criticism which is not scientific is worthless. The critic who puts anything of his own personality into his work, who does not rid himself completely of the prejudices of his personality and of his environment, is no true critic. "A study on Pascal, on Bossuet, or on Voltaire will not be a scientific one unless at the end of the book the reader is incapable of deciding whether the critic is Jansenist or Molinist, Catholic or Protestant, believer or sceptic." If this be admitted it must be confessed that there never has been a true critic, but luckily

CASSELL & COMPANY'S NEW NOVELS

NOW READY.

6/- Vayenne

By PERCY J. BREBNER
(Christian Lys)

6/- The Pauper of Park Lane

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX

3/6 Concerning Belinda

By ELEANOR HOYT BRAINERD

IN PREPARATION.

6/- The Wheels of Anarchy

By MAX PEMBERTON

6/- The Lost Millionaire

By LILLIAS CAMPBELL DAVIDSON

6/- A Millionaire Girl

By A. W. MARCHMONT

An Illustrated List of Spring Books
and Periodicals will be sent post free on application

CASSELL & CO., LTD., La Belle Sauvage, LONDON

OUR LAND

EDITED BY

George Radford, M.A.

The MARCH NUMBER will be ready on MONDAY, 24th, at all Bookstalls and Newsagents, price 3d. net.

CONTENTS:

The Unit and Unity.

Agricultural Co-operation:
Transport.

The Management of Farms
—Dairy Farming. By
W. M. Rod, M.A.

Rural Housing and Sanitation. II. By a Civil Engineer.

Enclosures.

The Renard Train.

Education in Lonewood
Corner.

The Olden Days.

Farm Bookkeeping.

NOTES—

Water Schemes and Afforestation.

The Horse.

The Transition in Agriculture.

CASSELL & CO., Ltd., La Belle Sauvage, E.C.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."

SHORT STORIES,

BOOK REVIEWS,

LITERARY ARTICLES,

PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,

SURVEY OF THE WEEK,

BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTO-GRAPHY.

NATURE AND SCIENCE,

Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

Now Ready. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

OUTLINES OF CHURCH HISTORY.

By H. VON SCHUBERT, D.D.

With an Additional Chapter on Religious Thought and Life in England, during the 19th Century, by Miss Alice Gardner, Cambridge.

"Professor Schubert has performed this task with a masterly hand. It is no exaggeration to say that this compendium of church history is immeasurably ahead of any other in the English language."
—The Nation.

"We believe that very few of the volumes of the Theological Translation Library have had the welcome which this volume is likely to receive. It meets one of our most immediate and imperative needs."—Expository Times.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

The FEBRUARY "BOOK MONTHLY," 6d. net.

CONTENTS.

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. A Town and Country Journal of Book Affairs: the same Embellished with many Pictures.

CONTRABAND! Books Seized in His Majesty's Customs.

TREASURE FINDERS! Forged and Faked MSS., and How to Detect
Them—By Tighe Hopkins.

SUPPRESSED! Some Book Pictures that we Know no More.

A LONDON LETTER. New Lamps for Old at the "Times" Book Club—By the Editor.

ANNALS OF PRINT. Four Centuries of the Cambridge University Press.

A BY-WAYS SERIES. The Bookseller and the Publisher as Topo-grapher—By R. Cochrane.

LIGHT AND LEADING. New Fact and Current Opinion Gathered from the Book World.

THE GENERAL READER. Snap-Shot Reviews of the Best and Best-Selling Books.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes
Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Classical Catalogue of the Noteworthy
Books, New Editions, and Reprints of January.

Publishers, Simpkin, Marshall and Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who, on application, will send a Specimen Copy free.

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.

PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation,
the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers
of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

M. Souriau is better than he promises. After this formidable opening he gives us some very readable and quite humanly prejudiced essays on "The Jansenism of Pascal's 'Pensées,'" "Lamartine's Versification," "Casimir Delavigne's Novels," "Alfred de Vigny and Romanticism," and "M. René Bazin and the Social Novel." M. Souriau points out the large part played by Catholicism in M. Bazin's fiction, but he combats the view which labels that author a mere entertainer for fashionable drawing-rooms, and holds that both "Donatienne" and "Le Guide de l'Empereur" have great artistic beauty. Indeed, no better refutation of M. Souriau's theory need be sought than this essay, which is a warm and unscientific appreciation of M. Bazin's art.

* * *

A NUMBER of letters written by Maurice de Guérin to Barbey-d'Aurévilly, which appeared some years ago in "La Quinzaine," have just been issued in a tiny volume by Messrs. Sanset et Cie, with the title "Lettres à J. Barbey-d'Aurévilly" (lfr.). They add little to our knowledge of Maurice de Guérin's uneventful life, but, as might be expected, they are beautifully written examples of that felicity in finding expressions to describe nature—particularly inanimate nature—which marks all that he wrote, and won the admiration of such judges as Sainte-Beuve and Matthew Arnold. The little volume will be prized by all who care for beautiful French prose.

The Week in the City.

THE past week has been quite uneventful. The strong position of the Bank and the increasing probability of easy money have helped to keep Consols firm, in spite of rather poor revenue returns and bad Budget prospects. Home Railways have been dull, in view of declining trade and the shipbuilding crisis in the North. The severity of the economic crisis in America is shown by the armies of unemployed, and gloom rules in the American Railway market, where people look forward to another era of receiverships for many of the weaker lines.

CHEAPER FOOD AND CHICAGO.

By far the best sign of the times, from the standpoint of industry and commerce, is the fall in the price of wheat, which, in the opinion of good judges, is likely to be permanent and progressive. So long as the working classes have dear food they have less to spend on secondary necessities. Hence a lower demand for clothes, boots, &c. The situation has been saved by the grand Argentine crop—an awkward situation for the Preferential school of Imperialists who want the country to rely upon supplies from Canada, India, and Australia. I read in the American papers that the collapse of the recent efforts to create a bull market in wheat at Chicago is held to prove that wheat is "a world proposition," and that therefore operators there, no matter how keen in judgment or how strong financially, cannot safely work against forces that govern the markets of the outside world. The inference is that the wheat stock is too large to be controlled by North America, and that prices cannot be forced up this year.

"The actual amount of wheat unloaded by the bulls was 15,000,000 bushels, of which Mr. James A. Patten held 7,000,000 bushels, which were sold in two lots—5,000,000 early in January from $1.07 down to $1.05, and the remaining 2,000,000 at $1.04 down to $1.02. The Bartlett-Frazier and George W. Patten line was believed to aggregate 7,500,000 bushels, about equally divided; it was sold from $1.02 down to 96 cents. The loss was an average of 4 to 5 cents a bushel." The "New York Evening Post" adds that "none of these operators has ever been in the wheat trade prominently until last year, when they 'made killings' on the green-bug scare in May. But their latest efforts resulted in a good percentage of the profits of last spring being put back into the market."

RUSSIAN CREDIT.

Investors in Russian bonds must be feeling very nervous about Russian credit. If the Government could be induced to reduce their annual bill for armaments for a few years the country could be rehabilitated and the finances put on to a 4 per cent. basis. But one fears there is too much incompetence and corruption in St. Petersburg to allow of that.

According to a telegram from St. Petersburg, the Government actually favours an expenditure of 200 millions sterling in the next ten years on the building of a new navy. It is to be hoped that the French banks will have the sense to refuse to allow anything of the sort. If they permit it Russian affairs will go from bad to worse, till they end in bankruptcy and ruin.

THE SOUTHERN PACIFIC RAILROAD.

The annual report of the Southern Pacific Railroad for the fiscal year ended June 30th is a belated document, and, though by far the most favourable statement ever published by the company, it had no effect on the market. Last year the price of the stock varied between 99 and 65. It is now round about 70, at which price it yields about $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., if the last year's dividends can be kept up. But can they in view of the great reaction in trade in the United States? When Harriman acquired control of the line, early in 1901, the gross earnings were 70 million dollars. Under his rule practically all surplus earnings over and above fixed charges were invested in the improvement of the line for five years. At the end of 1906 dividends of 5 per cent. began to be distributed, and this was raised to 6 per cent. last year, when the gross earnings rose to \$130,000,000, the surplus, after the 6 per cent. dividend was paid, being 14½ million dollars, comparing with a surplus of 6½ million dollars in 1900.

THE CHARTERED COMPANY'S REPORT.

The report of the Chartered Company suggests some queer reflections upon the success with which the late Mr. Rhodes and his friends (the Cosmopolitan Empire Builders) imposed upon British investors. There is no doubt that Imperial sentiment helped enormous numbers of foolish people to believe what Mr. Rhodes wished them to believe—that Chartered shares, instead of standing at 7 or 8, would gradually rise to heights beyond the dreams of human avarice. Yet, in point of fact, the Chartered Company, with its shares selling for 14 or 15 shillings, is nearer to paying (though probably still far enough away) than ever it was before. The report, belated, as usual, for the year ending March 31st, 1907, shows that the production of gold, silver, and coal still rises steadily. The directors state that there is hope for cotton and tobacco, and that "the agricultural outlook in Southern Rhodesia has never been brighter." On the other hand, the best that can be said for the guaranteed railways is that "during the current financial year it is estimated that the deficit will have reached its maximum, and that the total obligation of the Company during the year will be about £300,000."

Not long ago the directors of the Company paid a visit to the land of the Colossus and made inquiries into the following questions:—

- (a) The promotion of immigration, colonisation, and settlement.
- (b) The attractiveness of the terms offered by the company for the acquisition and working of land and mineral holdings.
- (c) The facilities given to newcomers for the inspection and selection of properties.
- (d) The provision of expert advice and assistance for farmers, miners and others.
- (e) The continuation and extension of the policy of making advances to farmers and miners.
- (f) The organisation of production and distribution of agricultural and other products.
- (g) The facilities for transport, particularly in regard to through rates to the coast for all Rhodesian products.
- (h) The introduction of Rhodesian products to over-sea markets.
- (i) The advertisement of Rhodesia and its opportunities.

They arrived, they say, at the conclusion that the time has come for "a vigorous policy of development upon broad lines," and accordingly recommended that "the Company shall concur in all the above directions." This is rather a large order, especially when there is no Mr. Rhodes to bait the hook. However, the Board asks for the immediate subscription of a modest million. They propose that the million new shares be offered to the shareholders immediately for subscription at par pro rata to their present holdings, and that the subscribers of these shares be given options to take up two million additional shares at par, on the basis of an option of one additional share up to March 31st, 1901, and over a second share up to March 31st, 1912, in respect of each share now subscribed. The plea is regarded as ingenious, but the shareholders may decline to throw good money after bad.

LUCCELLUM.

"Beautifully Cool and Sweet Smoking."

TOBACCO AND CIGARETTES

Sold only in the original packets and tins, and may be obtained from all Stores and Tobacco sellers of repute.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST

on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.
All General Banking Business transacted
ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

TYPEWRITING.

TYPEWRITING. — Typewriting of every description, high-class work. Author's MSS. 10d. per thousand words, prompt, accurate. E. C. PEARCE, 30, College Road, Reading.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey
to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper,
PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although
I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged,
and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly.
From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious, political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s.
per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,
30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.
Specimens free on application.
PERCY L. PARKER.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY
BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;
And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

BOVRIL REPELS INFLUENZA

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

KINGSLEY HOTEL, Near the British Museum.
Hart Street, Bloomsbury Square, London.
THACKERAY HOTEL, Opposite the British Museum.
Great Russell Street, London.

These well-appointed and commodious Temperance Hotels will, it is believed, meet the requirements, at moderate charges, of those who desire all the conveniences and advantages of the larger modern Licensed Hotels. These Hotels have Passenger Lifts, Electric Light throughout, Bathrooms on every floor, spacious Dining, Drawing, Writing, Reading, Billiard, and Smoking Rooms, heated throughout. Fireproof Floors. Perfect Sanitation. Telephones. Night Porters.
BEDROOMS (including attendance) from 3/6 to 6/0.
Inclusive charge for Bedroom, Attendance, Table d'Hôte, Breakfast and Dinner, From 8/6 to 10/6 per day.
Full Tariff and Testimonials on application.
Telegraphic Addresses: Thackeray Hotel, "Thackeray, London."
Kingsley Hotel, "Bookcraft, London."

FOREIGN HOTELS.

WIESBADEN.

HOTEL NASSAU. With fine Bathing Establishment. Situated at the Curplage. "The English Home."

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

THE BELVEDERE. High-class English Family Hotel, in the finest and sunniest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

BOOKSELLERS.

Our Offer THE S.S. WORKER'S BIBLE

6/-

for 3/6

Postage 4d.

Abroad 8d.

Containing a selection of the best Aids to Bible Study, most suitable for a Young Teacher or Elder Scholar. Good, clear type, portable size. Size, 5 1/2 by 4 1/4 by 1 1/2 inches, with references, concordance, atlas, illustrations of antiquities, etc. Handsomely bound in limp Morocco, overlapping edges, round corners, red under gold edges, elastic band, each Bible in box. This Bible can be had with new thumb index on edge, at 1s. extra.
THE LONDON BIBLE WAREHOUSE,
53, Paternoster Row, E.C.

BOOKS. Ancient and Modern, Bought, Sold and Exchanged.

THOMAS THORP, 100, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.
[And at READING.]

MONTHLY CATALOGUES FREE.

Mr. Thorp has incorporated the business in Review Books carried on for many years by Mrs. Hindley at Booksellers' Row, and at the above address.

UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY.

EXPLANATORY PAMPHLETS, AND CATALOGUE OF BOOKS ILLUSTRATIVE OF LIBERAL RELIGION, SENT POST FREE,

UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION,
ESSEX HALL, ESSEX STREET, STRAND, W.C.

ARUNDEL CHROMOS.

LARGE number in Stock. Many rare ones. Send stamp for this month's list (giving size and shape of each).—Saint Jude's Dépôt, Birmingham.

BOOK BARGAINS.—Harmsworth's Encyclopædia, last edition 10 vols., 21/-, cost £2 16s. net. Who's Who, 1907, 4/6, cost 11/- net. Burton's Arabian Nights, full edition, illustrated, 17 vols., £13 13s. Lear's Book of Nonsense, 2/6, pub. 6/. Balzac's Famous Novels in English, 40 vols., £3 3s. Oscar Wilde's Dorian Gray, 10/6. Pepys's Diary, 4 vols., 15/-, pub. £1 10s. G. P. R. James's Historical Novels, 25 vols., £2 2s. Encyclopædia Britannica, last edition, 35 vols., £12 12s. Business Cyclopædia and Legal Adviser, 6 vols., £1 4s., cost £2 8s. Catalogues free. Books bought. Special list of 3,000 books wanted post free. Libraries purchased for cash.—HOLLAND BROS., Book Merchants, 21, John Bright St., Birmingham.
[Books out of print supplied. Please state wants.]

J. POOLE & CO., 104, Charing Cross Road, LONDON.

School, Classical, Mathematical, Scientific, and Students'

BOOKSELLERS.

NEW AND SECOND-HAND.

All enquiries as to Prices of Books in our VERY LARGE STOCK answered.

HOTELS AND HYDROS, &c.

LONDON.

WILD'S TEMPERANCE HOTELS. J. B. Wild, C.C., Man. Direc.
30-40, Ludgate Hill, E.C.; 70 & 71, Euston Square, W.C.

AT BOURNEMOUTH HYDRO.

IDEAL RESIDENCE.
Sun Lounge. Every form of Bath.

BOURNEMOUTH.

THE QUEEN, Bath Road. Miss Tye.
Central. Board and Residence, 35/6 to 3 guineas weekly.

NEWLYN'S (Royal Exeter) HOTEL. Close Pier; 1st Class; Moderate.

SILVER HOW. Boarding Est. West Cliff Gdns. From 30s. week.

BRIDPORT (Near West Bay), DORSET.

BOARD RESIDENCE. Every Comfort. 10, West St., Bridport.

BRIGHTON.

THE HOTEL METROPOLE. E. Richard, Manager.

ROYAL YORK HOTEL. H. J. Preston.

BUXTON.

ST. ANN'S HOTEL. First Hotel.

DARTMOOR—YELVERTON.

THE TORS HOTEL. Tel.: 0199. Mrs. F. Sara.

BARON'S TEMPERANCE HOTEL. Magnificent Moor Views.

DEAL

BEACH HOUSE HOTEL. S. R. Jefferson.

EASTBOURNE.

CLARENCE Private Hotel & Boarding House, Sussex Grdns. 5/- day.

HADDON HALL, Devonshire Place, overlooking Sea. 5/- day.

EXETER.

DELLERS CAFE. Cathedral Close, and at Paignton.

GREAT YELDHAM—ESSEX.

THE WHITE HART HOTEL. Proprietor, W. Pearl.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.

RED LION HOTEL. Overlooking famous Regatta course.

ILFRACOMBE.

COLLINGWOOD PRIVATE HOTEL. 120 Rooms. Facing Sea.

LEEDS.

HOTEL METROPOLE, 2 minutes' walk from either station.

LIVERPOOL.

COMPTON HOTEL, Church Street. Wm. Russell.
Telegrams: "Compton." Telephone: 3032 Royal, 3 wires.

LLANELLY.

CLEVELAND HOTEL. J. T. Weaver.

MALDON.

TEMPERANCE HOTEL, Market Hill. C. Simons, Manager.

MALVERN.

HARDWICKE PRIVATE HOTEL. Prop. & M'g'r.—J. Wilson.

MANCHESTER.

THE PRINCES CAFE. Oxford Street.

THE DEANS GATE HOTEL. Deansgate.

MATLOCK.

SMEDLEY'S Hydropathic Establishment. Estab. 1853. H. Challand, Mnger.

ROCKSIDE HYDRO. Tennis, Bowls, &c. Nr. Golf Links. (18 holes).

OXFORD (near).

SUNNINGWELL HALL, Boars Hill. Dry, Sunny, Golf, etc. Lecture.

PENTRE.

PENTRE HOTEL, Rhondda. Tel. No. P.O. 30. W. H. Miles.

PLYMOUTH.

GOODBODY'S CAFES. And at Torquay.

SWISS CAFE, Union Street. Moderate. Genoni Bros.

PORTSMOUTH.

SPEEDWELL HOTEL. A. Grigsby, Managing Director.

SOUTHSEA.

STRATHEARN MANSIONS, South Parade. Miss Collis, Manageress.

ST. MORITZ, ENGADINE.

BELVEDERE, high-class English Family Hotel. Situated in sunniest and finest position. Inclusive terms 11 to 20 francs.

SWANAGE.

"CRAIGSIDE," Board Residence. Tel.: 6. Misses Fell.

TEIGNMOUTH.

REGENT RESTAURANT & Criterion Hall for Catering. W. H. Bonner.

WHITBY.

WEST CLIFF PRIVATE HOTEL. Mrs. T. Newbitt.

WOODFORD GREEN, ESSEX.

WILFRED LAWSON. Temp. Hotel, J. J. Blundell Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

BOOTHAM SCHOOL, YORK.

(Under the Management of the Society of Friends.)

Twenty-six boys passed University Entrance Examinations in 1906 and 1907.

A new feature for post-Matriculation students is a CITIZENSHIP COURSE, including Economics and Modern History with special reference to existing political institutions and social problems.

The School continues to hold a strong position in Leisure-Hour work:—Natural History, Archaeology, Carpentry, etc.

For copies of prospectus and full particulars with regard to scholarships, apply to the Head Master, Bootham School, York.

Head Master: *Arthur Rowntree, Certificate of Distinction in the Theory, History, and Practice of Education, Cantab.THE HINDHEAD SCHOOL FOR GIRLS.

Principal: Miss J. F. GRUNER, Certificated Student of Girton College, late Second Mistress, Dulwich High School, G.P.D.S.Co. Education thoroughly modern; physical training and outdoor games. Great attention is paid to healthful conditions of life. The boarding-house stands at an elevation of 800 ft.—For prospectus address to BRACKENHURST, HINDHEAD, HASLEMERE, R.S.O.

THE LEYS SCHOOL, CAMBRIDGE.

ENTRANCE SCHOLARSHIPS IN MARCH.

Preparatory School at Hitchin recognised by the Governors. Enquiries should be addressed to the BURSAR.

INFORMATION AND ADVICE AS TO SCHOOLS.

THE SCHOLASTIC, CLERICAL, AND MEDICAL ASSOCIATION, LTD. (a body of Oxford and Cambridge graduates), gives advice and assistance without charge to Parents and Guardians in the selection of schools (for GIRLS AND BOYS) at home or abroad, and as to Tutors (ARMY, NAVY, UNIVERSITY, &c.). A statement of the requirements should be sent to the Manager,

R. J. BEEVOR, M.A., 22, Craven Street, Trafalgar Square, W.C.
Telegrams: "TRIFORM. LONDON." Telephone No. 1854 GERRARD.SEASIDE SCHOOLS FOR GIRLS.*BROADWATER HALL, WORTHING.

Good English Education. Eight Acres of Grounds.

LE PLEIN AIR, DIEPPE.Languages, Accomplishments, Needlework, Cookery.
Principals—THE MISSES TRITTON.AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE, TAMWORTH.

YOUTHS TRAINED FOR HOME OR COLONIES.

Farm, 1,000 acres. Carpentry, Smith's work. Riding and Shooting taught. Prospectus.

CO-EDUCATION.

ST. LEONARD'S SCHOOL, BALDOCK, HERTFORDSHIRE, has been opened for BOYS and GIRLS.

PRINCIPAL—MRS. ENNIS RICHMOND.

(Author of "Boyhood," "Through Boyhood to Manhood," etc.)

HEAD MASTER—MR. KENNETH RICHMOND.

"A Natural Education" and "For Our Daughters," Lectures given by Mrs. Richmond on the Co-Education of Boys and Girls may be had from Messrs. G. Street & Co., Ltd., 42, Albemarle-street, London, W. Price 3d. each; single copy 4d., post free.

WILLASTON SCHOOL, NANTWICH.The next Entrance Examination will be held at the SCHOOL ON MARCH 31st.

For particulars of admission on the Foundation, apply to the Head Master.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Curio Club
Bargains

Private persons desirous of disposing of antiques at bargain prices will find a ready sale for same at the "London Opinion Curio Club" 107, Regent Street, London, W.

THE INDEX TO
VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

EDUCATIONAL.

SCHOOL OF SOCIOLOGY AND SOCIAL ECONOMICS,

63, 64, Denison House, 296, Vauxhall Bridge Road, S.W.

SIX LECTURES on SOME SOCIOLOGICAL PROBLEMS IN THE UNITED STATES will be given by MR. J. GRAHAM BROOKS, President, American Social Science Association, at 4.30 p.m. on consecutive Tuesdays, beginning March 3rd. Course ticket, 5s. Single admission, 1s. Further particulars may be had from the Hon. Secretary.

ONE & ALL SEEDSTHE BRAND GUARANTEES ONE & ALL QUALITY.*ONE & ALL SEEDS are reliable, pure, and guaranteed.

Each packet is dated with the year of issue.

ONE & ALL FERTILISERS are complete Manures.

All are supplied in small quantities at reasonable prices.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Choice Varieties of Sweet Peas, with an Original Pamphlet on their Culture, by Richard Dean, V.M.H.—viz.,

Dorothy Eckford, white; Hon. Mrs. Kenyon, yellow; Prima Donna, soft pink; King Edward VII., crimson; Miss Wilmott, rich deep orange pink; Mrs. Walter Wright, mauve; Prince of Wales, fine rose; Duchess of Westminster, violet purple; Othello, deep maroon; Lady Grisel Hamilton, pale lavender; Duke of Westminster, purple; Navy Blue.

One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Annuals.One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Hardy Perennials and Biennials.*One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables for Saladings.*One & All Shilling Collection of 12 Vegetables.*One & All Collection of Choicest Asters in 10 Varieties—2s. 6d. Giant Comet, white; Giant Comet, The Bride, white; Giant Comet, rose; Giant Comet, azure blue; Giant Comet, dark violet; Mixed Dwarf Chrysanthemum; Finest Mixed Bouquet; Mixed Victoria; Mixed Paeony; Perfection; and Betteridge's Quilled in mixed colours.One & All Fertiliser No. 24 for general garden purposes. Half-rod packets 6d. bags, 7 lbs., 2/3; 14 lbs., 3/6; 28 lbs., 5/9; 56 lbs., 10/6; 112 lbs., 20/- Carriage Paid.ONE & ALL is the registered Trade Mark of the AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL ASSOCIATION, LIMITED. Name and address of nearest Local Agent, Illustrated Catalogues, and other details, sent free by post on application to EDWARD OWEN GREENING, Managing Director, Wholesale Seed Warehouses, 92, Long Acre, W.C.ONE & ALL FERTILISERS

NOTICE.

THE NATION is published weekly. Applications for copies and Subscriptions should be sent to THE NATION Office, 14, Henrietta-street, Covent Garden.

Terms of Subscription, Including Postage:

HOME, 26s. PER ANNUM. FOREIGN, 30s. PER ANNUM.

Cheques should be made payable to THE MANAGER, THE NATION, and crossed "National Provincial Bank."

Telephone No. Gerrard 4035.

Telegrams: "Nationetta," London.

THE NATION may be obtained from the following book-sellers abroad:—

Paris—Galignani's Library, Rue de Rivoli.

Paris—W. H. Smith & Son's Bookshop, 248, Rue de Rivoli.

Nice—Galignani's Library.

Stockholm—Norden and Jephson.

Vienna—Mr. William Frick, Graben 27.

Christiania—The Cammermeyer Boghandel, Carl Johans Gade, 41 and 43.

Melbourne, Sydney, Brisbane, Perth, West Australia—Gordon and Gotch.

Capetown—Messrs. Gordon and Gotch; Messrs. J. C. Juta and Co.

Where single Copies can be obtained, and Subscriptions are received.

Ask for Greening's Books

And See That

You Get Them.

Great Success by BARONESS ORCZY,

1st Edition—15,000 Copies Sold,

BEAU BROCADE.

As Good as "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

Author of "The Scarlet Pimpernel."

2nd Edition nearly Exhausted,

Third Edition in Press.

BEAU BROCADE.

A Romance of the Road.

On Sale Everywhere. Price Six Shillings.

VINCENZO'S VENDETTA.

By JOSEPH PRAGUE.

(Author of "The Abductors.") 6s.

Mr. Prague has quite a novel and individual style. His book is extremely well written, and deals with a most interesting phase of life.

THE LOVE SEEKERS.

By MARY WALPOLE. 6s.

This is a first book by a writer of considerable distinction. Miss Walpole is said to be a descendant of Horace Walpole. She writes with great animation, and it is safe to prophesy that her name will become widely known as a writer of fiction.

LEROUX.

By THE HON. MRS. WALTER FORBES. 6s.

Mrs. Forbes is the author of several well-known novels, but it is safe to say that none of them for vital human interest is as good as "Leroux." All fiction readers will enjoy this book.

Who Stole the Crown Jewels? Read

THE GANG.

Written and Illustrated by DAVID WHITELAW. 3s. 6d.

"Breaks new ground in fiction."—The Standard.
"Mr. Whitelaw writes in a very fluent, natural style, and with a strong sense of humour."—Western Press.

20,000 COPIES SOLD IN AMERICA.

THE GOLDEN HORSESHOE.

By ROBERT AITKEN. Cloth, with cover design in colours by Scott Calder. 6s.

This is a book of remarkable grip and vigour. It holds the reader in a spell by its sheer vital human interest. It is one of the strongest novels of the day. The leading character stands out as boldly as any figure in modern fiction. A love story runs through the book, and those who like well-spiced, stirring, and surprising incident will appreciate this remarkable story. It is "sensational" in the best sense of the word, and travels at a rapid pace. Mr. Robert Aitken is an English writer who has made a great reputation both here and in America with his novels "Windfalls" and "The Ridding Shaik." His work is as strong, as vivid, and as enthralling as Rudyard Kipling's, with which it has been compared by The Athenæum. "The Golden Horseshoe" is undoubtedly the best work Mr. Aitken has yet produced, and should be read by everyone who likes a strong, healthy, clean, vigorous novel without sex problem or any kind of nastiness. Mr. Robert Aitken is an author whose work appeals to MEN no less than to women.

THE GOLDEN HORSESHOE. The Story of a Lucky Strike.

By ROBERT AITKEN. 6s.

A CHARMING IRISH ROMANCE.

Let Erin Remember.

By MAY WYNNE

(Author of "A Maid of Brittany," "Where Terror Ruled," &c., &c.)

LET ERIN REMEMBER. 6s.

BY A NEW AUTHOR OF GREAT PROMISE.

The Harvest of Deceit.

By CLIVE PEMBERTON.

THE HARVEST OF DECEIT. 6s.

By "THE JEWISH KIPLING."

THE NEW GALATEA.

By SAMUEL GORDON. 6s.

Mr. Samuel Gordon is to be classed among the small but noteworthy band of novelists, including Maarten Maartens and Joseph Conrad, to whom English is an acquired language. In fact Mr. Gordon did not speak or write a word of English till well in his teens. But that did not prevent him from earning, for his Jewish stories, the title of "the Jewish Kipling." For "The New Galatea" he has chosen a thoroughly English group of characters, and handles a theme which in its boldness is reminiscent of the most advanced Continental writers with a delicacy which cannot offend even the most Puritanical taste.

The Place Taker.

By PETER EARLSTON. 6s.

A Knight Errant in Turkey.

By ARTHUR OAKSTONE. 6s.

Ready Shortly. New Novel by Lucas Gleeve.

The Cardinal and Lady Susan. 6s.

The George Meredith Birthday Celebration.

All admirers of the great Novelist should read the Monograph . .

GEORGE MEREDITH

An Essay towards appreciation by WALTER JERROLD.

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 3s. 6d., with a Portrait of George Meredith.

In the English Writers of To-day Series.

Send a P.C. for Greening's New Catalogue of Fiction and General Literature. It will be sent to you post free.

GREENING & CO., LTD., 91, ST. MARTIN'S LANE, W.C.

The Nation

VOL. II., No. 22.]

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1908.

[PRICE 6D.
Postage: U.K., 4d. Abroad, 1d.

CONTENTS.

PAGE	PAGE
THE DIARY OF THE WEEK ... 777	LETTERS TO THE EDITOR:—
POLITICS AND AFFAIRS:—	Ecclesiastical Questions in
The Second Educational	Parliament. By the Dean
Compromise ... 780	of Ripon ... 794
The Liberal Party and the	Methods of Propaganda. By
Estimates ... 781	Lieut.-Colonel D. C. Pedder 794
Hope for Macedonia ... 782	Liberal Defeats. By A York-
The Licensing Bill and its	shire Liberal ... 794
Purpose ... 783	The Liberal Party and Votes
LIFE AND LETTERS:—	for Women. By Woman
The Poetry of the Bible ... 785	Liberal ... 794
A Dictator of Portugal ... 786	The Crux in "The Tempest."
The Insect Raider ... 787	By N. W. Hill ... 795
PRESENT-DAY PROBLEMS:—	"England and Mr. Mere-
Mr. Morley and Indian Re-	dith." By G. M. Trevelyan 796 form. By Sir W. Wedder-	The Education Bill. By burn ... 788	W. G. H. G. ... 796
SCIENCE:—	The Blasphemy Laws. By
The New Botany ... 790	J. H. and C. S. ... 796
THE DRAMA:—	"The Beautiful Duchess" and
The Primitives. By M. ... 791	"The Douglas Cause." By
POETRY:—	Horace Bleackley ... 796
Looking Eastwards. By	The Boy and Girl School.
James Flecker ... 791	By J. P. ... 797
THE WORLD OF BOOKS ... 791	REVIEWS:—
Books to be Read ... 791	The Heart of Africa ... 797
ART:—	Critics of Socialism.—II. Mr.
Beauties at the New Art	W. H. Mallock ... 789
Gallery ... 793	Mid-Victorian ... 799
	A Novel of Propaganda ... 800
	Books in Brief ... 802
	THE WEEK IN THE CITY ... 804

[The Editor will be pleased to consider manuscripts if accompanied by stamped and addressed envelopes. He accepts no responsibility, however, for manuscripts submitted to him.]

Diary of the Week.

THE Licensing Bill was introduced on Thursday by Mr. Asquith, in a speech exhibiting powers of expounding and illuminating a subject of great complexity which no contemporary British statesman possesses. His audience included the Primate and Lord Peel, the venerable founder of the new temperance movement of which this measure is the crown. We deal fully elsewhere with the intricate machinery of the Bill and its main effect and purpose. Its capital provision is the setting up of a time limit on licences of fourteen years, which will require a sinking fund of five and a-half per cent. on their capital value. Within the compensation period, licences are to be gradually reduced by about one-third, the proportion to population being practically 1 in 750 in towns and 1 in 400 in the country districts. Under Mr. Asquith's scheme of allotting the compensation fund, the amount paid to the owner will be reduced and that paid to the publican substantially increased. Its general control will be vested in a Central Commission. The Bill regulates the conduct of public-houses in many directions. Sunday opening, outside London, is cut down by one hour, and the bonâ-fide traveller must extend his journey from three to six hours. Clubs are also brought under control. They are to be annually licensed, and whether in the East End or the West are to be subject to the visits of inspectors in plain clothes. The licensing authorities are to have new powers in the way of excluding children from public-houses, shutting public-houses on election days, and regulating the employment of barmaids.

* * *

THE Bill, which is the boldest measure of social reform which the Government has proposed, was threatened with rooted opposition by Mr. Balfour, to whom property is a fetish, irrespective of its character or of public rights. The scheme of compensation might reduce men to beggary, and what the Government called insurance he called robbery. The general scheme of the Bill was calculated to transfer drinking from public-houses to clubs, so that the cause of personal temperance would not be served by it. On the other hand, the opinion of nearly all sections of the Liberal, Labour, and Temperance Parties (save, perhaps, one section of the friends of the local veto) was strongly favourable, Lord Peel giving the measure his benediction. The representatives of the trade use high language, declaring that the Bill means "ruin," "robbery," and practical extinction to their business. "Many brewing companies will be ruined," was Mr. Gretton's comment.

* * *

THE Education Bill was introduced by Mr. McKenna on Monday, in a speech of singular clearness and compactness. It consists of six clauses, and establishes one type only of public schools to which rate aid may be given. This school is subject to full public control, is free of all religious tests for its teachers, and may provide only such elementary Christian teaching as is laid down in the London County Council's syllabus, a document drawn up by Churchmen and Nonconformists, and approved by at least two Primates of the Anglican Church. In single school areas this will be the only school admitted, but the public authority will only use a voluntary school building for five days in the week, and will hand it over to the trustees for Saturday and Sunday, properly cleaned, warmed, and lighted, for religious instruction. In areas where there is a choice of schools there may be contracting out by the trustees of denominational institutions, and in that case rate aid is withheld. But while the municipality refuses rates, the State will increase its grant up to 47s. per child, while insisting on educational efficiency. This means that the Exchequer provides an additional £1,400,000 a year for the relief both of Voluntary schools and of the rates. The average cost of maintenance is about £3 per child, and as the Voluntary schools may impose fees, a charge of threepence per child would relieve them of all but three or four shillings per head. This is not a heavy price to pay for retaining the full denominational atmosphere.

* * *

THE reception of the Bill—which, be it remembered, is partly financial in form—has been mixed. The Nonconformists undoubtedly welcome it more warmly than Mr. Birrell's measure, and the secretary of the passive resisters announces that it will end their movement. The teachers, a powerful element, welcome the creation of a national system and the abolition of tests, but declare against contracting out. This is mainly the attitude of the Labour party, who, also, favour the secular solution. Moderate Churchmen are inclined to welcome it as providing, in Canon Henson's words, "the honest teaching of fundamental Christianity." The Irish Catholics are silent, figuring out its financial result, and hoping for slightly better terms. The extreme High Churchmen, who reject "fundamental Christianity" as "poisonous," and are anxious to speak for Anglicanism as a whole, declare that the measure, in the words of Lord Hugh Cecil, condemns the Church schools to "torment" or "sudden death." Finally, Mr. Balfour, who is a politician and has a rival settlement, declares that the Bill deals an equal blow to education and to the Church of England, and that he has nothing good to say for it. But this is a formula of Mr. Balfour's applied, with slight varieties of tone and phrasing, to all Government measures. His vehement speech was coldly received by the Tariff Reformers who desire the Bill to pass so that it may make way for Tariff Reform, just as Mr. Balfour desires (among other reasons) to destroy it in order to block the way to that change. But the Tory Leader controls the Lords, and, quite unconstitutionally, means to press, partly for personal, partly for tactical reasons, for a second rejection of an educational compromise.

* * *

THE Army and Navy Estimates have been issued, and the Government have also indicated their attitude to the Murray Macdonald motion by asking the House to support them in "such economies of naval and military expenditure as are consistent with the adequate defence of his Majesty's dominions"—a formula which seems to us to be carefully stripped of all meaning. The Army Estimates, which are the less important, show a nominal reduction of £300,000, which is balanced by the failure to add in the sum of £350,000 for the payment of the debts of the old Volunteer corps. This has been provided by a supplementary estimate, though it is part of the bill for setting up the Territorial Army. The Naval Estimates show an increase of £900,000, the total sum asked for the two war services being £59,778,000. The increases in the Naval Estimates are due mainly to the growth in the cost of maintaining the fleet, of its coal bills, and of securing the safety of its supplies of cordite. The shipbuilding vote is down by over half a million. The provision for repairs—£700,000—is enormous, and shows how mighty an Armada is now kept in being. The programme of new construction is fairly large, and the Admiralty point to a full extension next year and in future years in proportion to the programme of foreign Powers. They also declare that existing standards of strength, which, we presume, mean the two-power standard, are to be maintained. There are to be laid down a "Dreadnought," an "Invincible," six fast protective cruisers, sixteen torpedo-boat destroyers, and a number of submarines. Rosyth, the new anti-German naval base, is to be proceeded with, but the initial cost will not be great.

* * *

THIS has been an eventful week in the history of the Congo question, both here and in Belgium. In Belgium the path had apparently been made smooth for annexation of the Congo by King Leopold's "concessions" with regard to the administration and finances of the Crown Domain; differences sprang up at the beginning of the week between him and M. Schollaert's Ministry. The disagreement was acute, and M. Schollaert is said to have threatened resignation, but as that would probably have meant a dissolution—the last thing King Leopold would desire—the Prime Minister gained his point and the King abandoned his demands. What those demands were is not yet known, but they are suspected, naturally enough, to include the provision of a large sum of money and freedom to use it at his will. Possibly the King has repented of his weakness with regard to the Crown Domain, and would take back what he has given. Certainly the Belgian Government and Press have set great store on his concessions on that point, and the Ministry could not venture to surrender its hard-won gains. One utterance in the "Indépendance Belge" is notable; it urges the necessity of hurrying on the annexation on the ground that once public opinion in this country is faced with an accomplished fact the anti-Congo agitation will subside. That is not true, but it is certainly important that the British Government should make our demands and intentions quite clear to the Belgian Ministry before the fact becomes accomplished.

* * *

WE deal elsewhere with the change in Macedonian policy announced by Sir Edward Grey on Tuesday. The language of our statesmen on the second humanitarian interest in current affairs—the Congo State—was not less firm and encouraging. Sir Edward Grey and Lord Lansdowne were practically agreed. For the time British action is in abeyance, awaiting the terms on which the Belgian Government announces the transfer of Congo Administration to the nation. If this transaction carries with it full Parliamentary control, with the termination of forced labour, the separation of trading and administration, and the reasonable use of the taxes for the benefit of the people, our interest, which is not material, ceases. If, on the other hand, the Congo State remains an offence to Europe, it will not be recognised as international, and public feeling here may find free expression. Sir Edward dwelt significantly on American sympathy. Belgian opinion is said to be extremely sensitive and irritated, but this can hardly apply to the enlightened Parliamentary and national groups.

* * *

MR. MORLEY has done more than he promised in the Indian frontier expedition. Whether a frontier expedition against the Zakka Khels was necessary or not was never the important question here; on so wild a frontier much has to be taken on trust. But what did matter very much was that the expedition should not by accident or design disturb the settlement which followed the last great war. Happily, there have been no accidents; and Mr. Morley has taken good care that military zeal should not outrun political prudence. There seems good hope that the expedition will presently be withdrawn, before the tribesmen have had time to unlearn their lesson. That so speedy a conclusion will not be universally popular is likely enough; though we have no means of judging how far the "forward" school of frontier policy has recovered its strength. Lord Kitchener was supposed to be in sympathy with it when first he went to India, but contact with the facts may have caused him to change his mind. But whether the opposition was strong or weak, the "politicals" are to be congratulated on having got their way. There will be no more talk for a while of sanatoriums in the Maidan, nor are the Pathan watchdogs to be muzzled because they occasionally snap at their keepers.

* * *

THE new Portuguese Cabinet is in a very awkward dilemma. According to Reuter, the sentiment of the country is Republican and if the elections were free an overwhelming Republican majority is assured in the next Cortes. Senhor Franco brought the late king to his death and the monarchy into disrepute by his unconstitutional régime; and the new Cabinet wisely decided that the only hope for the young king was to revert to Parliamentary Government. Yet Parliament itself is likely to be "unsound," and the assassination of the king has so stirred popular feeling that it is unsafe to rely on ballot-stuffing to secure a Parliament in a better frame of mind. The Cabinet has decided in the meantime to withhold "constituent rights" from the members elected until the Upper House has agreed with any proposals that it may make for a change of constitution. The dodge may give the Government time to prove that the Monarchy is not the real obstacle to thorough-going reform. But Senhor Machado at any rate does not believe in its power to use the opportunity. He predicts the speedy bankruptcy of the Monarchist faction, followed by a Republican triumph, which, however, is to be secured by purely political methods.

* * *

THE Polish Expropriation Bill, one of the most barbarous measures ever proposed to a modern legislature, has passed the Prussian House of Lords by 143 votes to 111. The Government, by dint of private and public pressure on a most unwilling House, has secured the main structure of the Bill, with some exceptions in favour of Church and charitable property. Prince Bülow defended it in language more appropriate to the sixteenth than to the twentieth century, his speech being an apology for the cynical neo-Bismarckianism for which he stands. The German "sense of law and justice" must not prevail against the State's primal duty of self-preservation. He quoted a characteristic saying of his master's, "that neither in peace nor in war could a nation which is fighting for its existence follow ordinary rules of conduct." The State could exercise its emergency rights in its day of peril. This is the language of all egotists, public and private. But it destroys the moral power of the State, and will be quoted to justify both insurrection and revolutionary Socialism.

* * *

AN economic step of great importance, which we have previously discussed in detail, was taken on Friday week, when the House of Commons read the Sweated Industries Bill a second time without a division, and almost without an opposing voice, and referred it to a Select Committee. Mr. Toulmin's Bill establishes a minimum wage for certain "sweated" industries—i.e., where wages are low and outworkers employed—to be fixed by Wages Boards, consisting of employers and employed, with a chairman appointed, if necessary, by the Home Secretary. The scale of payment is to be very flexible. The employments to be first brought under the Act are tailoring, shirt-making, and dress-making; others may be added by schedule. Factory inspectors are to enforce the rate, and imprisonment may follow breaches of the law. Mr. Lyttelton approved the measure as in the line of Truck Acts and the protection by law of children and women workers, and people too poor and miserable to help themselves. The Home Secretary also pointed out that the State already set up rates of wages through the machinery which he requires employers to furnish it with particulars. Why not apply the same process to the sweating system, which was a stain on morals, society, and religion? He reserved opinion on certain clauses of the Bill, but approved its reference to a Select Committee.

* * *

THOUGH the Italian Senate inflicted the lightest sentence within its power upon Signor Nasi, and ensured his early release by including his detention during the trial in his eleven months' imprisonment, there seems to be a general movement, more especially in the southern half of Italy, to press for an immediate pardon, and a petition to the King to that effect is said to have received a large number of signatures in the Chamber. Even his most ardent apologists do not deny that Signor Nasi was guilty of using large sums of public money during his term as Minister for his own political aggrandisement, but they urge in his favour that, unlike many others who have escaped punishment, he left office not a penny the richer for his peculations. The Sicilians, who are ever ready to pick a quarrel with the authorities on the mainland, and who at one time—not unnaturally perhaps as the chief beneficiaries—spoke openly of an insurrection if the ex-Minister was condemned, are at present holding their hands, and nothing more than a few insignificant demonstrations have occurred. But it is clearly on the cards that Signor Nasi's disgrace will not be of long duration.

* * *

THE Home Secretary replied on Tuesday to the deputation of British dramatists who ask for the abolition or the qualification of the dramatic censorship. The authors were represented by Mr. Barrie, Mr. Pinero, and Sir William Gilbert. Sir William suggested that the authors' complaint was not against the Censor as an individual—a statement which we do not endorse, for the criticism of Mr. Redford's judgment is very serious—but against his office as being "arbitrary" and "irresponsible." Sir William proposed to set up a court of appeal against decisions of the Examiner of Plays to which objection was taken, this court to consist of three members, one appointed by the author, one by the Lord Chancellor, and the third by a variety of methods. We think this tribunal much too trivial and obscure. If the Censorship should be retained at all, it should surely be vested either in a representative body, like the County or Town Council, or in a committee with literary and artistic authority behind it, or in a mere police official, dealing only with offences against public decency. If we are to deal with compromises, these would be preferable to Sir William Gilbert's plan. Mr. Gladstone said suggestively that the question of what limitation should be imposed on the dramatic presentation of the dark side of life "went to the depths of human nature," and promised to report fully to the Prime Minister.

* * *

THE Poor Law reorganisation scheme which the Local Government Committee has presented to the London County Council takes us but a little way along the road of reform. Broadly speaking, all that is proposed is to transfer the central Poor Law administration to the County Council, and the local administration to the Borough Councils. The great questions of complete rates, equalisation, and central financial control are left untouched. Whilst destroying the existing Poor Law bodies, the Moderates would preserve all their vices and anomalies. There would only be two Poor Law districts less than now, and each would levy its Poor Law rate with no more central assistance and control than at present exists. As it stands the scheme is not worth the trouble that would be involved in putting it into operation. If, and when, the plan is placed before the Royal Commission on the Poor Laws as a serious proposal for the settlement of a great problem, the London County Council Progressives should find an opportunity of demonstrating how far it falls short of the real demands of the situation.

* * *

LORD ROSEBERY, and the equally sprightly Lord Camperdown, have between them organised a rather elaborate Caledonian jest at the expense of the Scottish Land Bill. Pending its passage to the Lords, they have set up an Anglicised measure, which, as it repeats all the features of the English Land Bill that the landlords and the more Conservative county councils are inclined to sterilise, shows that the landlord party are hostile to any large extension of small holdings. The Bill would greatly complicate the Scottish machinery. Lord Rosebery, whose part in politics is that of the Duke of Argyll during the later Gladstone Ministries, gave delighted support to Lord Camperdown's measure, which will not, of course, secure six Liberal votes in the House of Commons. The Government, through Lord Crewe, practically treated the introduction of the measure as an act of discourtesy. This is almost too severe. The Camperdown Bill affects nothing in politics; it merely exhibits Lord Rosebery in a new and amusing pose.

* * *

THE series of cricket matches between England and Australia have ended in a decisive victory for the Commonwealth, which has won four games out of five. The English eleven, young and crippled by many accidents to its players, have shown very small power of fighting a hard battle in the second innings. On this occasion they failed to make 278 runs on a good wicket, and were beaten by 49. Apart from fortune, the balance of which was heavy against the English team, the result was due, first, to the want of nerve and stability in the English eleven; and, secondly, to their imitation of the dull Australian method of batting without its coolness and grip. English batsmen excel in the brilliant, not the cautious, game.

Politics and Affairs.

THE SECOND EDUCATIONAL COMPROMISE.

WHATEVER criticism may justly be passed on Mr. McKenna's attempt to solve the education problem, the attack delivered in the second half of Mr. Balfour's speech will be dismissed by all impartial and moderate men. Mr. Balfour's love of dialectics leads him at times into singularly unfair and unstatesmanlike criticisms of his opponents, and the education question, which always stirs his feeling in a remarkable degree, is the field in which his casuistry finds its opportunity for exercise in a particularly exasperating form. We may, indeed, suspect that domestic tactics come in to reinforce Mr. Balfour's dialectics, and that the Conservative leader's desire to keep the educational controversy on the political field is in harmony with his inclination to keep Tariff Reform off it. But we will allow that he is opposed root and branch to the principles to which Liberals are pledged. The trouble is that when a Liberal statesman, be it Mr. Birrell or Mr. McKenna, seeks to apply these principles with some tenderness for the special interests over which Mr. Balfour watches, he turns and rends him for inconsistency. His complaint is that by continuing State aid to non-provided schools, the Government will violate their election pledges. If every concession were to be met in this spirit, compromise would disappear from politics, and the educational controversy, in particular, would assume a bitterness which would make the exasperation of the past six years seem sweet by comparison. If Mr. Balfour wants to prove that it is impossible to meet the views of those for whom he speaks, he has gone far to succeed. But he will be well advised to bear in mind, in his turn, that if he succeeds in wrecking this Bill, the controversy will not perish. Neither the Nonconformists, nor the large neutral party who are bent on securing public control and freedom from religious tests, will acquiesce in the present system, and every rejection of a compromise makes a more uncompromising solution necessary. British Nonconformity is not to be extinguished by Mr. Balfour; but extinguished it will be if the Act of 1902 stands unchanged on the Statute Book.

As compared with Mr. Birrell's Bill, that of Mr. McKenna is an advance in thoroughness. It settles the question in the rural, single-school districts, where it is most acute, in favour of undenominationalism and complete public control. But it leaves the question still open in the urban districts. Where no choice of schools is possible, it ensures that the one school available shall be under full public control, and not under that of any religious denomination. Where a choice is possible, it ensures that there shall always be a public and undenominational school within reach of every child. But it also proposes to continue and increase the State subsidy, while withdrawing the local subsidy to denominational schools in urban areas, so that parents who prefer it may obtain this form of teaching for their children. It thus meets the objection of principle which has been raised to the Act of 1902 by Nonconformists, without destroying the work done by Anglicans and Catholics in the schools of the large towns.

The price paid for this concession to sectarianism is the re-introduction of a cleavage into the system of public elementary education. In place of schools uniformly maintained out of the rates and taxes, together and alike subject, though in different degrees, to the local authority, we shall once again have two sets of schools clearly distinguished. One will be public schools in the fullest sense of the term; the other will be schools privately owned and managed, but maintained principally by State aid, and required to conform to a standard of efficiency prescribed by the Government. If the two sets were to be of anything like equal size, this objection would be fatal to the proposal. It would be condemned not merely by denominationalists, but by the small, though authoritative, body of men who look on the whole question mainly from the point of view of educational efficiency, and who have probably exerted a far more decisive influence on the fate of Education Bills, both those that have succeeded and those that have failed, than is generally recognised.

As it is, clear-minded educationalists will recognise that the Bill has two sides. So far as the greater number of denominational schools are concerned, it will, if passed, perform a great service. It will clear them of an administrative difficulty—nine-tenths of it a fictitious difficulty—for good and all. On the other side, it will leave a certain number of schools in the towns at a financial disadvantage. The future of these schools will depend on the swing of the party pendulum. If Mr. Balfour returns to power he will devote what energies he has over from the construction of a "scientific tariff," and the proof that it is not "Protective," to the provision of ways and means for encouraging his pet form of education. We shall hear once again of the "intolerable strain." We shall have the controversies of the 'nineties revived, and the end will be—not, we imagine, any second attempt to impose denominational education on the rates—but additional Government grants which will virtually relieve private owners of the duty of private subscription. If, on the other hand, a Liberal administration continues to hold office, it will maintain the demand for private effort in response to the privilege conferred. If we are to judge by past experience, the private effort will not be forthcoming, and the schools will pass by degrees to the educational authority. Some, indeed, may survive by charging a relatively high fee and appealing to the social exclusiveness so dear to Englishmen of all ranks and all creeds. If this line were generally taken, and an average fee of threepence a week were charged, the denominational schools would only need a contribution of about three shillings per child from their supporters—not a grievous burden. But such schools are likely to be a minority, and might, in any case, claim, if they succeed on these lines, to be filling a certain function of their own in the educational system.

These are roughly the pros and cons which the educationalist will consider. But governing his final verdict is one other very important question. What is the alternative? In answering this question, he cannot consider educational efficiency alone. He has to look at the political possibilities. A secular solution, the most logical and equitable of all, is not as yet within the region of practical politics. The present law will never be accepted by Nonconformists, and though they may be beaten again and again, the educational system will never be stable until their legitimate grievances have been met. There remain two courses. The first is consistent undenominationalism, involving the destruction of all that remains of the voluntary system. This would make for educational efficiency, but would leave a rankling sense of injustice in the minds of Churchmen and Catholics. It would be no more stable than the present law. The final alternative is some kind of compromise. Mr. Birrell tried what, if the paradox be allowed, was compromise pushed to an extreme. It was tepidly approved by his friends, and its moderation abated nothing of episcopal violence. Mr. McKenna offers something which is still a compromise. His proposal does appeal to Nonconformists, and therefore has a force behind it which Mr. Birrell's lacked. Will the concessions that it offers mitigate any of the elements of opposition? Do the Irish Catholics, for example, consider that they can assure themselves of any permanent settlement on better terms? Or again, if they dislike "contracting out," can they come forward with any practical proposal for an allocation of a portion of the education rates which would clearly place the burden of maintaining Catholic schools on Catholic shoulders, and so meet the fundamental objection of Nonconformists to the existing law? We do not suppose that Mr. McKenna or anyone else is wedded to the idea of contracting out. It is at best a makeshift, and is tolerable only as an exception, which time will make still more exceptional. But unless denominationalists can find some method of fairly meeting their adversaries on the point of principle, they cannot on this occasion expect to receive the concessions of detail made so lavishly two years ago. If they elect to fight, they will have to stand or fall with the general political fortunes of Liberalism, which from this time forward may be taken as resolute on one point—to secure access to unsectarian schools, publicly controlled and staffed, and working without reference to religious tests, as the right of every child.

THE LIBERAL PARTY AND THE ESTIMATES.

THE efforts of the economists, inside the Government and out of it, have produced an effect—not a dramatic or determining effect—on the Army and Navy Estimates. Together these exhibit a net increase of £600,000, in place of the much larger augmentation which the full demands of the Services would have entailed. The success, limited as it is, should encourage those who realise that there is nothing sacrosanct in the demands of experts any more than in the requests of average mortals. They ask for more than they think they can get; the Government replies to them with a statement of what it can afford, and of what it thinks politically wise and safe to grant. Even as they stand, the Estimates bear no true characteristics of economy in warlike expenditure. In a period when the world has been swept clear of serious dangers for us, and when we have alliances or understandings with all the Naval Powers but one, the Government demands a provision of nearly sixty millions for the two warlike services, nearly twenty millions more than was required in the year before the South African war, and nearly twenty-five millions more than the last Liberal Government asked for in its last year of office. The small reduction of £300,000 on the Army Budget is not even a real one, for it has only been obtained by diverting from it part of the cost of setting the new territorial scheme on its feet. Yet Mr. Haldane's memorandum points the way to further and considerable saving, if the cost of the new organisation can be kept within reasonable bounds. The chief source of such economies as have been effected lies in the reduction of the South African garrison by one cavalry regiment and four battalions of infantry. The linked battalion system still suffers from the surplus of battalions on external service over those retained at home. What need is there to retain the South African garrison at a strength far greater than that at which it stood before the war, when the political problem was unsettled, and two white Governments subsisted which the prevailing party at home insisted on treating as hostile? The South African service is costly, it is unpopular with the troops, and it is utterly superfluous now that the Government has achieved its great political purpose of creating a free Dominion, fitted, save for the invention of the necessary constitutional machinery, to pass into the stage of complete self-union and self-government that Australia and Canada have reached. On Mr. Haldane's own showing, the concentration of the Army at home and its withdrawal from self-governing colonies, with large European populations, are in the line of all recent developments. The Select Committee of 1861 recommended these changes of system, and Gladstone strongly endorsed them. Free communities are self-defending communities. The Colonies have the Navy, and they want no more, or little more, for their control of interior questions is complete. In particular it is most desirable that South Africa should not consider that she has a free call on British troops for the forcible settlement of the native problem.

The progressive reduction in Army expenditure remains, therefore, a capital object of the Liberal Party, and it will be necessary to see to it that savings on the first line are not eaten up by the growing cost of the second. The reduction of naval expenditure is not less imperative. In themselves the Navy Estimates tell little. As we anticipated, the shipbuilding vote shows a slight decrease; the increase is in the cost of coal, and in items which show that the personnel is unduly large, and that too many ships are left in commission. As a matter of fact, the vote for new construction does not advance with great mass or rapidity. The growth is in the subsidiary votes, which indicate the sustenance of a great body of men in active service and the maintenance and repair of a vast number of ships. But these are the outworks of the subject. The political heart of it lies in the character of the vote for new construction and in the Admiralty's declaration of future intentions. This year we build two "Dreadnoughts," or, as we choose to call them, one "Dreadnought" and one "Invincible." We must not talk of the construction of these monster ships, which will probably reach, or even exceed, 20,000 tons, as if it were a trifling fact. It means the resumption of the new race in "Dreadnoughts," coming, as it does, close on the heels of one of the most tremendous spurts in battleship building which even our Navy has ever known. We also build six fast cruisers, which will, we suppose, be turbine boats, small in size and remarkable for speed. Their object is clear. They are not meant for line of battle; they are commerce destroyers, laid down in pursuit of our decision to retain the right of capture at sea, and thus to render inevitable an incalculable rebutting expenditure on the part of every other Power possessing a large mercantile marine. At the same time, we do proclaim again, in tentative language, the doctrine both of Lord Goschen and of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, that our future expenditure is contingent—that any additional expenditure on construction next year will depend upon the "additions made to their naval force by foreign Powers." A phrase of this kind may be fruitful or barren, or even mischievous, precisely as it is worked out by us in policy, and interpreted abroad by the Admiralty at which it is obviously, though, we think, somewhat improperly, aimed. A tactless approach to Germany might ruin everything, and commit the two nations to a long, direct contest of armaments which would become extremely perilous to peace as it approached the point when, by the facile arts of the scare-mongers, it would be possible to show that our enormous superiority in naval force was being diminished. On the other hand, a relaxation of the anti-German tendencies of our foreign policy in Asia and elsewhere, or a modification of our attitude on commerce-destruction or a quiet arrangement on relative naval strength, or one or two of these palliating instruments together, might set the relations of the two Empires on a secure basis of mutual understanding and even friendship. Germany and England have never had a good material cause of quarrel; the provoking elements have been largely temper and jealousy at large. It is the writers, not the sailors, who have largely poisoned the Anglo-German situation. The statesmen have simply been driven to find the material equivalents for a vicious, but really pointless, war of words.

There is another advantage. The peace agitation in this country has held up the hands of the men who demanded an instant British riposte to the revised German shipbuilding programme, itself a rather late imitation of the English example, and of the following American and French departures. As soon as there was time to reflect, it was seen that whatever we might think it necessary to do against actual floating "Dreadnoughts," it was senseless to begin building against paper ones. It was clear that we could rest while the strength of our fleet was as four to one to that of Germany, and while it appeared that we should be relatively stronger in 1909 than in 1908, and in 1910 than in 1909. And it was seen, too, that the German programme was without political malice, that it was one of the innumerable instances of the incessant drive forward of the race in armaments, propelled by science, and by the nervousness of modern statesmen. So there has been a pause, the Government happily realising that the naval scare was unreal, that no force of reason or serious national concern was behind it. But the pause may not last long. Germany should know that this moment of appeasement is a golden one, and that we cannot always hold back our Jingoism and faint-hearts, any more than she can hold back hers. We cannot see how she or we can be hurt by an arrangement which would save so much English and German money, provided that she can reap some advantage in an improved political relationship with Great Britain. She has strong motives for responding to a reasonable British offer. Her financial situation is much worse than ours; the drain of the war services on her people is more serious; the political dangers of Big Navyism are greater. The real difficulty is that Germany can say truthfully, as she says to-day, that she is not looking simply at the British Navy, as our Jingoism are looking at her fleet, and that, for example, she has reason to be disturbed by the startling growth of the American Navy, on which it suits them to turn a blind eye. And a second difficulty is that we will insist on an enormous and unnecessary preponderance of naval strength. The problem, therefore, is not simple, but we believe that it is soluble; and while this belief remains, every kind of moral force in this country should be exerted in Parliament next week to ensure that no step on the road to war with Germany shall be taken without the consent of the Liberal Party. The Macdonald motion is most moderate; it is, we think, the minimum of what a really vital and sincere party can demand. The Government offer an alternative form of words which begs the question. National safety is not in peril; the wise accord of civilised and Christian nations is.

HOPE FOR MACEDONIA.

Of all the personalities in English politics there is none more difficult to read than Sir Edward Grey. His speeches on certain questions which involve a humanitarian issue have for two years filled those who follow them closely with a feeling little removed from despair. But, suddenly, at a moment of grave crisis in Macedonia, he has made a weighty and considered utterance, which almost obliterates the recollection of his hesitations and timidities, his aloofness and apparent unconcern. Was he waiting all the while for the crisis, or has he caught fire at last from the enthusiasm of others? The explanation, we suspect, is simpler. Neither temperament nor opportunity had hitherto directed him to this problem. In the last Parliament he never intervened in the frequent debates which Mr. Bryce used to wage with Lord Percy. When he came into office, his speeches suggested indifference or even conscious want of sympathy, where in fact there was only a lack of knowledge. It was because he did not know how great a part Lord Lansdowne had played in the Concert, that his first speech in 1906 relegated the whole duty of initiative and suggestion to Austria and Russia. The same explanation may, perhaps, cover his still more unfortunate speech in June, 1907, to the Archbishop's deputation—a speech in which he repudiated the idea of an executive control by Europeans, and even remonstrated with the Balkan Committee for putting forward a suggestion to which British diplomacy stood committed in 1905. But at length the logic of facts and the growing gravity of the crisis have forced on his mind the conclusions at which others arrived three or four years ago. He is now working, publicly and decisively, for the solution by executive control which he rejected a year ago; he has abandoned the attitude of passive observation with which he was at first content, and he has even propounded, though in a tentative form, a much larger scheme for concentrating authority in the hands of a governor independent of the Porte. It is a welcome evolution, and just because it is so unexpected, it may have a peculiarly salutary effect upon the dispositions of the other Powers.

Sir Edward Grey has enunciated very clearly the simple principle that the time has gone past for little remedies. We should have said that that time had been past for many years—certainly since 1902, when the epoch of insurrection on a large scale began. It is his merit to have seen now what Austria and Russia ought to have seen then. If the ruling class had wanted to be reformed, and if the subject races would have lain down while their masters were being reformed, the plan of renovating Macedonia by inspectors and advisers and instructors might have succeeded. We went to Egypt to give advice, but we went alone and with an army behind us. The Concert has failed in Macedonia simply because its agents have never been in a position to issue a command. Sir Edward Grey, looking first to the most urgent evil, proposed some weeks ago that the gendarmerie officers, who at present are mere inspectors, should be put at the head of mobile columns, and charged to hunt down the bands. That was a good suggestion, yet we are not sure that the most urgent problem was necessarily the first to tackle. There are two ways of curing anarchy, by mere police work, and by political appeasement. In so far as the bands are mere factitious instruments of invasion, organised beyond the frontier, composed of mercenary foreigners and subject to no native opinion, they must be met by brute force, as one meets an invading army. This force the Turks will never spontaneously apply, for they thrive by the feuds of the Christians. But in so far as the bands are the product of a genuine protest, and consist of native outlaws driven to despair by oppression, this is not the humanest or the simplest method of appeasement. A political solution, which told the peasants that their fate was at last in the hands of civilised men, would cause these native bands to dissolve of their own motion. At present the peasantry are on the side of these bands. Give them a Government they can trust, and in a few weeks Europe would have before it only the relatively simple task of checking pure brigandage and stopping unwelcome foreign invaders.

To this ideal, the scheme which Sir Edward Grey outlined on Tuesday approximates closely. He sketched it a little vaguely, but we gather that he is ready to revive all the points of the Lansdowne programme—the reduction of the army, the investiture of all the agents of Europe with executive powers, and the elimination of direct interference from Constantinople by the nomination of an independent and irremovable Governor. In these simple phrases lie, we believe, an adequate solution. They mean in the first place the coming of confidence, where at present there is an authority which no one trusts; in the second place, efficiency in the financial, judicial, and police services, and, finally, the disappearance of the element of intrigue. There is good material even among the civilian Mohammedan officials in Macedonia, particularly when they are Albanians by race or modern men by education. But at present the centralisation is so extreme, and the fear of espionage so paralysing, that a good official seldom dares to be himself. Remove the Governor, and, by implication, all his subordinates, from the influence of the telegraph wire which clicks incessantly between his office and the Palace in Constantinople, and the whole atmosphere of administration would be changed. The essential is that a man's promotion shall depend on the opinion of civilised superiors and not on the report of a Palace spy. Lord Lansdowne originally stipulated that the independent Governor should be a Christian. Sir Edward Grey has been well advised to remove that qualification. In Turkey there are not Moslems and Christians. There are Moslems on the one hand, and Greeks and Slavs, Catholics, Exarchists and Patriarchists on the other. It would be impossible to name a native Christian whose race or religion would not make him anathema to some considerable section of the Macedonian population. He would, moreover, be drawn of necessity from the ranks of those who have renounced patriotism and self-respect, and become the creatures of a despotism which their better nature despises. But it is possible still to find an upright Mohammedan in the Turkish service, if care be taken to seek him outside the circle of Court influence. But however happy the choice, it is essential that the Governor shall subordinate himself to his European advisers.

Sir Edward Grey gave no hint of the means by which he proposes to realise this plan—a plan, we must remember, which has stood in one form or another for four years as the declared policy of this country. If he merely launches it as a suggestion, and commends it, with no better title than its own reasonableness, to the notice of the Powers, we doubt if it will fare better than it did in 1903 or 1905. In the rivalries and ambitions of the Concert pure reasonableness plays a small part. The calculations of most of the Powers are governed by Imperial interests, and not by a disinterested view of what is best for the Macedonians. To one of them at least every scheme is judged by the effect it will have on the claim of that Power to be the pillar of Islam. To others, one fears, the ruling thought is to allow the anarchy to continue, until one day Europe in mere despair allows them to occupy or annex the depopulated country. To men engaged in "real" politics, it is necessary to offer some "real" advantage, which means an advantage for themselves. A Gladstone in a council-chamber of Stolypins and Bülow and Aehrenthals would seem a vain babbler—until he mentioned the Fleet. But if one rejects the heroic expedients of last century, one must be prepared with modern weapons. Ultimately the success of this plan depends on our ability to win friends for it by a process of barter. That was the method by which we induced France to recognise our position in Egypt, and Russia to respect our strategical interests round India. If we mean to attain any end which we really consider capital, it is by this method we proceed. In the tangle of interests, commercial and political, which make the politics of the Near East, it ought to be possible to find the material of a bargain. Bosnia is not yet legally Austrian territory; the Bagdad railways halts for lack of capital. If a really large solution of the Turkish problem is contemplated—and nothing less would be adequate—these are some of the counters in the game. Bargains have often disposed before now of the liberties of a race; they are as apt a method to secure them.

THE LICENSING BILL AND ITS PURPOSE.

THE Chancellor of the Exchequer introduced the Government Licensing Bill on Thursday afternoon in a speech which not only illustrated the power of luminous exposition in which he has no equal in the House of Commons, but also his complete grasp of a complicated and difficult subject. The Bill so closely follows the main lines of policy which have been repeatedly advocated in these columns that we can scarcely do otherwise than give it a cordial welcome. And we believe that both the principles on which it is founded and the way in which it gives expression to them will commend themselves to the judgment of the large majority of thoughtful and disinterested students of the difficult social problem with which it attempts to deal. Starting from the assumption, embodied in four centuries of our licensing legislation, that the regulation of the sale of liquor can mitigate the moral and social evils of drunkenness and the economic loss to the nation through excessive drinking, it provides for the ultimate attainment by the State of the freedom, which in practice it does not now possess, to regulate that sale without regard to any other considerations than the welfare of its subjects. It also provides, during the transitional period which must elapse before this freedom is reached, for a very considerable reduction of the present admittedly excessive facilities for obtaining liquor, and for a large increase of local control over the conditions under which it may be sold.

The cardinal principle of the Bill is, of course, the enactment of a time limit on the expiration of which all on-licences for the sale of liquor will terminate. At the end of that period the State will resume possession of the monopoly value with which it ought never to have parted. The time limit fixed by the Bill is fourteen years. It is longer than that which Temperance Reformers generally have demanded, but we do not consider that any shorter period would be practicable, or, on large grounds of State policy, desirable. It is both just and politic to deal considerably with the great and widely diffused financial interests which have grown up on the double expectation, based upon the past practice of licensing administrators, that an annual licence, once granted, would, in the great majority of cases, be renewed, and that the privileges which it conferred would not be widely granted to other competitors. To provide a sinking fund which will replace the selling value of a licence at the end of fourteen years will require, on a four per cent. basis, the setting aside annually of nearly $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the capital value to be replaced. Taking that value in the case of the on-licences in England and Wales as £100,000,000, it means that a sum of five and a-half millions must be set aside annually. This is five times the amount of the present compensation levy. It is equal to an addition of about thirteen per cent. to the public burdens imposed on liquor. But it will leave liquor to bear substantially less public charges per gallon of alcohol consumed than it bears in the United States. And the extra charge will probably only amount to about five per cent. on the annual turnover of the trade done in public houses. On the whole, the time limit strikes us as a reasonable proposal which will not cause any grave embarrassment to well-managed concerns, though it will doubtless be serious in its effect on companies which were over-capitalised on their flotation, or which have recklessly bought up tied houses at prices beyond their real value.

The Bill makes important alterations in the principles and in the method of assessing compensation for the extinction of licences. That compensation is to be in future the actuarial value, at the time of the refusal of the licence, of an annuity equal to the annual value of the licence for the unexpired portion of the time limit. The annual value of the licence is to be the difference between the property tax assessment of the licensed premises, and the annual value which, in the opinion of the Inland Revenue Commissioners, they will bear when unlicensed. The effect of these provisions will be at once to reduce, probably, by more than one-third, the extravagant amount of compensation which owners of tied houses have received since Mr. Justice Kennedy's judgment, and as the years of the time limit run on the compensation will correspondingly diminish. In addition, however, to this compensation payable to the owners of the property, the actual licence holder, who has fared very badly under Mr. Balfour's Bill, will receive such compensation as the Commissioners of Inland Revenue may consider adequate for his loss of trade. The compensation levy is made national and compulsory and its administration is taken out of the hands of Quarter Sessions and vested in three Licensing Commissioners for the whole country. The Bill deals with the problem of licence reduction during the time limit in a very drastic fashion. The power of the local Justices, taken away by Mr. Balfour's Act, is restored. They are to be compelled to submit to the Commissioners schemes for gradual reduction, which, varying with the density of the population, and allowing for the special needs of business centres and watering-places, will at the end of fourteen years bring down the number of licences to something like that recommended by the minority report of Lord Peel's Commission—1 in 750 in towns and 1 in 400 in country districts. This is only one of several instances in which the Bill carries out the recommendations of the ex-Speaker of the House of Commons. The effect of these provisions will be ultimately to reduce the number of on-licences in England and Wales from 95,000 to 65,000. Hotels and bonâ-fide restaurants are exempted from some of these provisions.

It would be impossible within the space of a leading article to deal with the many and valuable reforms in licensing administration which the Bill contains. It reduces the hours for selling liquor on Sundays to three and renders entire Sunday-closing possible if the licensing authority so decide. It gives power to the local Justices to impose conditions on the granting of licences, and in particular to restrict the employment of women and children on licensed premises, and to keep children from visiting them at all. It gives the local electorate the power, by a bare majority, to veto the granting of new licences, on or off, during the time limit. The principle of popular control is thus recognised, but the machinery for giving effect to it at the end of the time limit is left undetermined. We trust that the text of the Bill on this point will safeguard the Government scheme against possible misrepresentations. Ministers cannot mean to give a bare majority at the end of the time limit the power of prohibition, and they should be extremely careful not to leave their opponents any excuse for saying that such is their intention. The Bill abolishes the appeal to Quarter Sessions on the refusal of a licence on non-compensation grounds in towns of over 25,000 inhabitants and sets up an autonomous tribunal within the Borough for the hearing of such appeals. In compensation cases the right of refusal is everywhere vested in the local Justices, subject to the financial control of the Licensing Commission. All new off-licences are brought within the monopoly value provisions of the Act of 1904, and these provisions are amended and strengthened.

Clubs are to be registered every year, and a right to object to their registration on the ground that they are merely drinking clubs, or on any of the grounds on which a club may be struck off the register under the Act of 1902 is given to any member of the public. A superior officer of police in plain clothes specially authorised by a Superintendent of Police, or a Superintendent himself, may enter and inspect any registered club. Mr. Asquith was less ample and clear in the exposition of his method of dealing with Clubs than when dealing with some other parts of the Bill. On the whole, this strikes us as the weakest and least effective part of the Government scheme. The number of clubs now registered is only about 7,000. It may be impossible to deal very drastically with them. What is much more important, both in the interests of the public and in justice to the licence holder, is that the indefinite multiplication of clubs shall be prevented; otherwise the whole object of the Government's policy of reducing licences may be defeated. We believe that by the institution of a double check, a legal and an economic one, this disaster may be avoided. The licensing of new clubs should be in the unfettered discretion of the Licensing authority, and they should also be subject to a substantial licence duty.

The Bill is a comprehensive, and must necessarily be a lengthy, measure. Its machinery is not rigid; it may be subject here and there to easing should the total strain seem to be unnecessarily severe. Mr. Asquith has opened the way to reasonable, though not, of course, to destructive, amendment. For the rest we predict that the measure will be greeted with much quiet satisfaction by those who are at present engaged in the work of licensing administration. It frees their hands, enlarges their powers, and gives them considerable liberty of initiative and experiment. The introduction of such a Bill is an act of high political and moral courage. It will bring Ministers little support from the man in the street. It may cost them two or three bye-elections during the next few months and some seats at the General Election. Many forces of property and privilege will be arrayed against it. It will have to encounter not merely the hostility of the trade, but the nervous fears of the timid investor. All the more earnestly should those who realise the magnitude of the evils it attempts to mitigate set themselves to work to secure its passage into law. Its complex machinery is only the concrete expression of a determined and carefully thought out purpose to weaken a habit which is impairing the industrial efficiency and lowering the manhood of Englishmen. And its authors may, therefore, rightly claim for it, not the grudging approval, but the warm and enthusiastic support, of public-spirited citizens. At any rate there should be nothing halting in the welcome it receives from those who have learned to see in the waste and ruin of human character through intemperance an even profounder tragedy than the squalor and the poverty which it brings in its train.

Life and Letters.

THE POETRY OF THE BIBLE.

THE poetry of the Bible is essentially expressed in symbol. That is why its appeal increases with the passage of the years. The Hebrews rarely, if ever, visualised. Visualisation, as modern psychologists have demonstrated, is largely the prerogative of children. Almost all children see things with the inward eye in sharp-cut form and distinct colours. This faculty of interior sight is preserved by some—by the painters, by those of secure artistic perception—to the end of their days. But in the majority it vanishes with the transformation from the child world into the adult world. That transformation is not (as in the old theory) an insensible development of a gradual growth. It is the deliberate death of one world, the birth of another. Children attempt to make visions of the prophetic and apocalyptic literature of the Bible. The apparatus breaks in their hands. They are baffled and disappointed. Artists have essayed the same task, and found the results grotesque. You cannot draw on paper (as Blake has demonstrated) one whose "hair was like wool," sitting in the midst of seven candlesticks, "holding in his right hand seven stars," "out of whose mouth goeth a sharp sword." You cannot set to definite outline and colour a mystical and restless imagery which associates with words of transcendent import flashing appearances of light and splendour and shadow. The Middle Age was a Child Age, vanishing as childhood vanishes, with the birth of the world of to-day. The Middle Age made desperate attempts to convert the Apocalypse into a definite panorama of things seen. The result is a failure: whether in Angelico's heaven or in Botticelli's hell. Rossetti, a child of the Italian fourteenth century, straying homeless between Chelsea and Blackfriars, confessed that his favourite reading was the Revelation of St. John. But the Heaven over whose golden bar the "Blessed Damozel" leant, with its adorable yellow-haired maidens and its pleasant houses and gardens, was something timid and emasculated in comparison with the tremendous, almost inarticulate, suggestions of the original documents. Professor Wernle, a German theologian of painstaking erudition and scanty humour, has recently expressed his disgust with these barbaric visions of jewels and gold, this cube (as he calls it) suspended in mid-air, with beasts full of eyes inside and out, and armies which still fiercely delight in war. Yet to the old, amongst whom visualisation has largely passed into symbolism, the Apocalypse is always the favourite book of the Bible. And in all the confused centuries, where each generation of humanity has flared and faded, the heart's longing for some attainment inexpressible in exact reasoning has found its satisfaction in these stupendous visions of light and sound and motion: in the conception of a city whose streets are pure gold like transparent glass, whose foundations are garnished with jasper and jacinth and emerald: every one of whose several gates is one pearl: in the midst of whose streets is a Tree of Life, bearing all manner of fruit: "whose leaves are for the healing of the nations."

It is the poetry of symbolism which thus ultimately conquers, and this poetry has become associated with a tradition which hangs upon certain great words with imperishable associations. "Star," "glory," "everlasting joy," "as the voice of many waters," "the sound of the millstone," "the light of the candle"—a thousand other expressions which in themselves may be almost unmeaning, have come to enjoy significance through the reverberation of the suggestion which they immediately awaken. For these suggestions are not merely carved on every building and incorporated into every literature: they have become part of the very blood and sinew of the corporate tradition which has made the inherited life of the people. That is why (for example) the great novelists fall back, in their moments of supreme expression, upon the Bible simile and quotation, which complete almost all the greatest passages of English literature. And the ultimate impression is of something said for all time—fitting and complete. In the "School for Saints," the little disreputable attorney, whose one reputable element is his devotion to his religion, is being taunted by its opponents with its obvious approaching destruction. "What of this?" he is asked, "and of this?" as he is taken through Europe and exhibited the nations in arms against the Church. "How do I answer?" he asks, in a sudden flash of inward fire. "And the multitude of all the nations that fight against Ariel, even all that fight against her and distress her, shall become as a dream, as a watch in the night." In "Westward Ho," the tired band of wanderers in the South American forests, searching for the El Dorado, are arrested at the last by the testimony of the old fighter and mystic. "I have long had a voice within which saith," he declared, "'Salvation Yeo, thou shalt never behold the Golden City which is on earth, where heathens worship sun and moon and the hosts of heaven: be content therefore to see that Golden City which is above, where is neither sun nor moon, but the Lord God and the Lamb are the light thereof.'" And in one of the familiar scenes in English literature—on the return of Henry Esmond from the wars—Thackeray uses the poetry of the same reverberating memories. "To-day, Henry, in the anthem when they sang it, 'When the Lord turned the captivity of Zion we were like them that dream,' I thought, yes, like them that dream—they that dream. And then it went, 'They that sow in tears shall reap in joy: and he that goeth forth and weepeth shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him'; I looked up from the book and saw you. I was not surprised when I saw you. I knew you would come, my dear, and saw the gold sunshine round your head."

Beyond this symbolism and these associations the poetry of the Bible abides as the first and also final presentation of the great elemental emotions. The reader apprehends often, as with a sudden shock of surprise, that the essentials of human nature remain entirely unaltered by all the vicissitudes of progress and of time. Across the rise and fall of nations, over the feverish life of generations whose bodily atoms have resolved themselves into dust and thin air, there sounds the unchanging music of love, and loss, and longing. It is in a remote legend of a Moabite and a Hebrew, with uncouth names, and no distinction of fame or lineage, preserved—a torn fragment, as if by accident—that men and women find to-day the perfect expression of an undying affection—"Whither thou goest I will go; and where thou lodgest I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, thy God my God. Where thou diest will I die, and there will I be buried: the Lord do so to me and more also, if aught but death part me from thee." It is in a fierce record of tribal warfare, containing revolting elements of cunning and barbaric vengeance, that there is set the most musical of all laments of human friendship—the living over the dead—"I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan: very pleasant hast thou been to me; thy love for me was wonderful, passing the love of women." An undated, anonymous drama composed in the desert, and full of its wide spaces and questionings, to-day provides the absolute expression of a challenge whose influence no wealth, or civilisation, or complexity of fortune has in the least degree modified—"As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: so man lieth down and riseth not; till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep."

This splendid and spacious literature has been vitiated for many at the present by the desire to twist every verse into edification and make every argument support a cause. With a fuller emancipation its variety, its solemnity, its sublimity will be more fully appreciated. It contains passages of the boldest scepticism: impeachments of the beneficence of the Deity as fierce as in any Swinburnian chorus. "Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress, that thou shouldest despise the work of thy hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked?" asks Job defiantly of a Providence whose wisdom is to him as inconspicuous as its goodness. It contains the proclamation of an Agnosticism more ultimate and searching than any of its somewhat sloppy modern revivals: the reply of the Cosmic Spirit from the huge unreason of unintelligible forces to man's pitiful complaint—"Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades or loose the bands of Orion?" A piece of Eastern decorative and sensuous love poetry in praise of one that "looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, terrible as an army with banners," is set adjacent to a piece of shattering Eastern pessimism, crying like the wailing wind in a deserted city—"Vanity of vanities, all is vanity." The story passes from the wanderings of shepherds and wayfarers in the dim childhood of the world, through the gradual building of a rich and complex society: to its prosperity, its testing time, its moral decay, its irretrievable fall, "because it knew not the time of its visitation." And the whole is set in a more majestic background of the eternities even than the vast shadowy destinies and spirits of the northern mythology: from a Spirit of Life at the beginning moving on the face of darkness, to a city at the end where "they need no candle, neither light of the sun," because within it is neither night nor sadness, but only the splendour of an unfading dawn.

A DICTATOR OF PORTUGAL.

A FEW leagues South-West of Coimbra, lies the village of Soure, where in 1699 was born Portugal's greatest Minister, if not greatest man, Sebastian Joseph de Carvalho. South of Soure is Pombal, on the border of the beautiful pine forests of Leiria; and here, as Marquis de Pombal, Carvalho died in 1782. In his bed, too; a pretty good achievement, considering that his worst enemy then shared the throne as King Consort. He was disgraced and banished from Lisbon, and, it is said, spent his last years very devoutly. But there was some hitch about his burial after death, and for a generation or two his body lay above ground, as neglected as the dead trunk of a rotten tree. During the Peninsular War there was a slight skirmish here between our men and the French, in which the 1st Hussars and the 16th Light Dragoons shone. We drove out the French, and rescued six stripped women whom, with a brutality very typical of the period, they had locked up in a house, after firing it. But though we made acquaintance also with Pombal's castle on its green hill-lock, we seem to have overlooked the late Marquis's body. Portugal herself was so busy, indeed, that it was not until 1862 that she realised the wrong done to her great regenerator. Then his remains were made the subject of a Bill in Parliament—he was to rest at last in a mausoleum, built at the public expense. His caustic spirit might fairly have retorted that by that time he was very well as he was. It would have been in keeping with his comment on the people's ingratitude in scooping out his medallion from the great statue group in Lisbon's Praça do Comercio after his disgrace. All he said was: "It was not a very good likeness."

Good likeness or bad, Pombal's effigy had to return to the Praça. That vast mass of bronze commemorated the restoration of Lisbon after the great earthquake of 1755, and without him it were indeed a lying trophy. One wonders to this day what Lisbon and Portugal would be if a weaker man than he had been Dictator at the time. That ten-minutes' convulsion upheaved the kingdom, besides the capital. Beyond doubt, an immense amount of gold and gold's worth disappeared into the bowels of earth. One estimate is £536,360,000, which is absurd. A twentieth of that were bad enough for Portugal, then two centuries past her prime. The King is said to have lost £4,000,000 in diamonds alone. That might be, and no one except himself the better or worse for it. But the general loss, in nerves and hard cash, was unquestionably appalling, and if Pombal had not set up gibbets among the smoking ruins and hung thieves by the hundred over the bodies of the tens of thousands crushed in Lisbon's collapse, anarchy might easily have established itself. The Most Faithful King Joseph was encouraged to pray to his heart's content for the nation's recovery; but Pombal worked. Lisbon's resurrection was due to him. That majestic Praça do Comercio, and the regular streets out of it (though narrow for our age), are a proud monument to his memory, whatever might have befallen his dust.

He was physically a huge man, made larger by the spacious wig with which fashion covered his head. Something of an adventurer for the first half of his life, he looked right and left for the best ladder to climb. He found two ladders, the Church and a second wife. At forty he was in London as Portugal's envoy-extraordinary, much smitten with us as a nation, and profoundly fascinated by Sir Robert Walpole's statesmanship. But this didn't prevent him, by and by, doing his utmost to loosen our hold upon the port wine trade. The very keynote of his financial policy when he was in undisturbed power, was the support of home industries. Long before the great exhibition of 1851, Pombal devised little exhibitions of the same kind. Merchants and manufacturers were invited to collective shows of their goods, which were all to be home made. Anyone wearing foreign stuffs might have them torn from his back. Worse still, metal buttons, from Birmingham or anywhere beyond the kingdom, were liable to be broken in pieces by the common hangman. A school for commerce was established in Lisbon, and the cry of "Portugal for the Portuguese" in all matters of profit was accepted with great eagerness. The Dictator was particularly anxious that the country should be self-supporting in corn. Subtle calculations having proved that in this respect the supply was some fifteen days short in the 365, vines were stubbed up and wheat sown instead, for the deficiency. To protect the purity of the port wine, he ordered all elder trees within five leagues of the Upper Doure to be cut down—a noble mandate for British palates. The people scarcely at first approved of these and such interferences with their own ways, but the surrender of the royal monopoly in tobacco, and the general broadening of the farmer's opportunities, soon consoled them. Carvalho's iron hand and iron will thus reached to the bleakest corners of Traz-os-Montes, and swayed the new Lisbon simultaneously. Even to this day his Protectionist policy has left such a mark that in South Portugal three-fourths of the people exist altogether on local or national products, aided, of course, considerably by their climate.

Like most strong men, Carvalho had strong antagonisms. It was by Jesuit help and his second wife (Countess Daun, related to the great marshal), that he became a personage at court, but no sooner was he established than he began to get rid of the ladder. He turned up his cuffs and went for the Jesuits on both sides of the Atlantic. Ungrateful it might be, but it was magnificent as policy. The conspiracy of the Duke d'Aveiro played into his hands in this matter, and it was not for want of trying that he failed to bring down his other great antagonist, as a confederate in this still mystifying tragedy—Dom Pedro, King Joseph's younger brother, the enemy who survived and struck home at him at last. This affair faintly resembles the horrible murder of Dom Carlos and his son. King Joseph was accustomed to pay nightly visits to a certain beautiful young Marchioness de Tavora and one night his coach was fired upon by three or four men. The King received a slug in the arm and for his part would have preferred to hush everything up. But Carvalho saw with other eyes. He ferreted out his interpretation of the plot, and haled up the Duke d'Aveiro, the Tavora family, and certain Jesuits. At the trial enough was proved to bring d'Aveiro and the Tavoras to the scaffold. But the king would not let Carvalho convince him that his own brother was at the root of the attempt. Such a crime was incredible to the Most Faithful monarch, even though it was the only quite plausible explanation of the conduct of the others. D'Aveiro was broken on the wheel by the Tagus, and then, like the Tavoras, burnt and thrown into the river. Only the young Marchioness of Tavora was spared, and in 1794 she was still alive—old, ugly, deaf, and scorned by those who remembered her past.

The Jesuits' turn followed. Nothing shows Carvalho's power more than his ability to crush these mighty men, in opposition to the king's own instincts and prejudices. He did it with superb daring; packed them into ships and despatched them to Civita Vecchia, deeply to the Pope's embarrassment and indignation. In a year or two none remained in Portugal out of prison. Ostensibly, of course, the d'Aveiro plot was a pretext for their condemnation. They had, it was said (presumably in Dom Pedro's interest) assured the Tavoras in the confessional box that it was no sin, or only a venial one, to kill the king. Carvalho's vengeance completed itself, ignobly enough, in the public strangling, in 1761, of Malagrida, the chief of these Jesuit associates. This poor old degenerate was convicted of heresy and monstrous blasphemies. The evidence at his trial shows him merely to have been mad. But it was Carvalho's policy to make a clean sweep of his enemies at any cost, and so he was strangled and burnt in the Rocio. The nobility went to the show as to a bull-fight.

For sixteen years longer Carvalho held the reins of Portugal, without a rival, and Portugal flourished in her own reduced way. Dom Pedro, his enemy, nursed his resentment so long in vain that it seemed to weaken, like most passions, with age. Though he was the king's brother and son-in-law, he was no match for this persistent, crafty, and supremely able administrator of the country. King Joseph sat comfortably in the hollow of Carvalho's hand to the day of his death in 1777. Even then it cannot be said that the great Dictator suffered much. He was a very old man, heavy with earthly honours, and grown rather insensitive to earthly shocks. The king consort might have urged Dona Maria to bring Pombal (he had been marquis since 1770) to judgment on any suitable plea and take off his head. Instead of that the old statesman was escorted by the royal guard to the little village of Pombal, with its old castle on the green hill in the middle of the hollow, and he was commanded to stay there. And there he stayed, indifferent, as we have seen, to the brief change of public opinion about him and that trivial insult to his bronze figure in the Praco do Comercio, and, as history tells us, engaged with his devotions until he died, in 1782. To-day his country forgives him everything for the sake of his strength.

THE INSECT RAIDER.

THE plagues that visit man the mighty are much in his mind, but he pays less heed to the plagues which attack plants and animals, and the inconceivably numerous small organisms, insects or fungi, that do this work. Yet recent science has closely investigated the character and habits of these plague spreaders. For example, it has found that the life of the plague insect is very short, lasting only a few weeks or months, and rarely exceeding a year. Many kinds of insects exhibit several generations in one year, and one pest, the cockchafer, is somewhat exceptional in living for three, four, or five years, so that on the Continent cockchafer-years recur at these intervals. Then again, plague-causing insects are very prolific. For instance, the familiar Nun moth may lay more than two hundred and fifty eggs in one season. But this number sinks into insignificance beside the generations derived in one year from a couple of our bark-beetles, whose descendants would represent millions, were they all to survive. And these prolific individuals are sterile in comparison with the queen of a South African white ant, which day after day may unceasingly pump forth eggs at the rate of sixty to the minute, or more than 85,000 to the day. The Gypsy moth was accidentally introduced into the United States in 1868-9. Ten years later the insect had become a local pest, and when twenty years had passed, its caterpillars covered the trees and paths, even invading the houses, over a considerable area of country. In 1890 began the costly war waged against the Gypsy moth, which had extended its ravages over fifty square miles of country. By annual grants, commencing at 50,000 dollars, and arising to 200,000, the Gypsy moth's advance was fought over hundreds of square miles. More striking still is the history of the devastation wrought by the Nun moth in Germany and Russia. In 1853-8 Eastern Prussia and adjoining Russia suffered a visitation of inconceivable numbers of this moth. Within a few years it and its successors, the bark-beetles, destroyed 7,000 square miles of forest. In 1856 the wind blowing over Livonia carried out to sea a swarm, which, when cast back on the shore, produced a bank of corpses nearly fifty miles in length, six feet in width, and six inches in height. During a later plague in Germany, a small butterfly net was held up for less than two minutes, and in that short time there flew into it 506 Nun moths! These statistics explain how it comes about that a plague once started cannot be stopped, but must run its course.

Plague-causing insects having such boundless powers of multiplication, one naturally asks:—"Why are plagues not universal?" rather than "Why do plagues occur?" The answer is that the death-rate of the insect (or rather organism) vastly exceeds the survival-rate. This becomes clear when one remembers that year after year the number of individuals of any common insect remains fairly constant, though liable to slight irregular fluctuations, and to larger apparent variations due to the fact that the flying insect is obvious only at certain seasons of the year. Thus, if two individual insects be directly responsible in one year for a hundred eggs, and consequently for a hundred offspring, the death-rate is ninety-eight per cent. In the following year (at the same season) they will still be represented by two individuals only. Even if the modest estimate of progeny of one hundred for each two insects be adopted, the saving of the life of two additional individuals in the hundred would involve a doubling of the population, while the destruction of one additional insect would imply a halving. Very slight changes in the death-rate cause disproportionately great ones in the population.

What are the causes of this ceaseless massacre of insects? The checks are either active or passive. Actively destructive agencies are weather and climate, or hostile animals, and pathogenic fungi and bacteria. Passively hostile factors are the want of appropriate food, and of means of defence.

Most obvious are the effects of climate and weather. Cold climate, wet weather soaking the soil and bringing down flying insects, unseasonable extremes of cold weather, storms of wind—all these help to keep down the numbers, the first by decreasing the generations in a year, and the others by active destruction. Yet in comparison with the checks provided by weather, the regular rôle of slaughter played by animals in murdering insects is far greater. Fish, frogs, lizards, insectivorous birds and beasts, join in the murders. But the insect often finds his deadliest foes in his own class; such as predacious dragon-flies, snake-flies, lacewings, carnivorous beetles including lady-birds, the wily larvæ of hover-flies, robber-flies, and the "solitary" robber-wasps which, after paralysing their victims, carry them off to their nests. Belonging to an entirely different type of insect-destroyer are the parasitic tachina-flies, and the ichneumon-flies which, with the aid of their needle-like ovipositors, place eggs in or on the larvæ of other insects. At least fifty per cent. of the caterpillars and pupæ of certain kinds are often infected in ichneumon-flies: while a single species of caterpillar may be preyed on by many kinds of parasitic ichneumon-flies. They have a mysterious power of discovering their prey; for example, one large species can "spot" a saw-fly larva hidden by an inch of solid wood. The ichneumon bores with its long needle through bark and wood of the infected tree, unerringly strikes the slender tunnel in which the burrowing larva lies, and there deposits its lethal egg. Thus perfectly are insects designated to kill out their fellows.

It is man's knowledge of this adaptability which serves him, and pointed the means of saving the fruit industry of California from the ravages of the "cottony-scale." This Australian insect was introduced into California, where it found rich stores of easily available food on the fruit-trees, a favourable climate, and a haven of refuge from its Australian foes. The staggering spread of the insect, and the failure to cope with it, threatened the economic existence of Californian orchards. But salvation followed the introduction of Australian ladybirds, accustomed in their own homes to prey upon the cottony-scale. The climate suited them, and they at once began to live solely on the Australian scale-insect. In a one-sided battle victory fell to the ladybirds, advancing calmly to the front and soon stamping out the leprous fruit disease.

But what of the passive check of insect plagues?

Here there is action and reaction. Pure forests or orchards, wide expanses of gardens and fields, supply great masses of uniform food, and thus set up one of the conditions in which the plague-creators flourish. And then when the attack destroys the crops, the destroyer, if he happens to be a specialist in his diet, is stamped out, until the same crop is replaced by man or by Nature. In horticulture man does more than destroy the passive check by isolation. He makes his plants more vulnerable. Wild plants are protected against native animals not only mechanically, by the help of spines, a hard and often siliceous skeleton, or microscopic needles, but also chemically by tannin, aromatic and bitter bodies, or acid substances, which are distasteful or poisonous. But man, breeding and planting for his own sake, eliminates these repellent and protective characters, and thus lays cultivated plants peculiarly open to assault. The susceptibility of a plant may also be increased by its misfortunes. Trees parched by drought, scorched by fire, with their roots injured by fungus, or their shoots attacked by Nun moth, are much more liable to insect raids, especially those conducted by bark-beetles. So that healthiness is in itself a check to insect foes.

Indeed, it is man's ignorance of the laws of insect life which is his chief trouble. It is by knowledge and co-operative effort that pests may be mitigated or prevented. Therefore his great weapon is continuous research into the physical conditions affecting the life and the life-histories of noxious insects and fungi, and of the animals favouring or obstructing their insatiable life. Yet how many economic fungologists and entomologists does the State maintain? Is there more than one for the whole United Kingdom? There are scores in Germany and in the United States.

Present-Day Problems.

MR. MORLEY AND INDIAN REFORM.

THERE appears to be some confusion in the public mind as regards the important constitutional reforms contemplated by Mr. Morley. In India, especially, the view taken is unduly pessimistic. No doubt there is reasonable ground for anxiety, and even alarm. For the scheme set forth in the Simla "Circular," of August 24 last, is, as regards some of its main features, directly contrary to the wishes and hopes of Indian reformers; so that some of them have given way to despair, condemning the whole scheme as worse than useless, and denying that it contains even the germs of anything good. They think that, under the guise of a Council of Notables, it is intended to create an Indian House of Lords; and, on the pretext of expansion, to eliminate from the Legislative Councils the elements of independence and progress. These suspicions are not ill-founded, so far as Simla is concerned. But where these Indian critics have fallen into error is when they have hastily assumed that Mr. Morley is committed to this scheme, and even that he is its originator. A consideration of the facts will show that this assumption is erroneous; that the scheme originated at Simla, and nowhere else; and that Mr. Morley maintains a judicial attitude towards it, keeping the ultimate decision in his own hands. A reference to the history of the case will show that the general principles laid down by Mr. Morley as regards the Council of Notables point less to a House of Lords than to the Indian National Congress, which for the last twenty years has sought to act as the interpreter between the rulers and the ruled; and that, as regards the expansion of the Legislative Councils, he has said nothing incompatible with a development that would give a fair and full representation to all that is independent and progressive in the Indian community. To make the matter clearer, I propose briefly to show what reforms Mr. Morley originally "adumbrated," to use his own phrase; what Simla has suggested; and what may still be done to make the reforms acceptable to the Indian people.

A. Adumbration.—In his speech on the Indian Budget, on June 5, 1907, Mr. Morley adumbrated certain proposals for a move in advance, including (1) the establishment of a Council of Notables; and (2) the expansion of the Legislative Councils in India. With regard to the Council of Notables, he observed that in 1877 Lord Lytton set up a Council of this kind, but it was a complete failure. The Council now proposed "would have a much wider scope." It "would be called together from time to time for the double purpose of eliciting independent opinion and diffusing what is really the most important thing of all—correct information as to the actions and intentions of the Government." In other words, it was to act as an interpreter between the rulers and the ruled; and to have "a much wider scope" than an hereditary Chamber.

B. Suggestion.—Such being the general objects of Mr. Morley's proposed move forward, it was left to the Viceroy in Council to suggest a scheme by which these objects should be carried out. And in the "Circular" from Simla of August 24, 1907, a scheme is set forth in considerable detail. Instead of a single "Council of Notables," indicated by Mr. Morley, they propose an "Imperial Advisory Council" for the Viceroy, and a "Provincial Advisory Council" for each of the provincial governments. This is clearly a move in the right direction. It is when the composition of these Councils comes in that Simla goes wrong. The Imperial Advisory Council, as proposed, is to consist of about sixty members, appointed by the Viceroy, including about twenty ruling chiefs and a certain number of territorial magnates. The suggested composition of the Provincial Advisory Councils is less definite; but the Imperial Councillors belonging to the Province are to form the nucleus of each Provincial Council, to whom are to be added representatives of "the smaller landholders, industry, commerce, capital, and the professional classes." Next as regards the expansion of the Legislative Councils. Briefly stated, the Imperial Legislative Council is to consist of fifty-four members, including the Viceroy. They are made up as follows:—Eight ex-officio members, including the Executive Council; twenty additional nominated officials; one ruling chief, nominated by the Viceroy; two members elected by the Chambers of Commerce of Calcutta and Bombay; seven elected by the non-official members of Provincial Legislative Councils; seven by nobles and great land-owners; two by Mohammedans; four non-officials nominated by the Viceroy to represent minorities or special interests, not less than two to be Mohammedans; and two experts nominated by the Viceroy. As regards the Provincial Legislative Councils, it is left to the local governments to determine how many seats are to be filled by elected representatives; and an elaborate system is suggested under which, in substitution of the existing simple franchise, the electoral power will be given, according to race, caste, and religion, to classes and groups formed at the discretion of the authorities. A consideration of these particulars fully justifies the misgivings of the reformers. The saving clause is that these proposals are declared to be "entirely provisional and suggestive." So there is still room for repentance.

C. Realisation.—Such being the adumbration of Mr. Morley, and such being the suggestion of Simla, how will the project of reform materialise? The process by which the ultimate decision will be reached has been clearly stated by Mr. Morley in his speech on Dr. Rutherford's amendment on the Address. That amendment condemned the "present proposals of the Government of India as being inadequate to allay the existing and growing discontent" in India; and Mr. Morley said:—

"I will repeat what I said in the debate on the Indian Budget as to how the case stands. The Government of India sent over to the India Office their proposals—their various schemes for Advisory Councils, and so forth. We at the India Office subjected them to a careful scrutiny and laborious examination. As a result of this careful scrutiny and examination, they were sent back to the Government of India, with the request that they would submit them to discussion in various quarters. The instruction to the Government of India was that by the end of March, the India Office was to hear what the general view was at which the Government of India had themselves arrived upon all these plans, complexities, and important variations. We wanted to know what they would tell us. It will be for us to consider how far the report so arrived at, how far these proposals, ripened by Indian opinion, carried out the policy which His Majesty's Government had in view. Surely that is a reasonable and simple way of proceeding."

To me it appears most reasonable and simple. Mr. Morley has not expressed approval of any part or portion of the Simla scheme. What he did by his telegram of August 23, 1907, was to authorise the Government of India to consult local governments, and to invite public opinion on the whole subject; thus giving Indian reformers the opportunity not only of criticising the Simla proposals, but of submitting alternative proposals for carrying out the objects in view; and allowing them six good months to do this; the six months including the session of the Indian National Congress, which is always held at Christmas time. The final decision he reserved for himself. The test will be whether or not the proposals carry out the policy of His Majesty's Government—that is, a policy of progressive and sympathetic reform. By this test proposals must stand or fall.

As regards the spirit in which this policy will be applied to India we have the declarations of Mr. Morley in 1906 in his speech on the Indian Budget. Speaking of the claims of Indian reformers, he said:—

"I do not see or hear demands for violent or startling new departures. What I do see is a stage reached in the gradual and inevitable working out of Indian policy, which makes it wise and in the natural order of things that we should advance with a firm, courageous, and intrepid step, some paces further on the path of continuous, rational improvement in the Indian system of Government. . . . You cannot go on narrowly on the old lines. We should be untrue to all the traditions of this Parliament, and to those who from time to time, and from generation to generation, have been the leaders of the Liberal Party, if we were to show ourselves afraid of facing and recognising the new spirit with candour and consideration."

And he added:—

"I only want the House to know that we are in earnest in the direction I have indicated."

Now as to practical action. There is, I believe, a pithy Sanskrit saying, "Ta Ga," equivalent to our proverb that we should strike when the iron is hot; and I strongly urged my Indian friends that, at the Indian National Congress, they should concentrate themselves on this project of constitutional reform, focussing Indian public opinion; not only denouncing the defects of the Simla proposals, but submitting to the Viceroy, on behalf of the Congress, a well-considered scheme which would satisfy Mr. Morley's conditions, and be a real step in national progress. Such an authoritative representation could not have failed to influence the Government of India in making their further report to England, and it would have served as the basis of the pleadings when the case comes on for hearing and final decision in the court of the Secretary of State.

Unfortunately such a course was not pursued. But this only makes it the more necessary that the case for the people of India should, during the next two months, be clearly and effectually placed before the Secretary of State, the two Houses of Parliament, and the British public. And for this purpose it is indispensable that India should send to England accredited representatives, men of weight and experience. English friends will, of course, do their best. And, so far as general principles are concerned, it will not be difficult to show that the Simla proposals, as they now stand, must fail when tried by the standard set up by Mr. Morley. Whereas he calls for progress, these proposals spell retrogression; whereas he desires expansion, these proposals involve contraction; whereas the forward movement, recognised and welcomed by Mr. Morley, is the work of the educated and independent classes, the effect of the proposals would be to exclude the "intellectuals" from the positions of public influence which they now occupy. These general considerations are self-evident. But, at the same time, it is absolutely essential that here, at the seat of power, the facts should be stated at first hand, and Indian feelings and aspirations effectually voiced by Indians trusted and duly accredited by their fellow countrymen.

W. WEDDERBURN.

Science.

THE NEW BOTANY.

NOR so very many years ago botany, always regarded as a study eminently suitable for young ladies, consisted for the most part in carefully collecting, drying, and naming wild plants, which were then neatly fastened to sheets of paper. A botany book was essentially a catalogue of flora, rendered suitable for the young by a judicious intermixture of texts or verses of poetry; a good botanist was one who knew a large number of plants. After a time, however, this method went out of fashion, and the real botanist was he who was most intimately acquainted with the details of plant structure. Under this régime the name of the plant greatly diminished in importance, and we were taught to speak only of "types"; of these selected types the structure was studied ad nauseam, but it was essential that they should be both dead and pickled. Flowers, the only interesting parts to the older systematists, we were taught to abandon to the poets and the young ladies, as having on the whole a distinctly unscientific appearance. Only such parts as could be described by terms like prosenchyma, parenchyma, and so forth were of genuine scientific value. This method, so well adapted to the needs of the examiner, is still with us, but there are abundant signs of a coming change; we are beginning to learn to look at the plant, no less than at the animal, as a living creature, and as interesting because alive. The study of function, of the relations of organism to one another and to their surroundings, this is in essence modern botany.

Every shift of standpoint in the scientific world means a change in terminology, means the use of words which to the outsider are apt to seem mere foolish argot. The sociologist may, however, perhaps derive some satisfaction from the discovery that the latest botanical slang is the use of the word "association," which is constantly on our lips and in our papers. The exact significance is interesting. We know that if, geologically speaking, the present condition of things is but of yesterday, yet from the standpoint of existing species it has been of age-long duration. Space is limited, reproduction is rapid, how may the fittest survive? First, no doubt, by the ruthless extirpation of rivals, the method perhaps over-emphasised in the early days of the Darwinian theory; and second, by the method of co-operation, of mutual adjustment. For example, in the woods in many parts of Britain the ground in spring is carpeted with the wild hyacinth or bluebell. Recently a study of the life conditions of these plants in a particular wood has been undertaken, and it was found that although in spring it seems as if the hyacinth alone formed the undergrowth, yet, in point of fact, it shared the ground with bracken fern and creeping soft grass. The older school would say at once that hyacinth, fern, and grass are competitors and enemies, each striving to oust the other from its share of space, light, and food. But the detailed investigation showed that this was not so, that there seemed to be very little rivalry in the case. The grass is shallow-rooted, and contents itself with the surface layer of leaf-mould and vegetable earth, the presence of its roots in this layer being probably a direct advantage to the deeper-rooted plants below. The next layer of the soil, a sandy loam in the case investigated, was occupied by the roots and root-stocks of the bracken, while below, in the clay, the roots of the bluebell make their home. Further, these roots have a very curious contractile mechanism, which always forces them deeper into the earth as time goes on. Grass, bracken, and bluebell, therefore, form what we call an "association"; that is, a group of plants adapted to similar external conditions, and able to live together because of this common fitness, and because they can mutually adapt themselves to one another. Between the three species mentioned, competition in the strict sense does not exist, and probably all thrive better for their association.

Investigations now going on are greatly increasing the number of such associations, and are showing us that the old catalogue method of describing also the flora of a locality is wholly wrong, it is not the species which is the unit, but the group, the association. In course of time we shall doubtless be able to classify all the chief associations, and even now considerable progress has been made. We know that special groups of plants live on heather moors, on mountain pastures, in hedgerows, in oak woods, and so on.

But the method is doing something more than this for us. An association is a group of plants having a common fitness for some particular set of external conditions, conditions which in the general case can be analysed into factors of soil and factors of climate. Of the two, the climatic factors seem in the general case to be less important than the soil factors. Now, the soil is determined for the most part by the characters of the underlying rocks, and the characters either of soil or of rocks can only be investigated by specially trained observers, with a considerable amount of apparatus, while almost everyone can learn rapidly to recognise the commoner plants. If, then, the new school of botanists can draw up lists of associations characteristic of all the main types of soil, we may all learn to recognise the different kinds by the presence of particular groups of plants. For example, there is evidence that ash-woods, the ash being associated with certain subordinate plants, tends to occur on limestone wherever this rock occurs at a comparatively low level, that is within the tree limit. If, then, we find a part of Great Britain where the gullies are filled with ash, while the uplands are grass-covered, we can generally conclude that the rocks of this region are limestone.

Again, heather will not as a rule grow over limestone, and therefore the uplands of the Pennine range are mostly grass-covered, while the schists and gneisses of the Highlands of Scotland are heather-clad. But everyone who knows the hilly parts of Yorkshire and Westmorland has seen the unexpected appearance of heather in regions where most of the land is covered with the scanty limestone pasture. The reason is that wherever a deposit of glacial clay lies over the limestone, and thus checks the naturally free drainage, peat tends to accumulate, and in the peat the heather finds a suitable growing-place. The difference between the extensive heather moors of the Scottish Highlands and the mountain pastures of the hilly parts of Westmorland have produced enormous sociological differences in the history of the two regions, and similar differences may be discerned in many other regions. That these differences are ultimately due to the geological structure, and that therefore geology, to a large extent, determines the history and development of a country, is a point that the geologists have always emphasised, but that the geological differences may be deduced from the plant covering is a new point, and one of great importance. We have already pointed out that the lesson of the plant-covering is more easily read than that of the rocks, and one should notice that, except in the relatively rare cases where the rocks are bare, it is the plant-covering which forms the most obvious difference between the regions of the earth's surface. An obvious objection is, of course, that in an old country like Britain the natural plant-covering has been destroyed over a great part of the area, which is mostly covered by cultivated plants. But the botanists have not ignored this fact, and they are showing that the particular types of cultivated plants are intimately related to rock structure and to climate, and that also in many regions the fact that certain tracts of land are capable of cultivation shows that the soil is of a particular nature. In brief, the new botany is lending already invaluable aid to the rational study of geography. Already a number of beautiful vegetation maps have been constructed, on the basis of plant associations, and, in Scotland especially, where the conditions are relatively simple, such maps give a striking picture both of the natural covering and of the underlying rocks. Theoretically, a map should convey to the trained observer a picture of the actual country which it represents, and the students of plant associations are bringing our maps nearer and nearer this ideal.

The Drama.

THE PRIMITIVES.

I do not think that it is possible for an English playgoer to do full justice to the company of Sicilian players who are now filling the Shaftesbury Theatre. Even if by nature he is not too reserved, his experience will have spoiled him. He is unaccustomed to see anything so fresh, so elemental; his stage world is laden with faded sentiment, with heavy artifices, contrived so as to give him false ideas even of the very limited life with which it is concerned. When the subject is sensual, as in "Dear Old Charlie," the treatment is simply unfeeling. When the material is romantic, as in Mr. Max Pemberton's play about Kronstadt and English governesses, the handling of it is ridiculous.

The Sicilians have little to do with this kind of existence. They dress like moderns—even like moderns from Whitechapel, who, indeed, derive both their trousers (and a little of their vocabulary) from the Spanish sources to which the Sicilians go—and they talk Sicilian argot. But they seem to belong to a younger world than ours, even though they come from a society still visibly linked to an older civilisation, and though their most characteristic drama connects itself in the mind's eye with a famous classical theme. As you watch them, you find yourself feeling about them as you would feel about children—namely that whatever the characters they represent do, be it bad or good, comes from the heart, and is the unforced, the inevitable, expression of their minds and beliefs. Their whole surroundings are childlike, and seem to excite in them joy, or sorrow, or anger, or desire as quickly and inevitably as those emotions affect the passionate, capricious, uncontrollable society of boys and girls. Literature now and then gives you this effect of life; but not even brilliant studies of the wild primitive nature, such as Hawthorne's Donatello, yield so powerful an impression as the stage talk and action of these players. As against the fully civilised man, who conceals his emotions—from fear, prudence, shyness, self-respect, or self-consciousness, these remarkable artists shew you men and women who conceal nothing, who, like Shylock's Jew, really bleed when they are pricked, laugh when they are tickled, revenge when they are wronged.

An especially pleasing result of this kind of art is that the Sicilian company play together as no London company plays. One artist, if not as important as another, is as serious and as absorbed as his neighbour. I see that some critics are dissatisfied with the behaviour of the crowd. I cannot imagine anything more vivid and animated, more suggestive of human relationships. All the action goes with a swing. The crowd laugh, scream, dance, pray, as if they were one. When they weep they wipe their eyes, men and women alike; when they kiss, they kiss with simple over-flowing delight. The slightest action is made significant, so that a girl, carrying a bundle at the back of the stage, pauses to throw a nod and a smile at a group of women in the foreground busy with the family linen, and thus makes her appearance, though it is only for a moment of time, an event in the drama, an addition to its colour and movement. This is especially agreeable, because it gives the true impression about the life of the poor. That life, both on its darker and its brighter side, is lived in common, contrasting strongly with the isolation of the well-to-do classes, who unite, as a rule, for interests, but are divided into select groupings by social choice and habit. By such means the artistic effect is greatly enhanced. On the London stage the minor characters are ruthlessly sacrificed to the star, and become, for the most part, mere drudges in his service, embroidery to his splendour. But each artist among the Sicilians seems to feel that he has an important and dignified part to fill.

Another unwonted sensation which the Sicilian company afford is the sincerity of their method. The subject of "Malia," the play which I have seen, is that of the "Hippolytus," though less dreadful—that of a woman filled with a perverted love, against her will, against all the pieties of life, against her own rational affection for the man of her choice. I find the scene in which Madame Aguglia depicts the breaking of this storm in the bosom rather grossly described by some of the critics. I did not find it revolting, in the sense in which it shocks the sensitive souls who received "Dear Old Charlie" without a tremor. It was clear that Madame Aguglia was acting what her friends take her frenzy to mean—a form of diabolic possession, and not merely a love ecstasy. This is the intention and continuous suggestion of the play. It is in keeping with its main idea, and is clearly indicated in the title, "Malia," or "Witchcraft." It is understood in Iana's frantic appeals to the Virgin, her agonised bendings and writhings before the Madonna's picture, her gabbled prayers, her voice hoarse and strained with emotion. It reveals itself in a flood of blasphemy, when the girl is borne before the sacred image in the pageant of the Immaculate Conception, ending in the physical contortions of an epileptic fit. Very violent and primitive no doubt. But devils are not supposed to come in and go forth without a rending and tearing of the mortal flesh that they inhabit. Iana is "possessed," as Phædra is possessed, allowing for the difference between a sophisticated conception and a picture of a child of nature. She can show a healthy feeling for her accepted lover, as the lawless feeling begins to subside. Coarse and rough such work may be called. But it is honest, and it is in keeping with the accessories of the play, which suggest the dualism of the popular religion among the Southern Latins, the struggle between the un pitying gods of the pagan underworld, and the kindlier deities of the new faith.

It is, however, the humanity of these Italian players which is so refreshing. They talk with their hands, like all Southerners; but our actors have much to learn from them in the conduct of a drama of vivid action. Ease never deserts them. They are always dignified and in earnest, always full of their business. All the bye-comedy—the adoration of the Virgin, the cunning and superstitious seriousness of the pedlar with the sacred medal—is admirable. The result is, as I have said, that, splendid and powerful as is the dramatic equipment of a great artist, like Signor Grasso—one of the greatest I have ever seen—the audience loses the artificial distinction between one player and another, which the vanity of our actor-managers imposes, and perceives the effort of the entire company in unity and due subordination. Thus the dramatic illusion is almost perfect, and the emotional effect is singularly intense. It is obtained by adopting true, simple, natural methods of interpretation instead of those false, complicated, unnatural means that prevail on our stage.

M.

Poetry.

LOOKING EASTWARDS.

THE sacred bell of high Fiesole
Called the Etruscan ghosts to speech with me.
Evening, whom one might picture as a maid
With burning eyes and limbs of Southern shade,
Slept on the plain, and gave her soul to dreams.
I heard a thousand little secret streams,
As though the hill were laughing: that one hour
The Earth lay calm and open, like a flower.
But I was lonely when the night winds came,
And feared the ghosts that called me by my name.
Not they could weave a memory with mine,
And store it for dark years, when aged wine
Brings to old men their olden thoughts again.
I must still wander: wandering is sweet pain.
Far, far away some brown mysterious priest
Holds the arcana of the timeless East,
And further yet are isles where I would be,
Poised like red lilies on the Austral sea.

JAMES FLECKER.

The World of Books.

THURSDAY EVENING.

A PROMISING work on military history to be published by Mr. John Lane is "Dumouriez and the Defence of England against Napoleon," by Dr. J. Holland Rose and Mr. A. M. Broadley. The career of Dumouriez is full of interest. Carlyle calls him "one of Heaven's Swiss," and M. Sorel's verdict that for him "the Revolution was not the regeneration of humanity but a career," is a harsh but on the whole just estimate of his character. Imprisoned in the Bastille by Louis XV., he became the principal director of the Jacobin Club, but accepted office from Louis XVI. Later he served under the Directory with brilliant success, until, hearing that he had come under suspicion, he deserted to the Austrians, and in 1804 took refuge in England. He frequently gave advice to the British Government on military affairs, and drew up a scheme of defence against invasion, portions of which are still preserved in the Record Office. The coming work is based on Dumouriez's holograph copy of the whole project, which was recovered by chance some years ago in London. It will also deal with other projects of national defence, and unpublished letters by George III., Pitt, Nelson, and Dumouriez himself will be included.

* * *

BUCKLE described the union of the French with the English intellect as "by far the most important fact in the history of the eighteenth century." The visits made to England by such men as Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau played a great part in promoting an intellectual understanding between the two countries, and Professor Churton Collins's book, "Voltaire, Montesquieu, and Rousseau in England," which will be issued by Mr. Eveleigh Nash, is certain to throw fresh light on the way in which English ideas influenced those three writers of genius. Mr. Morley points out that Voltairism may be said to have begun from the flight of its founder to England, and M. Joseph Texte declares that Rousseau's greatest work was in part an imitation of Richardson's "Clarissa," while another French critic describes Montesquieu's "Esprit des Lois" as a eulogy of the British Constitution. In a previous book Professor Collins dealt with Voltaire's visit to England, and he has since accumulated much fresh material, including some hitherto unpublished matter.

* * *

THE announcement that Mr. Werner Laurie is about to publish "Fights Forgotten: The History of some of the Chief English and American Prize-Fights," by John Sayers, calls to mind an anecdote told by Mr. Birrell in his charming essay on George Borrow. "A gentle lady," he says, "bred amongst the Quakers, a hater of physical force, with eyes brimful of mercy, was lately heard to say, in heightened tones, at a dinner table, where the subject of momentary conversation was a late prize-fight: 'Oh! pity was it that ever corruption should have crept in amongst them.' 'Amongst whom?' inquired her immediate neighbour. 'Amongst the bruisers of England,' was the terrific rejoinder." Those who share this admiration for the heroic days of English pugilism will enjoy reading "Fights Forgotten," since it deals with such champions of the ring as Bendigo, Sayers, Belcher, the Game Chicken, Jackson, Slavin, and three others who are thus described by Borrow: "Can the rolls of English aristocracy," he says, in a famous passage, "exhibit names belonging to more noble, more heroic men than those who were called respectively—Pearce, Cribb, and Spring?"

* * *

A VOLUME of "Essays Political and Biographical," by the late Sir Spencer Walpole, is in the press, and will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin. Among the subjects treated are "The History of the Cabinet," "The Causes of the American Civil War," "Sidney, Earl of Godolphin," "Lord Halifax," "Lord Granville," "Madame de Lieven," "George Crabbe," "Frank Buckland," and "The Dining Societies of London." The book will contain a memoir written by Sir Spencer Walpole's daughter, Mrs. Francis Holland.

AMONG Mr. Edward Arnold's spring announcements is a new book. "From Their Point of View," by Miss Martha Loane. Miss Loane's former volumes, "The Queen's Poor," and "The Next Street but One," showed great power of understanding and interpreting the mental outlook and ideas of the poorer classes both in town and country, so that her coming book will be read with interest. The same publishers announce a new and cheaper edition of "Turkey in Europe," containing additional chapters and notes which deal with recent events. In particular, there is a discussion of the probable effect of the railways now in contemplation. In this edition Sir Charles Eliot's name will appear for the first time instead of "Odysseus" upon the title-page.

* * *

THE development of German sea-power, "past, present, and prospective," is the subject of "The Admiralty of the Atlantic," by Mr. P. Hislam, which Messrs. Longmans are to publish early this season. The book is said to contain authentic details of works which Germany intends to carry out on her North Sea Coast, and such questions as the best means of counteracting German maritime ambitions and the future development of British shipbuilding policy are also discussed. The volume comes at an opportune moment since the questions raised by Mr. Hislam are among the gravest of present international problems.

* * *

NEXT month Mr. Murray will issue a very full and carefully prepared biography of Catherine of Bragança, in which the author, Miss L. C. Davidson, attempts to clear that unhappy queen from some of the misrepresentations that have clouded her memory. The Court life of Charles II. is described from original sources, and such notorious personages as Nell Gwynn, Louise de Querouaille, and the Duchess of Cleveland figure largely in Miss Davidson's pages.

* * *

OUR spring announcement number was issued a little early, and two or three publishers had not completed their lists in time for insertion. Messrs. Hodder & Stoughton's books for the season include "My Father: An Aberdeenshire Minister, 1812-1891," by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, which, considering Dr. Nicoll's great powers of style and analysis, should be very interesting; "The Tragedy of Korea," by Angus Hamilton; "Unforegone Conclusions," by Lady Gordon; "Holland Sketches," by Edward Penfield; "A Journey into the Occult," by Beckles Willson; "Little Rivers," by Henry Van Dyke; several volumes in "The Useful Knowledge Library," "The Great Artists Series," and "The Thin Paper Classics;" and novels by John Oxenham, Harold Begbie, S. R. Crockett, Frank T. Bullen, W. Pett Ridge, Charles Garvice, and others.

* * *

AMONG the more interesting of the books to be issued by Messrs. Constable are "New Worlds for Old," by H. G. Wells; "The North-West Passage," by Ronald Amundsen; "My School and My Gospel" by Sir Herbert von Herkomer; "A History of the Volunteer Forces," by Cecil Sebag Montefiore; "Elizabethan Drama," by Felix E. Schelling; "A Short History of Engraving and Etching," by A. M. Hind; "The Later Years of Catherine de Medici," by Edith Sichel; and "Portuguese Architecture," by W. Crum Watson. The same firm will publish novels by Mary Johnston, Howard Pease, Robert W. Chambers, John Ayscough, Constance Smedley, and Ellen Glasgow.

* * *

BOOKS TO BE READ:—

- "Memoirs of Eight Parliaments." By Henry W. Lucy. (Heinemann. 8s. 6d. net.)
- "The Romance of George Villiers, First Duke of Buckingham." By Philip Gibbs. (Methuen. 15s. net.)
- "Fynes Moryson's Travels." (Maclehose, 4 vols. 50s. net.)
- "Fifty Years of Modern Painting: Corot to Sargent." By J. E. Pythian. (Grant Richards. 10s. 6d. net.)
- "Wycliffe and the Lollards." By J. C. Carrick. The World's Epoch-makers. (T. & T. Clark. 3s. net.)
- "Joseph Redorn." By J. J. Bell. (Hodder & Stoughton. 6s.)
- "Les Légendes Epiques: Recherches sur la Formation des Chansons de Geste." I.—Le Cycle de Guillaume d'Orange. Par J. Bédier. (Paris: Champion. 8 fr.)
- "La Jeune Italie et la Jeune Europe." Lettres inédites de Joseph Mazzini à Louise-Amédée Melegari. (Paris: Fischbacher. 3 fr. 50.)
- "Madame de Montespan et la Légende des Poisons." Par Jean Lemoine. (Paris: Leclerc. 10 fr.)
- "Fille de Reine," Roman. Par Louis Letaing. (Paris: Calmann-Lévy. 3 fr. 50.)

Art.

BEAUTIES AT THE NEW GALLERY.

THE International Society has organised an Exhibition of Fair Women pictures at the New Gallery, but if anyone expects a feast of feminine loveliness, he or she will be disappointed. As a matter of fact, nobody who is acquainted with the character of the exhibitions of the International will expect anything of the kind. The Society is composed of very modern painters; and the very modern painter does not aim at beauty, or at least not at the kind of beauty that is readily understood. There are, indeed, a few pictures of fair women at the New Gallery, which are in accordance with established notions of attractiveness in women. But the majority provoke a very different sensation from, let us say, a gallery of Gainsboroughs. The visitor should make up his mind to this, for otherwise he will find only irony in the title of fair women, as it applies to three-quarters of the exhibits. Having made up his mind that it is not to be taken literally, he may reasonably expect some pleasure from his visit, provided that he will put himself in sympathy with the ambitions of the exhibitors. What the modern painter aims at is a decorous arrangement in colour, a skilful juxtaposition of tones, a composition in which the lines fall harmoniously. What he thinks in is terms of colour and line and form; and what he thinks of is not the beauty of his subject but the beauties of his craft. The spectator must, to a large extent, be disposed to think with him, or he had better stay away.

It is true that the fair women here are not entirely the creations of members of the International or even of living artists. Half the interest, indeed, of the Exhibition may be found in the works of dead masters. There are four by the late G. F. Watts, including the life-size "Hon. Mrs. Wyndham"; two mistily mysterious portrait studies by Eugène Carrière; a "Lady at the Piano," by Alfred Stevens, as wondrously wrought to a finish as a Sandys, and a gem of the same painter's skill, the recumbent "Lady in White." Burne-Jones, D. G. Rossetti, and Ford Madox Brown are all represented by minor examples, and from the brush of Arthur Melville comes a strong example of his Japanese phase—"The White Piano," a canvas loaded with deep colour and as flat as his mature water-colour work was full of the suggestion of modelling. A famous Millais portrait, that of Mrs. James Stern, is one of three more or less important examples of that painter's solid finished craftsmanship; though we cannot help remembering with greater affection the Millais of the black and white drawings, as he is recalled to us by a few drawings in the South Room. Here, also, are some dainty specimens of Whistler, Du Maurier, and Ingres. Of the two large pictures by Charles Furse, "The Lilac Gown," wholly delectable in colour, is to be preferred to the other, "Portrait of a Woman," who might be described as tallness topped by livid, heavy-eyed tragedy—the tragedy, may be, of a woman who was once fair. A greater rarity is the little and early picture by Corot of "A Young Lady Playing the Mandoline"; a dry, scholarly essay this, but not without charm. Very interesting, too, is the "Portrait of Madame Hélène C.," by Monticelli, with its faint far-away flavour of Rembrandt in the liquid golden-brown tones. It is a beautiful and also rather pathetic example of an impetuous and erratic master, marking, as it were, a pause in the midst of a riotous production of fêtes galantes, a sudden seriousness, or effort at seriousness, among much that, if gorgeous beyond one's dreams, is hasty and insincere. Even here there are symptoms of hurry in the execution; the work lacks the incomparable unity achieved by the great Dutch master; the dignity is a little less dignified. Monticelli's capacity for taking pains did not carry him to the end of the road that a truly great picture has to traverse in its making. His works are priceless for the delight they give as treasures of the colour house. No one could so easily command an instantaneous advantage over the senses. But few artists in the front rank were less capable of converting that advantage into a victory.

These past masters, however, are only the flotsam that has floated into the sea of art represented by the moderns, and to follow them further would be to drift away from the main purpose, which is the consideration of this Exhibition as a collection of fair women. It is a little difficult not to drift. The character and interest of the pictures, apart from their subjects, are so many and so various. Again occurs the question of what constitutes a fair woman in Art, and why. There are works here by brilliant young painters of the New English Art Club, and others, which suggest that beauty is really ugliness decked out in the fripperies of a technical skill, and that a music-hall posture is the incarnation of grace. This is hardly the place to deal with these aesthetic paradoxes; but if one may be allowed a personal preference, the fantastic ladies in Aubrey Beardsley's illustrations to "Salome," with their suggestion of the infernal, have greater claims to be considered fair than the realistic hoydens of Mr. Orpen and Mr. John. The fairness of the former may be of a wholly evil kind, but it is at least a perceptible quality. It may be even repulsive, but repulsiveness, carried to extremes, as in the British bull dog, may provoke a perverted aesthetic pleasure. We do not suggest that the New English Art Club should go to even plainer models in the hopes of making their paradoxes truths, for such a course would be disastrous. We are merely speaking of the scheme of the present exhibition as a beauty show; and to such a scheme the Beardsley illustrations, irrespective of their abstract beauty of line, their moral or immoral qualities, are better fitted than more material representations.

Putting aside slatterns in colour and female devils in black and white, we may discover some of the other beauties of this art of the New Gallery. Mr. Sargent has painted some of the prettiest of Society women, and no fewer than five important works in oil and four in charcoal represent his talent. The largest is the group "Lady Elcho, Lady Tennant, and Mrs. Adeane," which was so recently seen at the Academy that no further word is necessary. The five portraits and portrait studies by Mr. W. Nicholson are less familiar, and constitute a welcome feature of the Exhibition. His subjects are handsome; they possess an aristocratic self-possession, rather reminiscent of old Spain; and his treatment has a refinement, even a reverence, that is wholly absent from Mr. Sargent's. It would be unjust to say that if a woman's fairness can survive Mr. Sargent's treatment, it can survive anything, but the test—to the untutored eye which, after all, is the eye a portrait painter has to consider most—is severe. MM. Besnard and Blanche are the principal modernists of the French School; but the flair of their productions, their prodigious inventiveness, their glitter and sparkle, grow dim besides two unpretentious half-length portraits by Fantin Latour. For in these a serene beauty of craftsmanship is wedded to the introspective faculty that probes a subject to its inner depths. Of the two the portrait of Miss Budget is the warmer scheme; the unknown "Portrait de Femme," middle-class, middle-aged, has the cool beauty of the twilight. But both share equally the artist's finest achievement, the perfect fitness of the means to the subject, an aesthetic beauty in itself. In the latter especially the colour exactly expresses the sentiment, that of youth with the bloom just dimmed, of strength with its exuberant energy just gone, of beauty with the sparkle off its surface, leaving bare and clear the beauty of the soul, the solid, satisfying beauty. No pampered Society woman this, but one whose hands have done useful work. Note their artful and loving painting, with the light falling as gently upon them as it ever fell on the petals of the artist's well-loved flowers.

We had forgotten Mr. Harrington Mann, whose vivacious picture of Mrs. Evelyn Thaw is one of the sensations, and Renoir, whose famous "Portrait de Madame M.," is a somewhat faded glory of the Exhibition, but retains its simple sincerity. There is also Bonnat's "Portrait de Madame Edouard Kann," less beautiful than elegant in its stately Orientalism; French portraiture tends always to regard elegance as beauty. Carolus Duran has two canvasses, the earlier of which, a "Portrait de Madame Henri Fouquié," was painted back in the 'seventies, and carries a striking likeness to Bonnat's work. And there are other works, Italian, French, English, which can boast of few technical beauties and no human ones, which offer us for the élan of femininity the fascination of a bootjack, which have escaped the slime of insipidity to fall into the slough of brutality. But there is not a great deal to find fault with, after one has found the title "Fair Women" a misnomer.

Letters to the Editor.

ECCLESIASTICAL QUESTIONS IN PARLIAMENT.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I cannot help thinking that there is a fundamental mistake underlying all the speeches and projects of the debate of the 14th inst. in the House of Commons. It is this—that the Church is a body separate from the rest of mankind, and occupied primarily with public worship. Would anyone imagine, from reading the debate, that the Founder of the Church never said a single word to his followers about public worship? Yet such is the fact. And now we find the representatives of the Christian nation debating about the details of public worship, and assuming that this is the primary, if not the sole, ratio essendi of the Church. What, I ask, was really primary in the Master's teaching? Certainly goodness, justice, and beneficence. The faith which He claimed as due to Himself was the trust of men associated for these purposes in a leader who was the highest example and inspirer of these virtues. Public worship comes in as a help to this faith; but as soon as it is dissociated from the ethical contents of this allegiance to the Just One, as it was very notably in the recent debate, it becomes nugatory. A hundred sayings of Christ may be quoted in which the saying of "Lord, Lord," is contrasted with justice and beneficence.

What follows? Why, certainly this—that the primary object of the Church is to carry out measures of justice and beneficence, and that all who have to do with Church affairs should hold it rigorously to these objects. To tell me, therefore, that the nation has nothing to do with Church affairs is to tell me that it has nothing to do with justice and beneficence. But I maintain that the whole object of national government is precisely this—to carry into effect these great practical principles. This is the teaching of the Prayer Book, which makes "righteousness and holiness of life," and not ecclesiastical ceremonies, to be the true worship of God. It is also the meaning of the Royal or National Supremacy—namely, that the real moral needs of the nation must always stand first, and ecclesiastical details be subordinate to them.

If this be admitted, then there is no absurdity in the fact that men who differ on the details of public worship or of Christian thought should have their part in ruling the Church or judging its course. Moreover, the tendency of ecclesiastical teaching has of late years set steadily towards the promotion of social justice and well-being. Also, the justice and beneficence and raising of the poor, which is primary in Christianity, has been the object of our legislation, especially in the view of the Liberal Party; and it is clear that the measures by which this legislation is enforced need Christian principle for their support. I think I see symptoms that the next great wave of religious development will be one which will tend, not to the separation of the sacred and the secular, but to the blending of them into unity; and that, not so much by rigorous discipline as by the convictions of the ministers of religion and their respect for the feelings of others, in order that the nation may be at one in the promotion of Christian righteousness and social good.—Yours, &c.

W. H. FREMANTLE.

The Deanery, Ripon, February 21st, 1908.

METHODS OF PROPAGANDA.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I call your attention to the enclosed leaflet, "Socialism is Atheism," with reference to your last week's review of Mr. Arnold Forster's "English Socialism of To-day"? You say: "By a certain section of the Conservative Party it has been decided that it is 'good business' to fasten the charge of Socialism on to the present Government." The next step is to identify Socialism with Atheism, and by so doing to declare every supporter of the present Government to be an avowed enemy of God.

This is how it is done. The Primrose League holds meetings in Church-rooms, with the open support of the clergy. These meetings are followed by a house-to-house distribution of leaflets. (The sheaf containing this one was left at my door by a choir-boy.) This is quite enough to give the guarantee of the Church in the opinion of villagers.

Does the Church really desire the next election (local or general) to divide orthodox sheep from heretical goats? Are "Atheist!" and "Believer!" (with appropriate adjectives) to be bandied between neighbours who hold different opinions as to the nationalisation of railroads?

What does the Church care? What does the Conservative Party care? It is "good business."—Yours, &c.

D. C. PEDDER.

Applegarth, Ogbourne St. George,
Marlborough,

February 24th, 1908.

LIBERAL DEFEATS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—May I suggest that the explanation of the recent Liberal defeats is to be found in Socialism and the Hull declaration?

The average elector of to-day is own child of his ancestor in the days of the French Revolution. Tell him that Socialism and Liberalism are poles asunder, and he says, "Well, but the Tories are a bit farther off still," and it is that "bit farther off" that counts in the polling booth. His view would certainly be strengthened if he read the articles in THE NATION over the initials "J. A. H.," who evidently agrees with the statement reiterated at every Tory meeting, viz., that the difference between Liberalism and the views of Mr. Victor Grayson is one merely of degree and not of kind.

May I offer the following short remarks on "J. A. H.'s" last article?

1. "J. A. H." fails to perceive that, once concede a wage beyond the economic value of the labour as a moral right and not as a charity on the part of the State, you cannot stop at any particular figure, but give away the whole case against Socialism.

2. As regards the percentage of unemployable among the unemployed, "J. A. H." ignores all authoritative experience: that staunch Liberal, Sir Hugh Bell's actual experience gives one employable to 106 unemployable (I quote from memory).

3. He strangely regards all members of a trades union as ipso facto employable.

4. He suggests differentiation of wages under certain circumstances in favour of married men with families: call it charity and I find no fault.

5. The silence of THE NATION and "J. A. H." on John Burns is eloquent. I write this because I am loth to see the history of the early part of last century repeat itself and the hands of the clock put back.—Yours, &c.,

A YORKSHIRE LIBERAL.

Yorkshire, February 10th, 1908.

THE LIBERAL PARTY AND VOTES FOR WOMEN.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—A large meeting of women, convened by the Women's Liberal Federation, recently passed a resolution calling upon the Government to bring in at all events a small measure of women's franchise during the present Parliament, and the same course was urged on Mr. Asquith a few days later by the deputation from the National Union of Suffrage Societies. These requests and the tactics of the "Suffragettes" all seem to be based on the assumption that it is the duty of the Liberal Government to carry out this reform at once. Writing as a Liberal woman, who believes that the woman taxpayer and ratepayer has every right to exercise the franchise, may I utter a protest against this view? My personal opinion is that the abolition of plural voting and of the lodger vote (the latter either by means of a revised "occupation" franchise or the establishment of adult suffrage) would be desirable preliminaries. But apart from this, who are pledged to the reform? The Government? Assuredly not. We know and have known for months that the Cabinet are not agreed even on the abstract principle. Government pledges are to be found, if anywhere, in Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman's speech at the Albert Hall in December, 1905, and in the election addresses of the present Ministry. In them we find promises (not yet all fulfilled) of educational reform, land reform, temperance reform, the maintenance of Free Trade, reduced expenditure, old age pensions—but of women's suffrage not one word. At the General Election the militant section of the Suffrage Party attacked several members of the present Government on the point, and they received no pledge. In any case, says the Suffragist, a majority of members of the House of Commons (belonging to all parties) are pledged to the reform. To what are they pledged? Not to force the Government to take up the question. In many cases the promise was to vote for a Suffrage Bill, presumably a private Bill, if introduced. In the same way many are "pledged" to Disestablishment, many to Home Rule, some to anti-vaccination, others to anti-vivisection. In this case also, the election address is a fair guide. It is a generous estimate to say that out of all the Liberal members at Westminster, ten made women's suffrage a prominent feature in their programme. As to the electorate, it would indeed be a delicate mathematical operation to determine what precise proportion of the votes cast for either Free Traders or Tariff Reformers were influenced in either direction by the hope or fear of feminine enfranchisement.

But Governments have brought forward, and will again bring forward, measures to which they are not definitely pledged. Are women of all classes so unanimously earnest for the franchise that a Government must add this reform to their already formidable list?

Some months ago a well-known supporter of Women's Suffrage declared that, though she had always been a Liberal, she was "a woman before she was a Liberal," and that if the present Government would not introduce a Bill, she would work for any party which took up her cause. As I read her speech I was at once reminded of the answer given shortly before by a tutor at a woman's college when asked to sign the petition of women graduates to the Premier: "No, I am strongly in favour of the suffrage, but I am a Liberal before I am a woman, and I want the Government to carry out their programme of reforms, without being worried over one to which they are not pledged." It is my strong impression, based upon a certain amount of experience in political work, that the large majority of women Liberals in the country are "Liberals before they are women," and do not wish to play for their own hand against the Government. Party loyalty does not mean to them slavish adherence to political formulæ, but the support of a party whose past record and present aims, both in administration and legislation, they believe are best calculated to advance the good of the whole nation, including men, women, and children of all classes and conditions. Many journalists, it seems, do not know that the secession of a number of Women's Liberal Associations from the Federation some years ago was largely due to the action of the Executive in making Women's Suffrage a test question at elections. As a result, the Women's National Liberal Association was formed, which leaves local branches and individual members free to act as they think best in this particular matter, though probably the majority are in favour of the suffrage. Among the branches of the Federation, too, are many members who, while willing to join any association which works for Liberalism, are by no means enthusiastic over the election test. As to Conservative women among my acquaintance, fully fifty per cent. are opposed to the reform, and some of their leading speakers and workers have openly declared against it—one with the confession that she is "fully satisfied with her own illimitable capacities for usefulness."

As to the deep-seated discontent which, we are told, exists among the mass of working women, it is so deep-seated as to be almost inarticulate. Out of all the millions of Englishwomen, less than 200,000 have signed suffrage petitions in the last few years. (The Chartist petition of 1848 had 2,000,000 genuine signatures, and yet the working classes had to wait for their Reform Bill till 1866.) I believe that the distinctly political women's associations will do more to create an effective demand for the vote than the suffrage societies. Any woman whose genuine interest in political and social reforms makes her desire to give expression to her views by means of the franchise, is a far more valuable adherent to the cause than one who has been excited by vague talk about the rights and wrongs of her sex and its superiority to the mere man.

Thus any Government which at the present time passed a Women's Suffrage Bill would be committing the dangerous experiment of enfranchising a large majority of uninformed and indifferent women at the demand of a small minority of earnest agitators. This, perhaps, would not be a serious matter if ignorance and indifference meant abstention from voting, but all who know anything of party organisation must feel assured that most of these enfranchised women would be brought to the poll at the next election, and that all the inducements of influence, private generosity, and what Professor Sidgwick once called "dishonest demagoguery" (not necessarily dishonest in intention or confined to any one party), would be brought to bear on their votes.

I need not dwell on the question of redistribution, which must necessarily follow such a measure, or on the difficulties connected with married women's qualifications. Nor, again, is the good or evil of such a reform here under consideration. Probably the result in either direction would be far less marked than advocates or opponents suppose. I merely wish to put this question to Liberal women throughout the country: Is it in accordance with political wisdom to enfranchise an indifferent majority at the demand of an earnest minority, or in accordance with political morality to introduce a sweeping change which has never been submitted to the judgment of the present electorate?—Yours, &c.,

WOMAN LIBERAL.

February 25th, 1908.

THE CRUX IN "THE TEMPEST."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—In "Notes and Queries," of April 20th last, Mr. Morton Luce drew attention to a possible source of the much-canvassed lines in "The Tempest," III., 1:—

"I forget;
Most busy, least when I do it."

which he found in Ovid, "Fasti," IV., 433-4:—

"Proeda puellares animos prolecat inanis, Et non sentitur sedulitate labor."

Dr. Furness, in his Variorum edition of the play, gives another citation, which was noted as far back as 1851 by an anonymous writer, namely, the famous saying of Scipio Africanus: "Nunquam se minus otiosum esse, quam cum otiosus," occurring in Cicero, "De Officiis," III., 1; and this, perhaps, may be held to approach nearer to the spirit of Shakespeare's thought than does Ovid's description of the desultory services undertaken by Persephone's female companions at her behest.

Quite recently, however, I chanced to come upon a passage which presents a still closer parallel, to my thinking; so close, indeed, as to suggest the probability of Shakespeare having had the Latin original actually in view. It is in Terence, "Heauton Timorumenos," 394-400, the pertinent portion of which I will make bold to put in italics.

BACCHIS.—Hoc beneficio utrique ab utrisque vero devincimini,
Ut nunquam ulla amoris vestra incidere possit calamitas.

ANTIPHILA.—Nescio alias: me quidem semper scio fecisse sedulo,
Ut ex illius commodo meum compararem commodum.

CLINIA.—Ah,
Ergo, mea Antiphila, tu nunc sola reducem me in patriam facis:
Nam dum abs te absum, omnes mihi labores fuisse quos cepi leves, Protes quam tui carendum quod erat.

The elder Colman long ago in his scholarly translation of Terence, took occasion to comment on certain passages where he was of opinion Shakespeare was indebted for sundry speeches in "Much Ado About Nothing," "Twelfth Night," "Othello," &c., and expressed his conviction that they were imitated directly from the Latin text, a belief that is shared by so recent an authority as Mr. Churton Collins, though the latter admits there was more than one English version at the time, which might have been laid under contribution by the poet. In the present case, as will be seen, the general similarity between the Athenian lovers, Clinia and Antiphila, and the Italian pair, Ferdinand and Miranda, is sufficiently obvious to give one pause; while the courtesan Bacchis serves as a becoming but convenient foil to enhance the spirituality of Antiphila's nature.

I imagine there is very little doubt at the present day as to the putative content of this evergreen Shakespearean crux: a very good summing-up is given in the Furness Variorum, where the editor, with great show of reason, decides that "it" refers back to "forget." Whether "busy least (lest)" or "busiliest" be adopted is still apparently a point of some debate. Professor Collins favours the latter (Studies in Shakespeare, c. viii.), which form, by the way, Furness demonstrates was first proposed in 1853 by the late Mr. J. O. Halliwell-Phillips, and not by the Scotsman Bullock, as is generally supposed. A better example of the emphatic superlative than "easiliest" ("Cymbeline," iv., 2), to which it has been compared, is Mark Antony's phrase, "the most unkindest cut of all," in "Julius Cæsar." This last shows the proposed emendation to be fully justified on linguistic grounds.—Yours, &c.,

N. W. HILL.

New York,
February 11th, 1908.

"ENGLAND AND MR. MEREDITH."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I gladly accept "A Dutchman's" correction. What he says about the popularity of Mr. Meredith in literary circles in Holland is the exception that proves my rule that his popularity is an English one. The Dutch, set at the meeting-place of Germany, France, and England, enrich their own national life by an intimate knowledge of what is best in their three neighbours; and by nature and tradition it comes to them to understand what is best in England almost, if not altogether, as well as the English themselves.—Yours, &c.,

G. M. TREVELYAN.

2, Cheyne Gardens, S.W.,
February 21st, 1908.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—Mr. John Bright, in dealing on one occasion with the religious difficulty in primary education, used the following pertinent words: "In the middle classes we do not ask what religion a boy or girl is to be taught when they go to school. Why should we be so desperately anxious about the religious teaching of the working classes?"

Though a Tory and a Churchman, I commend this quotation to the disputants in the education controversy of to-day, as pointing to an inconsistency in conduct and in argument, from which they would seem to be no freer than were those whom Mr. Bright rebuked.—Yours, &c.,

W. G. H. G.

The Temple,
February 26th, 1908.

THE BLASPHEMY LAWS.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—The two chief reasons for the absence of numerous protests against the late prosecution for blasphemy appear to me (1) the vulgarity of the impugned words, and (2) the lenity of the Judge. In the "Freethinker" case, a quarter of a century ago, the impugned illustrations were also vulgar, but the Judge was very severe; in fact, the defendants were actually refused bail! Of course, it is absurd and impracticable, if the defendant intends to continue his propaganda, for him to be bound over not to say anything offensive to conventionally religious people. In practice, however, it is hardly likely one would be so foolish as to prosecute him or anyone else who confined himself in public to the use of ordinary conventional language. In priest-ridden countries such propagandists would no doubt incur the danger of mob violence, against which law is of small avail.

Surely the existing common law—to say nothing of statutory—would meet the case of persons using gross and provocative language in public. If so, the real basis for the blasphemy laws is swept away. It is worse than idle nowadays to defend orthodoxy. It is, intellectually speaking, as dead as the proverbial doornail. Its futile and obsolete defence, whether in pulpits or law courts, only further damages it, and the sooner thinking people, including our legislators, recognise that fact the better for everybody.

What concerns Mr. Stewart D. Headlam and similar earnest men is that the body of ancient Hebrew and Greek literature, termed the Bible, which for so many centuries has been looked upon as sacred, should no longer be a sort of fetish, but used with knowledge and discrimination, with a view to influencing conduct and character. He sees how his desire is apt to be defeated by such unwise prosecutions.

The Germans have a saying about emptying the baby out with the bath-water; and something like this follows when biblical critics of a plain and downright order are sent to gaol. Sympathisers are raised up who compendiously reject both the book and its supporters en bloc. And it is not easy to refute or rebuke them when they aver that religion has very largely become a business, young men "going into it" much as they do into law, medicine, or other callings.

When an attack is to be made by zealots or tyrants on freedom they usually select some more or less humble and obscure person. What they crave for is to establish precedents.

Now, as of old, the price of liberty is eternal vigilance.—Yours, &c.,

J. H.

February 24th.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—It was with mixed feelings that I read Mr. Headlam's letter on this subject. It is a pleasant, if somewhat novel, experience for an infidel to find himself thanking a militant upholder of the "Catholic faith" for his vigorous plea in favour of free speech. The pleasure is sadly marred by the reflection that the defence should have been left to such a quarter. Mr. Headlam was not the only one who waited "for some indignant protest by Liberals of influence." That he waited in vain seems to me one of the most striking proofs of the strength of that present-day reaction, against which you, Sir, usually so forcibly contend. I may add that one "indignant protest" was sent by a Liberal of no influence to the editor of the "Morning Post," but needless to say, did not achieve publicity.—Yours, &c.,

C. S.

Gerrards Cross,
February 26th, 1908.

"A BEAUTIFUL DUCHESS" AND "THE DOUGLAS CAUSE."

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—As the writer who reviewed my "Story of a Beautiful Duchess" in your paper has challenged some of my conclusions with regard to the famous "Douglas Cause," I shall be obliged if you will permit me to reply. When he contradicts my statement that Archibald Douglas was "brought from Westminster School" to his uncle's funeral he forgets that the boy was sent first to Rugby and then to Westminster, and was at the latter school when the old Duke of Douglas died. [See "The Douglas Book," II., 526.] Although a partisan of "the Defender," he objects to the evidence heard in France. "Probably none of it would be admitted in a modern court," he says. "Certainly none of it was conclusive, and the credibility of every one of these unseen witnesses was doubtful in the extreme." Yet he forgets that this evidence was given before a properly constituted Commission, appointed by the Scottish Court of Session, and overlooks the fact that but for the testimony of one of these "unseen witnesses"—Pierre Michel Menager—the Hamiltons must have won their case. The obsolete argument—of which your critic appears to approve—that Archibald Douglas ought not to have been dislodged, because he was "acknowledged by both parents," involves the most flagrant petitio principii, and if admitted would render the adoption of a supposititious child an easy crime to accomplish. Indeed, it would have insured the success both of the Kinnaird and Tichborne impostures.

In the "Athenæum" of January 11th I have replied at full length to the objection that Lady Jane Douglas-Stewart would not have "burdened herself with twins when one child was sufficient." It should be borne in mind that she was playing for a heavy stake, and, like Christian in the allegory, would struggle bravely with her heavy burden in the hope of gaining an exceeding great reward. Then why should she be deterred from adopting a foreign child because she was imbued with a high sense of family pride? Mulier finis familiae, the head of her house had cast her out, and her rightful inheritance was destined to pass to an alien branch. In one way only could she regain her position. In spite of this pride of hers, she married a scapegrace adventurer, and when half Scotland suspected her of a heinous crime she made no attempt to prove her innocence.

Naturally, many of her partisans declared that one of the children resembled his alleged father, just as many of the Hamilton adherents denied the likeness. This matter, however, is capable of proof even in these days. There is a fine portrait of Archibald Douglas, by Gainsborough, at present on view at Burlington House. I believe that there are no less than three portraits of Lady Jane at Douglas and Bothwell Castles. There is also a picture of Sir John Stewart of Grandtully, and, probably, one also of his eldest son, who succeeded him in the baronetcy. No doubt the Duke of Douglas was painted by some eminent artist. Let those who insist upon the argument advanced by Lord Mansfield attempt to demonstrate this family likeness by reproducing all these portraits in one volume. As far as I have been able to ascertain, Archibald Douglas did not resemble Sir John Stewart in the slightest degree. The former had a low forehead, a thick nose and lips, and black eyes; the latter had a high forehead, a thin nose and lips, and blue eyes.

Hitherto the "Douglas Cause" has been obscured by a mass of legend. It is, I think, however, now acknowledged that Lord Mansfield's conduct throughout was that of a manifest partisan; indeed, his verdict seems to have been influenced by the same sort of misapprehension which caused him to decide that Chevalier D'Eon was a woman. Pierre Michel Menager—the principal witness on the Douglas side—was subsequently imprisoned for perjury in a similar cause in France, being concerned, as I have shown, in the celebrated affair of the Comte de Morangies. Sir John Stewart—the claimant's own father—was proved to be, as a reviewer of my book in the "Pall Mall Gazette" has well described him, "the prince of lying witnesses," and Archibald Douglas succeeded in persuading the court to "serve him heir" through the means of certain letters purporting to come from the doctor who brought him into the world, but which were shown to be absolute forgeries.

I am ready to admit that opinion in Scotland applauded the verdict, but this was because of the high character of the first Baron Douglas, as your reviewer in his able criticism of my book has pointed out; but we must remember that David Hume and Adam Smith were on the side of the Hamiltons, and that the Court of Session, which contained many lawyers as capable as Lords Camden and Mansfield, decided that Lady Jane was guilty of fraud.—Yours, &c.,

HORACE BLEACKLEY.

Fox Oak, Hersham, Surrey,
February 20th, 1908.

THE BOY AND GIRL SCHOOL.

To the Editor of THE NATION.

SIR,—I have been for some years on a committee of a boy and girl school belonging to the "Society of Friends," and one sees the advantages (which you have named) of the two sexes being taught together. As you say, the manliness of the boys and the womanliness of the girls is improved by this association. The committee of the school have reports every year of the children who have left, until they reach twenty-one, and bad reports are very rare, which no doubt is due to the natural life they lived when boys and girls, which engendered a mutual understanding. That it must result in immorality is absurd; the fact is, it has an opposite effect, as shyness and awkwardness disappear, and, as you say, "The possibility of friendship is realised betimes, and in common studies girls and boys learn the meaning of disinterested companionship." I am quite convinced this is the right way of educating our children, and hope it will not be long before it is universal.—Yours, &c.,

J. P.

February 22nd, 1908.

Reviews.

THE HEART OF AFRICA.*

EXPLORATION in the old romantic sense of the word is no more possible to-day than conquest as Cortes understood it. Save, perhaps, at the South Pole the world never again will thrill at the thought of a new continent. The great rivers have all been churned by a stern-wheel, and even Ruwenzori has been climbed. There are still in Africa virgin forests, untraversed tributary streams, but there is no longer a region which lacks somewhere in its centre a white man's post. The very giants of the Soudan have seen the inside of Khartoum gaol and the dwarfs made a spectacle in a London music-hall. Llassa holds no mystery, and the okapi has been stuffed. The work of exploration which still remains to be done is the careful labour of the surveyor, who goes with the theodolite and plane-table over the tracks cut out by more empirical pioneers, and the exact classification of the naturalist, who rejoices to find a new mouse or a strange thrush, where his predecessors surprised the lion.

It is in the main this work of the gleaner which Lieutenant Boyd Alexander records in his fascinating record of a three years' journey "From the Niger to the Nile." Everywhere he traversed territory which Europeans have subjected, and the permanent "posts" of British, French, German, and Belgian administrators were the stages of his journey. Yet one may doubt whether any of the pioneers faced graver perils or displayed more of the daring, the perseverance, and the tact which make a great traveller. Of three officers who started out on the long trek from Nigeria to the Soudan, only one survived to chronicle their common work. Malaria and black-water fever dogged their tracks, starvation was sometimes a possibility, the route of the expedition lay for the most part over rivers never navigated before, and the shooting of cataracts seems to have been its favourite method of locomotion. The more savage tribes, even in British territory, were often menacing and hostile, and more than once the expedition had to face a rain of poisoned arrows. More trying were the tests of mere patience and endurance involved in river journeys where the rate of progress up stream was often no more than two miles a day, in the strange navigation of Lake Chad, where a path had often to be forced through mud or cut through reeds, above all, in such humdrum but heart-breaking work as the transport of steel boats overland in sections, when six weeks would be consumed in the conquest of a stretch of fifteen miles. Mr. Alexander tells his tale simply and with soldierly modesty, but the barest record of such feats cannot conceal their moral value. The romance of the "Anabasis" is told in stadia and parasangs, and the heroism of such a journey as this becomes on paper an affair of miles and hours.

Mr. Alexander's main interest lay in zoology. He traversed a continent accumulating the skins of little birds, tabulating the species of river fish, and counting it a triumph when he had found a large rat with a white belly, or christened a new coney with the name of a friend. To the general reader much of his best and most permanent work, both topographical and zoological, seems in consequence somewhat erudite and remote. But he has a gift of literary description rare in men of action, and there are pages of delicate and nervous English which record with a magic that sometimes recalls "Eothen," the wizardry of an African sunset, the emotional significance of a clear night of stars, the cruelty of a Saharan wind, and the tropical passions of the hail or rain. His observations on the natives are always interesting and valuable. One realises from the first the attraction of a singularly humane and kindly personality. There is something typical of the best strain in English blood, in the spectacle of these three men, keen sportsmen, punctual disciplinarians, formidable soldiers, trekking over a continent collecting an odd assortment of animal pets, and winning the devotion of their "boys" so completely that the same natives followed them with scarcely a murmur through peril and labour and disease from the Niger to the Nile. The story of African travel has too often been a tale of rapine and slaughter. But this unique expedition used its firearms only once against a human foe, and that was to rescue a caravan of Mecca pilgrims from a great squadron of pillaging desert raiders. So reluctant, indeed, was the expedition to abuse the advantage which firearms gave it that when attacked by an ill-disposed mountain tribe in Northern Nigeria, they refrained from firing, and charged instead in close formation into the arrows, relying (as it happened, successfully) solely upon the moral impression created by their serried ranks and fearless advance. On another occasion when Mr. Alexander, turning suddenly round near a hostile Dinka village, found its chief in the act of firing a poisoned arrow at his back, he simply advanced and signalled to the man to withdraw. He was obeyed. Nine men in ten would have drawn their revolvers, and many would have burned the offending village. A man who could wield such an ascendancy as this over the natives undoubtedly understands them. Mr. Alexander clearly knows them well, and likes them, without idealising them. He travelled through countless tribes, whose origin and appearance and mode of life he briefly describes. But, unfortunately for the general reader, his concern was rather with birds than with men, and like most practical administrators in primitive countries, he seems to have only a slight interest in anthropology, and tells us little about the laws, customs, and myths of these primitive tribes.

*"From the Niger to the Nile." By Lieutenant Boyd Alexander. Arnold. 2 vols. 36s. net.

The varieties of culture and social structure to be encountered on such a journey as this are so bewildering, that it is hard to remember that they are really contemporary and contiguous. At the end of the scale are the Buduma of Lake Chad, a naked race of fishermen, who compete with the storks and the pelicans for their food, build only bee-hive huts of grass, fly at the approach of a stranger, and are so poor that they maim the greater number of their male children to effect an economy of life. At the other end are such tribes as the Shua and Fulani, wanderers at some remote period from the Nile valley, who are good Mohammedans, dress with taste and elaboration, and practise an architecture which seems to be reminiscent of ancient Egypt. The plains belong to these settled and semi-civilised agricultural races; the hills to wild and unintelligent tribes, which seem to be only nominally human. It is the more advanced peoples of the plain who in Nigeria have taken most kindly to British rule; the hill tribes are still angry, suspicious, hostile, and sometimes, apparently, quite unaware of the nature of the white man's resources. Mr. Alexander is not concerned to discuss problems of administration. But the impression which one derives is of the golden age of colonial penetration. The white population is as yet almost entirely official, and the taint of greed and the lust of exploitation have not yet penetrated to the remote interior. The white men are evidently most carefully selected, and a high ideal of self-restraint and generous service rules among them. They are still an aristocratic caste without private interests, and noblesse oblige. One reads of industrial schools for liberated slave children, established not by missionaries but by soldiers or doctors, to give meaning and an occupation to the lonely life of an isolated post. The more predatory tribes and the stronger chiefs doubtless regret the loss of their license to pillage and oppress; the less warlike tribes and the weaker chiefs are said to be grateful for the advent of peace and for the security of trade and life. The one serious problem is that which everywhere faces the white man in Africa—the difficulty of checking the corruption and rapacity of native interpreters and the more brutal passions of native soldiers who abuse the respect which their office inspires, to pillage in the name of their white masters. The chief lesson on which Mr. Alexander insists is the duty of learning the language of the country—the only means by which a white administrator can emancipate himself from unscrupulous native agents and interpreters.

CRITICS OF SOCIALISM.*

II.—MR. W. H. MALLOCK.

IN striking contrast with the slap-dash puerilities of Mr. Arnold Forster stands the able, well-organised assault of Mr. W. H. Mallock upon the Socialist position. By far the closest criticism that has appeared in the English language, this book, consisting of lectures recently delivered in America, marks a considerable advance in subtlety of reasoning upon his two earlier works which entered the same ground of controversy. Following to some extent the radical distinction made by M. Tarde, the great French sociologist, between creative and imitative activities, Mr. Mallock bases his criticism upon the fundamental difference between ability (mainly consisting of directive energy) and labour. "Labour, from the most ordinary up to the rarest kind, is the mind or the brain of one man affecting that man's own hands, and the single task on which his hands happen to be engaged. The directive faculties are the mind or the brain of one man simultaneously affecting the hands of any number of other men, and through their hands the simultaneous tasks of all of them, no matter how various these tasks may be" (p. 31). Marx and the older formulators of "scientific" Socialism, borrowing their error from Smith and Ricardo, virtually ignored this distinction, treating labour as the sole producer of wealth, and claiming for labour the whole of its product. Modern Socialism, as represented in its intellectual leaders, has tended to a formal recognition of ability as a factor of production, and of the necessity of taking account of it in the Socialistic system of industry. But, according to Mr. Mallock, no adequate realisation exists of the supremely important fact that in modern industry "ability" is the sole creator of progress and of the increase of wealth. Whereas the worker of to-day is, either as an individual or as a co-operative unit, very little more productive than was his ancestor in the days before machinery, modern modes of industry afford vast play to the abilities of thinkers, inventors, financiers, organisers, and speculators. The truly creative faculties of these little groups of able men have made virtually the entire increase. Any Socialistic scheme, therefore, which deprives them of any large share of the incomes and the property which they thus make by their intelligent effort—assailing by high taxation, removing from private enterprise the industries in which this ability works, or crippling profitable industries by State interference—must undermine the sources of industrial prosperity in this or any country.

Socialism will not be able to discover the best ability, as competition now discovers it, will not be able to secure for it the full authority it requires for its productive functioning, and will be unwilling to furnish adequate incentives to procure its use in the public service. Such is the economic kernel of a criticism which has a good deal of force in its application to many actual experiments in State or municipal Socialism, and which, when addressed to the classes that believe themselves to contain a practical monopoly of ability, is most convincing.

Mr. Mallock is indisputably right in urging that the central problem for State Socialism is psychological. It is to find and apply the proper incentives to the wills of the various classes of producers, and particularly to the inventive and directive classes. Theoretic Socialists will doubtless urge against him what they will consider the deeper criticism that, by his statement of the problem, he has denied, without disproving, their principle that all production is a social process and value a social product, and that his attempt to ear-mark each portion of a product as due to the exertion of some individual is an essentially illicit process. But, without arguing this somewhat abstruse question, one may ask Mr. Mallock why he should suppose that it is essential to State Socialism to deny to inventors, organisers, and directors of industry adequate motives of personal gain? It is not necessary to rely overmuch upon the "joy in creative work," or the instinct of benevolence, or other non-selfish motives which might survive or grow under Socialism. If one were to analyse a little more closely than Mr. Mallock has done, the complexities of motive which can operate upon the thinker, the inventor, the capitalist, the manager, and other officials, one would find great waste under the existing system; and it is not obvious that an intelligent Socialism (if such a thing could emerge) would refuse to apply certain selfish motives more effectively than now. It is not obvious, for instance, that scientific ability might not be better utilised for technical improvements under a system where the actual inventor was able to submit his idea to a public expert rather than to a business man whose interest may be to steal the idea, to suppress it, or both. Society at present, it may be argued, fails to discover or to make provision for most of her potential thinkers, inventors, and even her organisers. But could the State do better? As a practical criticism against the efficacy of most Socialistic proposals, there is much force in the view that public administration tends to become mechanical and to resist reform. This, in our judgment, is a final objection against the general Socialistic scheme; but it is no sufficient argument against the actual "Socialism of to-day," which consists in taking over and working by the State such industries as are not and cannot be genuinely competitive, or which, left in private hands, generate conditions dangerous to large classes of workers or to the general public.

* "A Critical Examination of Socialism." By W. H. Mallock. Murray. 6s.

It is, after all, of little value to discuss the advisability of "Socialising all the instruments of production." Such a proposal is not likely to be entertained by the majority of this or any other people, notwithstanding the large nominally "Socialistic" vote in Germany and elsewhere. If a nation ever did come to the point of making a single wholesale proposal of this kind, the preceding process of moral and intellectual change must be so great as to invalidate all tests of practicability based on existing human nature. The real Socialism is piece-meal and opportunist, and it will not be stayed, nor ought it, by any of the considerations Mr. Mallock so skilfully adduces. The businesses of fighting, letter carrying, street cleaning, &c., have possibly suffered in some elements of technical efficiency and progress by being Socialised. But nobody believes that by converting these from private into public enterprises a net loss of social efficiency and progress has been sustained. Quite the contrary. It pays society to economise its ability and energy by Socialising the relatively routine and basic industries.

But the real vulnerability of Mr. Mallock's defence of vested interests consists in his assumptions that free competition actually prevails in the most profitable sorts of industries; and that even elsewhere competition so operates as to give to men of ability the payments strictly necessary to evoke their best efforts. There is no treatment of such important facts as the economic rent of land, the high profits of protected or other non-competing businesses, and other large incomes based upon artificial advantages of opportunity. Mr. Mallock insists that the whole increase of wealth in modern times belongs by right to the few able men who have made it. But he never explains why the present industrial system should even tend to distribute this wealth in proportion to this productivity, and in one passage in his final chapter he virtually gives away his case by recognising that ability must "in its own interests" make over to labour a large share of the increase of wealth. His words here are most significant:—

"The ideal state of social equilibrium would be reached when this share was such that any further augmentation of it would enfeeble the action of ability by depriving it of its necessary stimulus, and by thus diminishing the amount of the total product, would make the share of the labourers less than it was before."

All that the more reflecting Socialist demands is such changes in the industrial and fiscal policy of the State as shall satisfy this condition, removing those elements of unearned income which supply no stimulus to their recipients, and claiming them as a social income. In some cases this social income can be got by taxation, in other cases it is better to convert a private into a public monopoly. But though Mr. Mallock's arguments have not the destructive value he thinks, his book deserves the close attention of all who are Socialists, or favour social reforms conducted by the State. It is the best current statement of the essential features of the anti-Socialist position.

MID-VICTORIAN.*

It is easily read between the lines that the anonymous author of "Leaves from a Life" is a daughter of the aged artist who, born in 1819, painted prodigiously in the mid-Victorian days, and was recently received in audience by King Edward. The lady herself informs us that she was born in 1848, and these are her recollections of the fifties, sixties, and seventies. They make an entertaining volume, rather ill-written, and—as we shall presently have to show—marred by a little uncharitableness and some errors of taste.

* "Leaves from a Life." Eveleigh Nash. 10s. 6d. net.

In 1852 the family went to live at Pembridge Villas, Bayswater, and

"up that long flight of steps, glassed in for us when we began to go to parties, has passed every notable in England, from the late Queen Victoria, the present King and Queen, and all the princes and princesses, to what we prized still more . . . all the literary, artistic, and musical celebrities of the mid and later Victorian era."

Queen Victoria was a sitter at Pembridge Villas in those far-off days, and the door was opened for her by a pretty and vivacious young aunt of the author, disguised as a parlourmaid. Another visitor, who came unwillingly at the skirts of his mother, is described as a "little ruffian." The gentleman is now the German Emperor. "Handsome Prince Louis of Hesse" brought his equerry, for whom, in the course of a sitting, "Papa suggested a seat." "He vill schtaand," said the Prince.

Celebrities, literary, artistic, and theatrical, throng the scene. Dickens, the author did not like, and she lets us know it, though perhaps the remark is unimportant that—

"for me at any rate, all Charles Dickens' pathos rings untrue, and all his bits of 'goody-goody' moralising suggest to me that they were written with his tongue in his cheek."

It will be perceived thus early that the author's gifts as a memoirist include no particular delicacy of style. R. L. Stevenson she met on several occasions.

"But I was never lucky in my meetings with R. L. S. . . and whenever I met him at Bournemouth Stevenson was ill, or had been ill, or was going to be; and I never was anything but depressed by his presence at the Taylors', though perhaps I should be ashamed of even saying such a thing."

Mr. Hardy is more fortunate—

"A name to be written in gold, to be placed next to Shakespeare's, and to be honoured as the grandest writer of the time."

There is a charming sketch of Browning, but it was hardly nice to say of his son, after the father had hoped for him a career as painter and sculptor, "as far as I know, he has never become famous in either." On Mr. Alfred Austin there are several pages of depreciation, and an idiosyncratic touch is this:—"Mr. Austin was then engaged in novel-writing; he wrote three, but not one was a success." It is foolishness to speak of Matthew Arnold, when his face was in repose, as "quite the ugliest man I ever saw in my life." Not only had Arnold (who was a bit of a dandy) a fine and powerful head, he had even a severe, intellectual beauty of countenance. Many years ago the writer of these lines faced him during the four hours' tedium of a Lord Mayor's banquet, and mentally likened him to Doré's neophyte among the unspiritual monks.

Trollope, Bret Harte, Tom Taylor, Charles Reade, Stanley (not mentioned by name), Dean Farrar, Henry Taylor, Miss Braddon, Mrs. Riddell, Sala, and Edmund Yates make appearances in one chapter or another. Bret Harte had an awkward encounter in the drawing-room with Sala, whom he wanted to shoot on sight. Sala took a cab home. A note on Farrar runs thus:—

"Long years after the Harrow days, the Farrars stayed close by my home, and I asked him to preach in our church; he did so, and most beautifully, to a sparse congregation of rustics and provincials, who could not think what he was talking about, and gaped in his face. I never again asked any celebrity to preach to those people, and never told them when one or the other came my way and looked me up."

"Punch" inspires the author with some of her liveliest pages. Du Maurier sketched her in it, and many readers will welcome her description of the singing of that genius of the many gifts.

"He would sit down to the piano, and in a moment the room would be full of divine melody, not loud, not declamatory, but music in the fullest sense of the word . . . and I have heard a sudden hush come over a large assembly should he sing, albeit he liked best a small audience, and one he knew really loved to hear his tender trainante voice."

Shirley Brooks "had the delightful habit of telling us his jokes before they appeared in 'Punch'; and when he became editor in 1870 . . . he used to show us the coming number on the Sunday, before the public could have it on Wednesday." Of John Leech—

"All I recollect are his pictures, his rollicking good humour when there were no organs about, and the agony he endured when they came and ground at his front door, secure in the fact that he must pay them to move on."

Now and then we meet an art critic, and there is then a very natural rustle of the skirts. "Papa," however "never read any criticisms, good, bad, or indifferent," and was therefore able without bitterness of soul to give evidence for Ruskin in the case in which Whistler gained damages of a farthing.

The chapters on artists and picture-dealers are, as might be expected, intimate and racy. Leighton, the handsomest of men in the floridest of styles, was "Cupid." Millais—

"often came to Pembridge Villas late for a game of whist, and the nature of the points played for, as well as some canny Scotch characteristics he displayed, gained for him the sobriquet of 'Sixpenny Jack'."

The subacid humour of this, seldom far to seek, spices the book. It glances indifferently at family, friends, and acquaintances. What "my father's domestic arrangements" are or were none of us need seek to know; and the innuendo that follows on page 339, since it concerns no one among the reading public, should be removed. One or two other domestic references, interesting to nobody by whom the book will be borrowed, will probably give pain to some. For the pages on the late Rev. E. Ker Gray and the late Rev. J. C. M. Bellew there is not the vestige of an excuse; they are in the worst possible taste.

In its literary style the book is a finished model of the slipshod. An example or two shall suffice. In one of the lesser gems grammar gets the snub direct: "Pearls before swine was not in it." A simple puzzle as to meaning is this: "One has but to resemble the British public of Rudyard Kipling's 'pay, pay, pay' doggerel to have anything described or extolled that one desires." Another: "Mr. Bellew began life in India as an Indian chaplain, where his children were born; but his wife left him lamenting with someone else." Who was left lamenting with whom? As an example, scarcely surpassable, of the way how not to construct a sentence, take this:—

"Now Mr. Cass sleeps by his beloved church, close to the altar, near to the splendid little inner chapel he discovered and restored, and to the pulpit he restored too, and to which excellent object I gave the proceeds of articles I wrote on Burford."

It would have been a venial sin to deduct a shilling for Dr. Morris's "Elements of Grammar."

Compare with the foregoing Stevenson's magical few lines on Burford in his "Gossip on Romance"—the Stevenson who bored this lady.

A NOVEL OF PROPAGANDA.*

THE "novel with a purpose" is always, rightly, a little suspect, the purpose, obvious and pronounced, playing the part of a governess resolved that her "little charges" shall illustrate to all the world her high and proper aim. And as a "model child" is one whose springs of spontaneity have been weakened, so a picture of life constructed to prove a thesis is one in which nature, similarly, is repressed and comes off second best. In "The Nun" the hidden purpose peeps forth so clearly as to defeat M. Bazin's intention of enlisting his readers' sympathy against the French Government's policy of shutting up the convents and expelling the nuns. Since persecution is odious, we ought to feel revolted and shocked when the five nuns of St. Hildegarde are driven out of their home in Lyons, when their school is closed by the police, and when nothing is left them but to become "secularised" and struggle in the indifferent world to earn their bread. In fact, we feel half sorry and half glad, but, curiously, it is not the tyrannical action of the State that moves our anger, but the priestly policy that has brought it about. M. René Bazin has not been unaware of the danger he runs of being told that the fault lies with the Catholic Church, and in his portrait of Canon Le Suet, Monsieur le Supérieur, the timid and compromising Head, he endeavours to anticipate our criticism and apportion the blame. But by doing this he does not attain his end.

The story opens with a description of the life led by the five nuns—Sisters Justine, Danielle, Léonide, Edwige, and Pascale—in their daily work of teaching and training children within the convent, and in their ministrations in the poorer quarter of labouring Lyons. Their characters contrast well, but we are early aware that we are being presented to a group of model women who symbolise too effectively the forces of duty, love, obedience, mercy, and chastity. We are made to feel too decidedly that the busy world of Lyons that surrounds this little group united in their spiritual perfection is a hotbed of suffering, of evil passions, of vanity, and of struggle. And immediately, with human capriciousness, we decline to sympathise with the nuns, and we secretly desire that the wicked world shall open its jaws and swallow the five Sisters up! It is very wrong, of course, to range one's self on the side of the oppressors against the people of saintly life; but is it, in fact, all René Bazin's fault. The Convent, in his story, plays the part of the conscientious governess who has trained up her "model children" to an unnatural pitch of perfection, and we cannot help wishing to get the governess out of the way and see what are the dormant forces of nature underlying his nuns' cloistered virtues. And it is especially in his exposition of the tragedy of Sister Pascale that M. René Bazin's purpose defeats his art.

Sister Pascale, a girl of twenty-three, with her anxious and timid temperament, sensitive heart, and her dread of man's love, has had from her childhood a "convent vocation." She feels that in the nunnery she will have "the safeguard of examples of the rule of regular obligatory prayer," and to "save her soul" she leaves her old father, Mouvand, a master weaver, who, religious by nature, consents to her "leading the right life," and she enters the Convent of St. Hildegarde. But, first, to give themselves a little holiday, the father and daughter go on a visit to Nûnes, to stay with their relatives the Prayous, and it so happens that Jules Prayou, the handsome young blackguard, is the type incarnate of all the forces of the world, the flesh, and the devil that Pascale is seeking to shelter herself from. When the reader has reached this point the author's purpose is unrolled before him like a map. We know that that old Mouvand will have to die, we know that the nuns of St. Hildegarde will be ejected and driven away from Lyons by heartless State officials, and we foresee that the innocent dove, Pascale, will flutter into the wolfish jaws of Jules Prayou. It is the destined demonstration of the proposition that the author, as a good Catholic, has set up before him. And the expected happens. When the Mother Superior, as the fatal hour approaches, asks Pascale whether she will be "spiritually safe" with her relatives the Prayous, the young nun feels that a thought of perilous pleasure is within her, and that "she had already yielded to its temptation when she had made her vague and evasive answer." But she does not confess that she is prevaricating, and we cannot bring ourselves to believe that the dovelike virtue which is only safe within the walls of a convent, the virtue which is guarded by the love of the four saintly Sisters, must be destined to seek out and straightway succumb to masculine viciousness. Is the State responsible for Pascale's seduction and death, even if the closing of the Convent of St. Hildegarde directly leads to it?

Yet this is what M. René Bazin's art would have us believe. Pascale becomes Prayou's mistress, and in a few short months is driven on to the streets to earn money for her "souteneur." In desperation, she is in the act of flight when her brutal and cowardly lover overtakes her and kills her with a knife-thrust. Pascale is buried by the four Sisters, who come together again over her grave, where, we are told, they pray "for those who, willing all the evil or not, whether cruel or only ignorant of heavenly and divine and charitable things, had brought about disaster and had reached their ends." And if we do not feel contrite, it is because we are conscious that by Pascale's death M. René Bazin has, too, "reached his ends," and because we feel that the Catholic Church is sacrificing Pascale as a pawn in the long-drawn-out game it is still playing against the French State. How does it come about that the Catholics of Lyons are so lukewarm that the Convent is closed with scarcely a murmur, and that the working people "often looked at the Sisters as though they hated them madly"? Is it because the Vatican cares little about its obscure servants and every thing about its temporal power, and that the harvest of this policy is hatred?

But, in fact, it is a pity that M. Bazin's "purpose" should have got the better of his art, for there is considerable power shown in the picture of the unhappy Pascale's subjection to the sinister Jules Prayou. In the sketch of this

* "The Nun." By René Bazin. Everleigh Nash. 6s.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.*Ready next Tuesday.MODERN EGYPT

BY THE

EARL OF CROMER.With Portrait of Author and Map. Two vols., 24s. net.SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.*

A NEW BOOK ON BUDDHISM.

THE INWARD LIGHT. By H. FIELDING HALL, Author of "The Soul of a People," &c. 8vo, 10s. net.THE EVERSLEY TENNYSON.

Annotated by ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON. Edited by HALLAM, LORD TENNYSON. In 9 Vols. Globe 8vo, 4s. net each. Vol. I. POEMS. Vol. II. POEMS. Vol. III. ENOCH ARDEN and IN MEMORIAM.

*THIRD AND CONCLUDING PART.THE DYNASTS. A Drama of the Napoleonic Wars. By THOMAS HARDY. Part III. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net. Previously published—Parts I. and II. 4s. 6d. net each.
"A great work of art."—*The Times.NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION WITH INTRODUCTION.PRINCIPLES OF WESTERN*CIVILISATION. A Sociological Study. By BENJAMIN KIDD, Author of "Social Evolution." Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.The Observer.—"As to the richness and depth of these pages and the profound significance of their endeavour to elucidate the main law of progress in organised societies, there has never been any question among the few. But the many have not as yet discovered this great study, and we cannot wish better for the Empire than that the book should be widely read and pondered upon in its new shape."*A NEW VOLUME OF ESSAYS.CONFESSIO MEDICI. By the Writer of "The Young People." Extra crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.Evening Standard.—"Though 'Confessio Medici' is a series of essays on various phases of the doctor's calling, it has sufficient general humanity in its composition to delight a wide audience."TYPES OF TRAGIC DRAMA.

By C. E. VAUGHAN, M.A., Professor of English Literature in the University of Leeds. Extra Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

THE INQUISITION OF THE SPANISH DEPENDENCIES.

By HENRY CHARLES LEA, LL.D. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN & CO., Ltd., London.THE FABIAN SOCIALIST SERIES

Is the reply of the Fabian Society to the question, "What is Socialism?" It is authoritative, comprehensive, attractive, and cheap. Four volumes now ready.

- 1.—Socialism and Religion.
- 2.—Socialism and Agriculture.
- 3.—Socialism and Individualism.
- 4.—The Basis and Policy of Socialism.

By Bernard Shaw, Edward Carpenter, Sidney Webb, Stewart Headlam, and other prominent Fabians.

6d. each nett (postage 1d.); quarter-cloth, gilt top, 1s. each nett (postage 2d.).

LONDON: A. C. FIFIELD, 44, FLEET STREET, E.C.

THE INDEX TO VOLUME I. OF THE NATION

Is NOW READY, and can be had free on application to the Manager.

THE SOCIALIST MOVEMENT IN ENGLAND.

By BROUGHAM VILLIERS. 10s. 6d. net.

It is no longer possible for serious students of English politics to ignore Socialism. This is the first adequate attempt to explain the evolution and growth of the Socialist Movement in this country.

T. FISHER UNWIN

A Reply to the Encyclical Pascendi of Pius X.THE PROGRAMME OF MODERNISM.

Translated from the Italian by FATHER TYRRELL,

Price 5s. net.

"Amidst the quickly growing mass of literature dealing with the Modernist Movement in the Roman Catholic Church, this little volume may, without hesitation, be singled out as the best source of information for those who want to know the facts in brief."—Manchester Guardian.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

PORTUGAL.

By H. MORSE STEPHENS, M.A.

New Edition. With Maps and Illustrations. 5s.

This edition contains a new chapter dealing with the most recent events, by MAJOR MARTIN HUME, and five new illustrations, including Portraits of the late King and Crown Prince, and the new King.

T. FISHER UNWIN.

*SPECIAL EDITION.THE MERMAID SERIES. THE BEST PLAYS OF THE OLD DRAMATISTS.*LITERAL REPRODUCTIONS OF THE OLD TEXT.*With Photogravure Frontispieces.

The volumes may now be obtained bound in the following styles:—

- I. Crown 8vo, uncut. Brown paper boards, with label, 3s. 6s.
- II. Crown 8vo, uncut. Green cloth, with gilt lettering on ink panel, 3s. 6d.
- III. Crown 8vo, uncut top. Brown cloth, with gilt lettering and decorative design in brown, 3s. 6d.
- IV. Crown 8vo. Full vellum, with gilt lettering and gilt top, 6s. net.

The Thin Paper Edition, in cloth at 2s. 6d. net, and in leather at 3s. 6d. net, is also obtainable.LIST OF VOLUMES SENT POST FREE ON APPLICATION.

T. FISHER UNWIN, 1, ADELPHI TERRACE, LONDON.

ominous Mediterranean type a great deal of Southern life is concentrated. In Prayou's figure we see the ideal of the populace which fosters the Mafia. M. Bazin has seized and sketched with psychological insight the attitude of the Caesar Borgia of low life:—

"Of all she said, of all she did, he was apprised. Pascale felt herself surrounded by a network of treason. Her master was a man to be feared, and many did fear him. This young man, without available means of life, without reputation, and without work, had innumerable accomplices, had surrounded himself with connivances. He held the district—not only the suburb of Montauri, but the neighbourhood of the slaughter-houses, and all the region of the cattle and sheep market. Though he took no open part in politics, several political agents paid him a covert court. They said: 'It is not a good thing to have Prayou against us.' At election time he was flush of money. The very police agents who had been charged to keep a watch on him, had entered into treaty with him—the man of whom all crime was suspected, and no crime known. With him they could enter into doubtful wine-shops, where he was all-powerful, could drink without payment, and Jules Prayou helped them in inquisitions they could not entirely evade. At this price he purchased liberty from surveillance for himself. Smugglers of alcohol made use of his experience, and of his 'knowledge of men and places,' poachers found him an expert middle-man. The owners of olive-orchards knew that for a fee to him they would be tolerably guaranteed against thieves; at any rate the whole of their crop would not disappear. When the tall young fellow with the soft dark eyes walked through the district, all saluted him on the way, and many hats, even, were raised. He answered with a word, or with a sweep of the eyelid, according to the importance of the case. Women looked at him. Newspaper sellers left the pavement to him; the gypsies, who kept their tribe close, gave him welcome to their camp; wandering musicians, and all kinds of beggars, true and false alike, tried to get to his favor. And all these people kept him informed. They said: 'I saw your girl at the fountain garden. I saw her on the Saint Césaire road.' Nor did Pascale ever go out without leave, or without a time fixed for her return."

Cleverly done, also, are the little pictures of the French homes to which the Sisters Justine, Danielle, Léonide, and Edwige retire, after they are "secularised." The author has the comparatively rare faculty of bringing before us a person in a few strokes, as we see in the portraits of the two priests, Canon Le Suet and the Abbé Monechal; it is, therefore, all the more a pity that his "purpose" should obtrude and weaken the whole illusion of his picture of life.

BOOKS IN BRIEF.

FAMILY diaries are usually tedious reading for those outside the immediate circle of the writers, but the notes and letters selected by the late Lady Grey, and now published under the title of "A Family Chronicle" (Murray, 12s. net), is an exception. The book contains the recollections of three generations of talented women, Lady Dacre, her daughter, Mrs. Sullivan, and her grand-daughter, Lady Grey. Lady Dacre, though now forgotten, was something of a celebrity in the early part of the last century. She wrote verses, was an artist of some distinction, had a tragedy in five acts performed at Drury Lane, and was also a leader in social life. Her letters are bright and vivacious, and among her correspondents of whom we get glimpses in this volume were Sydney Smith, his brother, Bobus, Miss Mitford, Joanna Baillie, Mrs. Kemble, Bulwer Lytton, and Mrs. Norton. Particularly interesting are the letters of Bobus Smith, whom many of his friends thought to be the intellectual superior of his famous brother. His indolence, however, prevented him from making his mark, and he survives, if at all, only by two or three witty sayings. Mrs. Norton impressed Lady Dacre as being "too splendidly, magnificently, furiously beautiful. . . . I never saw anything so tormentingly beautiful. One is attracted by her consummate beauty, one is repelled by her odious manner." A story of Lady Holland is too good to leave unmentioned. Once when she was staying at Lord Radnor's, by way of shortening her stay Lord Radnor decided to have Sunday evening prayers. Lady Holland professed to be delighted, and when Lord Radnor ended by saying the Lord's Prayer, she remarked, "I liked that very much, that last prayer you read. I approve of it—it is a very nice one—pray, whose is it?" There is an excellent description of Queen Victoria's coronation in a letter by Mrs. Sullivan to her son.

In telling the story of Mary Robinson, Mr. Stanley V. Makower has adopted the indefensible plan of combining fact with fiction. He tells us in a note that while "Perdita: A Romance in Biography" (Hutchinson, 16s. net) is for the most part made up of scenes, conversations, and incidents which are historically true, he has not hesitated to employ "the resources of fiction to complete the significance of his material." A book compiled in this manner runs a risk of suffering from the defects of both biography and fiction without having the merits of either form. It is high praise for Mr. Makower that in spite of the faults of his method he has given us a readable volume which is also a useful contribution to our knowledge of Mary Robinson. The author is rightly severe on Tom Robinson, whose shameful neglect of his wife is without excuse, and he paints a lurid picture of the life of such men as Lyttelton and George Robert Fitzgerald—the latter scoundrel's amazing career is well worth the attention of some writer in search of a subject—whose attentions caused Mary Robinson so much distress. On the other hand, the conduct of George IV., who played "Florizel" to Mary Robinson's "Perdita," and then brutally deserted her, might well have been more severely censured. We should also have welcomed a fuller account of Mary Robinson's literary work which, if almost worthless in itself, throws some light on the amusingly extravagant body who called themselves the Della Cruscan school of poetry. It is impossible to read Mr. Makower's pages without having one's pity stirred for the pathetic fate of the beautiful and gifted woman, abandoned by the royal lover whose baseness she never admitted, and at last overwhelmed by so terrible a misfortune.

* * *

THE fascinating, if capricious, personality of Ludwig II. of Bavaria, his relations with Wagner, his tragic fate, and the mystery surrounding his death, could hardly fail to supply a theme upon which the professional biographer should employ his art. One of the latest signs of this interest is "Ludwig the Second, King of Bavaria" (Sonnen-schein, 7s. 6d.), by Madame Clara Tschudi, a Norwegian lady who has already given us half a dozen romances of crowned heads. Her account of Ludwig rests in part upon "personal reminiscences from a visit of length to Munich and on verbal information from German friends who spent their summers in Hohenschwangau in the 'seventies and eighties'; but it contains nothing of importance that has not been previously known about the subject. On the other hand, by carefully piecing together a number of trifling details, she presents a vivid picture of Ludwig's surroundings and career—a career as filled with tragedy and romance as any in the pages of history. Indeed, the terrible doom of insanity, that curse of the Wittelsbachs, slowly but relentless falling upon the gifted young King, and quenching his gay irresponsibility, makes the story of his life almost like a Greek tragedy. The picture of the mad King, alone, at midnight pacing the great hall of his palace lit up by 20,000 candles, is one to haunt the memory. Although he brought his country to the verge of ruin by his extravagances, he never entirely lost popularity, and the attempt made by the peasantry, who disbelieved his insanity, to rescue him, together with the arrest of the Commissioners who had him in custody, seems so like a romance as to be almost incredible. It is for the intelligent patronage which he gave to Wagner that Ludwig's name will be remembered. Early in life he recognised the great composer's genius, and although political intrigue caused a severance between the two friends, Ludwig often visited Wagner in Switzerland, and it was partly through his help that the composer's dream of an Opera House at Bayreuth was realised.

* * *

ANYBODY who has derived his ideas of musical criticism from the notices in the daily papers or the explanatory descriptions which it is the fashion to append to concert programmes, will find Mr. Ernest Oldmeadow's "Great Musicians" (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d. net) an original and refreshing book. The author knows his musical history, writes eloquently, and at times epigrammatically, and is careful to avoid the fatal error of being too technical. Like Mr. Julian Hill's companion volume on "Great English Poets," this one is not merely a succession of little biographies; the biographies, in fact, are only so many points in a framework on which is hung a clever study of musical

THE ORIENT REVIEW

The SECOND NUMBER will be on Sale on MONDAY, MARCH 2nd.

ALL INTERESTED IN EASTERN
THOUGHT are invited to secure a Copy.

PRICE ONE SHILLING NET.

A Specimen Copy of the first Number will be sent Free to you on receipt of three penny stamps for postage.

Write to the Manager—

THE ORIENT REVIEW

THANET HOUSE, STRAND,
LONDON, W.C.

SIR HUBERT VON HERKOMER and PUBLIC OPINION

Sir Hubert Herkomer, the distinguished artist, writing from Bushey
to the Editor of PUBLIC OPINION, says, on February 11th, 1908:—

Dear Sir—It gives me great pleasure to tell you how your paper,
PUBLIC OPINION, answers a purpose in my life. Although
I read a great deal, I find it impossible to keep abreast of the trend of higher thought that is going on around me, which can only be gathered from various articles and letters in the newspapers, and articles in magazines. But your paper gives me the assurance that I miss nothing which could be of use to me in the train of thought upon which I may just be engaged,
and seldom does a weekly issue of PUBLIC OPINION appear from which I cannot cull some useful suggestion. As a lecturer on art, I need all the suggestions on life that I can get into my hands, for I treat art in all its phases popularly.
From PUBLIC OPINION I get to know certain modern authors with whose methods of thinking I am in sympathy, and those I follow up further. Your paper does me the service to point to them.

Your selection of current thought is worthy of all praise, for it gives one the wholesome feeling that the world is after all not going to the devil, but contains thinkers and good men and women.

I wish you with all my heart continuous success with your paper.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) HUBERT VON HERKOMER.

PUBLIC OPINION.

A Weekly Review of Current Thought and Activity.
EVERY FRIDAY. TWOPENCE.

Edited by PERCY L. PARKER.

The purpose of PUBLIC OPINION is to provide information
by means of a weekly review of current thought and activity as they are expressed in the world's newspapers, magazines and books, and
to put on record the ideas and activities which make for religious,
political and social progress.

PUBLIC OPINION can be obtained from any Newsagent or Bookstall, or will be sent post free for one year to any address in the United Kingdom for 10s. 10d.; and to any place abroad for 13s.
per annum. Orders should be addressed to—

PUBLIC OPINION,

30 & 31, Temple House, Tallis St., London, E.C.

Specimens free on application.

PERCY L. PARKER.

Scribner's March 1908. Magazine

THE TRAIL OF THE LONESOME PINE,
by John Fox, Jr., author of "The Little Shepherd of Kingdom Come." A strong Serial which commenced in the January number.

Château and Country Life in France,
by Madame Waddington, author of the
"Letters of a Diplomat's Wife."

The West in the Orient, by Charles M.
Pepper, U.S. Foreign Trade Commissioner. The Transformation of Transportation. Illustrated.

Across the Cordilleras, by Arthur Ruhl.
Illustrated. An account of an adventurous and dangerous winter journey over the great Andean Range.

The Art of Millet, by Kenyon Cox.
Illustrated. A most interesting and sympathetic study of the personality of the artist and his place in modern art.

SHORT STORIES:

The General Manager, by Robert Herrick.

The Candle Flame, by Virginia Tracy.

Hinkson's Double Life, by Francis Cotton.

For this Relief much Thanks, by Francis Lynde.

On Sale Everywhere. ONE SHILLING.

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS,
TEMPLE HOUSE, TALLIS STREET, LONDON. E.C.

SATURDAY WESTMINSTER

CARTOONS BY "F.C.G."

SHORT STORIES,

BOOK REVIEWS,

LITERARY ARTICLES,

PROBLEMS AND PRIZES,

SURVEY OF THE WEEK,

BRIDGE, CHESS, PHOTO-GRAPHY.

NATURE AND SCIENCE,

Etc., Etc.

(One Penny Weekly.)

The Economist.

(ESTABLISHED 1843.)

Weekly Commercial Times, Bankers' Gazette, and Railway Monitor.

A POLITICAL, LITERARY, FINANCIAL AND GENERAL NEWSPAPER.
PRICE 8d. By Post, 8½d. ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION FOR THE UNITED KINGDOM, £2.
COLONIES AND ABROAD, £2 4s.

The established authority on all Financial and Commercial subjects. In addition to a large high-class general circulation,
the ECONOMIST is subscribed to by Banking Houses, Chambers
of Commerce, Mercantile Firms, and Railway, Insurance, and other Companies throughout the United Kingdom, the Colonies and Abroad; and, as its columns from week to week show, it is the recognised organ for the announcements of some of the most important trades in the Kingdom.

PUBLISHED EVERY SATURDAY IN TIME FOR THE MORNING MAILS.

Offices: GRANVILLE HOUSE, ARUNDEL STREET, STRAND, W.C.,
and of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

evolution. Mr. Oldmeadow begins with the sixteenth century, with Orlandus Lassus and Palestrina, and ends with Handel and Bach, and in each case gives a clear synthesis of the character of the composer's genius. There is an excellent account of Purcell. Better still are the two introductory chapters, headed "The Great Unknown" and "The Unceasing Chant." In these he sketches the slow and painful progress of musical theory from the Middle Ages onward, emphasising the debt that we owe to the earliest composers, pointing out their disability in lacking the tangible medium of expression possessed by sculptors and painters, and consequently the slowness of musical development; and ascribing the elaborate triumph of modern notation to the centuries spent in groping after truth by these early and laborious workers. His defence of the Church chant, the oldest of all musical forms, against the charge of being of antiquarian rather than musical interest, should appeal to everybody who has come under the subtly emotional spell of Gregorians. Of Mr. Oldmeadow's appreciations those of Purcell and Bach are, perhaps, the more just and discriminating, but all are sufficiently thoughtful to make one regret that they stop short of Beethoven and the moderns. The thirty-two illustrations, which vary in their degrees of appropriateness, include portraits of Sully, Rameau, Purcell, Handel and Bach.

* * *

"THE DIARIES OF EDWARD PEASE, THE FATHER OF ENGLISH RAILWAYS" (Headley Bros., 7s. 6d.), date only from 1838, when their author was seventy-one, but his great-grandson, Sir Alfred Pease, contributes an introduction which gives a capital account of his earlier life. We are told little that is supplementary to Smiles's "Life of George Stephenson" about Pease's association with Stephenson and the founding of the Stockton and Darlington Railway. But Pease claims our interest apart from his share in railway development. His clear-sighted and forceful personality is seen in these diaries, which help us to understand the Quakerism of the earlier half of the nineteenth century. Some of his scruples seem surprising enough to us to-day. Thus he speaks of tea-making at an entertainment for mechanics as "unfeminine vulgarity," he "deeply regrets" that a band should be allowed to perform at a flower show held in his cousin's grounds, and he opposes his son's projected entrance into Parliament. The strong vein of piety which runs through the diaries, combined with the light they throw upon the endeavours of the Society of Friends to abolish slavery and promote a better understanding among nations, raise the book above the level of most private diaries. Sir Alfred Pease has done well to publish this memorial of a remarkable man.

The Week in the City.

THE shipbuilding dispute seems to have been terminated happily, thanks in a large measure to the adroitness of the President of the Board of Trade, to whom the whole nation ought to be profoundly grateful. The Laing failure, however, has turned out very seriously, and I hear that one big bank has lost £120,000. The situation is bad enough without strikes or lock-outs, though our industries are far better off than those of the United States or Germany. It is clear, meanwhile, that the wild speculation of the last year or two and the tremendous break in prices have produced a very uncomfortable situation. No sooner is one banking crisis hushed up or smoothed away, than difficulties crop up somewhere else, or break out again in an old spot. From Bradford, Roubaix, and Germany, reports come of troubles that have befallen those who bought wool in Australia last autumn, just before the fall in wool values took place. Heavy losses have occurred. Then again, cotton merchants in Manchester have been hard hit by failures in Egypt, and this week the Stock Exchanges have been recording sharp losses in Egyptian bank shares. Japanese bonds have been depressed by rumours of a financial crisis in Tokio; and though this is denied, there can be no doubt that things are bad in Japan; and the Japanese Government, even after abandoning several millions of projected expenditure on armaments, still finds it difficult to make both ends meet. On the other hand, Consols keep pretty firm, and the City still counts on a return to easy money towards the end of next month. But that does not necessarily mean a general rise of prices.

THE CHARTERED COMPANY'S MEETING.

The working capital of the company in cash and liquid assets is running very low; but Mr. Rochfort Maguire, at the Chartered meeting on Wednesday, made an effort to adopt a cheerful view of the situation and to encourage the shareholders to take a speculative interest in the new issue. He said the company had now fulfilled its imperial mission and would henceforth attend strictly to business with a view to paying dividends to its shareholders. There are three black spots. The first is that neither the home Government nor any of the South African Colonies can afford, even if they were inclined, to assist the Chartered Company; and if they did they would not do anything for the shareholders. Secondly, the railways have been dreadfully unsuccessful and show no signs of improvement. Thirdly, Rhodesia does not attract colonists. Whether anything can be done to people the country by an alliance with the Salvation Army remains to be seen. Assuming that there is an off-chance of Rhodesian prospects brightening in a year or two one must confess that the scheme is a clever one; and Mr. Maguire's exposition of it was received with loud applause. He argues that the reason why Chartered shares are so low is that people doubt whether sufficient funds can be raised to enable the company to get through the work of development and to meet railway and other obligations until both ends meet. But if financial security could be made certain there would be a substantial rise in the shares. The directors, therefore, promise that they will not go to allotment unless £900,000 is subscribed. Here I quote Mr. Maguire's words:—

"Now, you will understand the importance I attach to the undertaking that no allotment of shares will be made unless £900,000 be subscribed. I venture to say that, in applying for these shares, you will run no risk at all, because you can only obtain the shares under conditions which secure the establishment of the financial position of the Company, and, by so putting an end to present uncertainties, appreciate the value of your property and the price of your shares. Consider our proposals as a whole. We offer you shares at par, and for each share you take you have a right—mind, a right, no obligation at all, but a right which you can keep or dispose of as you please—a right to subscribe and call for one share at par at any moment for two years, and a right to subscribe and call for a further share at par at any moment for four years—rights which you can exercise whatever the price of shares may be, and which may be of great value. Further, you need not be afraid that your money will be swallowed up in ineffectual efforts to meet the Company's requirements, because, as I have just said, it will only be taken under circumstances which make the future of the Company assured, that is under circumstances which will not only enhance the value of the rights you are receiving, but add, we believe, in a very substantial manner to the value of your present shareholding. You may well ask, and, no doubt, do ask, whether, if you respond to our proposals, demands will cease—in other words, whether we consider the capital account will be closed. In our judgment, the answer to this question is—Yes!"

The general opinion is that the Chartered shareholders, who must be a very speculative lot, will be taken by this offer.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN NEW YORK.

The gloomy telegraphic reports about the trade depression in the United States are fully confirmed by a perusal of the more accurate American newspapers. Thus according to the "Bulletin" of the New York State Labour Department, the ninety-two labour unions of New York city making returns for December reported that of 66,120 members 22,267, or 34·2 per cent., were unemployed, and in the case of 90 per cent. of these the reason was actual lack of work. This compared with 12·8 per cent. in December, 1906, and 6·7 per cent. in 1905. Another authority, "Charities," put the total number of union labourers out of work at 90,000, or about one-third of the entire membership of the unions; and, in addition, there were at least 30,000 idle persons classed as vagrants. According to the "Bulletin" of the Labour Department, the tobacco industry has the largest proportion of workers unemployed—nearly 83 per cent.! In the clothing industry the ratio was 53·7 per cent., and in building trades 45 per cent. In woodworking the percentage of unemployed was 29·3, in metals and machinery 28·9, and in transportation 27·3. This, according to "Bradstreets," a commercial weekly of high standing, is the highest record of unemployment from lack of work since the panic year 1893.

LUCCELLUM.

"PYRENO"

(REGISTERED)

A PERFECT UNDERWEAR

Should any Garment shrink in the wash it
WILL BE REPLACED.

BIRKBECK BANK

ESTABLISHED 1851.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, HIGH HOLBORN, W.C.

2½ per cent. INTEREST
allowed on Deposit Accounts.

2 per cent. INTEREST
on Drawing Accounts with Cheque Book.

All General Banking Business transacted.

ALMANACK, with full particulars, POST FREE.

C. F. RAVENSCROFT, Secretary.

HIGHEST QUALITY TURKISH TOWELS AND SIMILAR GOODS.

SOFT AND ABSORBENT.

THE "OSMAN" TURKISH TOWEL.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH SHEET.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH MAT.
THE "OSMAN" TURKISH BATH GOWN.

THE "OSMAN" Turkish Goods enumerated here are an absolute necessity in every household. They are a luxury, but not expensive, and can be obtained at prices within reach of every one. Be sure to buy the "Osman" brand and avoid imitations.

MADE BY

BARLOW & JONES LIMITED, MANCHESTER;

And Sold by all High-class Drapers and Upholsterers.

Suction Gas Power.

80% REDUCTION
OF YOUR GAS ENGINE
GAS BILL.

TANGYES Ltd., Birmingham.

CONNOISSEURS OF COFFEE DRINK THE

RED WHITE & BLUE

Delicious for Breakfast & after Dinner.
In making, use LESS QUANTITY, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

The Best Tonic

For the restoration of energy and vitality; the relief of mental and nervous exhaustion, impaired digestion or appetite, there is no remedy so beneficial as

Horsford's Acid Phosphate

(Non-Alcoholic.)

It is a scientific and carefully prepared preparation of the phosphates that provides the tonic and nerve food needed to improve general health.

If your chemist does not have it in stock he can obtain it from Bovril, Ltd., 152 Old Street, London, E. C.

BOVRIL REPELS INFLUENZA

